

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LAWYERS' REPORTS

ANNOTATED.

LOUISIANA SUPREME COURT.

Joseph D. JAMES, for Use of Paul Anthony Calvit JAMES,

v.

RAPIDES LUMBER COMPANY, Limited,
Appt.

(50 La. Ann. 717.)

- *1. It is the negligence of the foreman of a steam saw mill to call on one of its employees, suddenly and on the spur of the moment, to take a position in the mill that is dangerous, without giving him any instructions or explanation whatever of the movements of the machinery, or the risk and hazard of the employment, with which the employee had neither a previous knowledge nor acquaintance. For such knowledge the proprietor is responsible to the servant.

2. It is the duty of the master to give warning of danger to an inexperienced employee, not informed of the danger, who is placed in charge of dangerous machinery.
3. The facts found by the verdict are sustained by a presumption of correctness, until error is shown.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for Rapides Parish in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Howe, Spencer, & Cooke and Robert P. Hunter for appellant.

Mr. Horace H. White, for appellee:

In construing insurance contracts in which there is some ambiguity, courts should be guided by the rule that where two interpretations equally fair may be given, that which gives the greater indemnity shall prevail.

Meyer v. Queen Ins. Co. 41 La. Ann. 1000.

Since it is the duty of the master to use due diligence to see that the servant is not exposed to unnecessary risks in the course of his employment, he is bound, before an employee is put in charge of dangerous machinery with which he is not acquainted, to instruct and qualify him for his duty.

Buswell, Personal Injuries, § 202.

A master who carries on an extraordinarily dangerous undertaking, such as the generation and distribution of electricity, is bound to know the character and extent of the danger, and to notify the same to the servant specially and unequivocally, so as clearly to be understood by him.

Myhan v. Louisiana Electric Light & P. Co. 41 La. Ann. 964, 7 L. R. A. 172.

When the master has created the danger, he is bound to guard against it, and if he himself does not know or believe that the danger exists, he cannot require superior knowledge and judgment from the servant.

Faren v. Sellers, 39 La. Ann. 1011.

I. Introductory.

The omission of a master to instruct a servant as to the danger of his work cannot become the basis of a legal liability unless the evidence establishes three facts:

First, it is manifest that the general principle developed in a note recently published in this series (Walkowski v. Penokee & G. Consol. Mines (Mich.) 41 L. R. A. 33), will preclude recovery in the absence of proof that the master was himself aware, actually or constructively, of the existence of the perils with respect to which it is alleged to have been his duty to enlighten the servant.

Secondly, the same result must follow, as a necessary result of the application of the same principle, where the defendant did not know, actually or constructively, that the plaintiff was excusably ignorant of the danger to which his injury was due, and, by reason of such ignorance, was exposed to an abnormal risk over and above those which he was presumed to contemplate as incidents of the employment.

Thirdly, since it is self-evident that an obligation to impart information cannot exist in regard to any person who already possesses that information, or would be in possession of it if he had made a proper use of the means of knowledge within his reach, a master cannot be made juridically responsible for his omission to warn a servant as to perils of which the latter actually knew or would have known if he had been ordinarily careful in taking notice of his surroundings.

The first of these prerequisites to the maintenance of the action is an element common to all actions of which the gist is the negligence of the master in the furnishing or maintenance of safe conditions for the servants' work, and, as it has been fully discussed in the note referred to, we need not here examine it at length.

It will be convenient, however, to notice in this connection that the absence of any obligation to instruct may sometimes be predicated from the fact that, taking into consideration the nature of the particular work assigned to the servant, the employer was not bound to anticipate the contingency of the servant's placing himself in such a position as to incur the danger in regard to which there is alleged to be such an obligation. (See subd. V. of the above note, as to the master's imputed knowledge or ignorance of future events.)

In Neff v. Broom (1883) 70 Ga. 256, an omission to instruct was held not to be culpable where the defendants had employed women to work at one end of a room, 72 feet in length, to wrap soap in papers which were brought to them, and one of the women, returning out of working hours, had gone to the back part of the room to get some paper, and there fell into a reservoir of lye. The court expressed its agreement with the position of defendants' counsel that negligence could not be predicated of the mere omission to inclose the reservoir, but said that this contention did not exactly meet the complaint, which charged that defendants were negligent in keeping the reservoir in a part of the room too dark for the plaintiff to discover it herself, and in failing to notify her of its existence. The liability of the defendants from this standpoint was then discussed as follows: "We recognize their obligation to provide her with a perfectly safe place for the performance of the duties in which she was engaged; and if, for any proper purpose, she was expected or required to expose herself to the danger of falling into their reservoir, it was their duty to have notified her of its existence that she might have guarded against it. It is shown by the proof, beyond question, as it looks to us, that there was neither necessity for, nor expectation of, her going near the danger: that the accident occurred out of the accustomed hours for work; that those whose duty it was to furnish her with the paper, of which she was in search, were away, and their absence known to her; that she chose to wait upon herself rather than be delayed; that she voluntarily went into this unlighted part of the room, and, by her own negligence, occasioned her injuries; that she was paid by the quantity of work she did, and being unwilling to await the return of her coemployees, sought to perform, not only her own, but their duties."

The second results from a particular application of the principle which makes knowledge an essential element of negligence to a case in which the special question to be resolved is whether, in view of the material conditions which produced the injury, and the personal characteristics of a certain servant, the master should have seen that such servant was probably incapable of understanding the perils of the situation. The inquiry under this head, it will be noticed, ranges over much the same area of facts as that which is explored in ascertaining whether the third prerequisite to the maintenance of the action exists. The only difference is that the problem for the solution of which the data are used is propounded in another form decided by the theory on which the complaint is framed, and that the testimony which, in one case, is directed to the establishment of a breach of a positive duty, is directed in the other case to the support of a plea which is virtually one of confession and avoidance.

The risk assumed by the servant is the ordinary hazard incident to the employment, and this is synonymous with unavoidable accident.

Wood, Mast. & S. p. 738.

It is not contributory negligence per se to engage in a dangerous occupation.

Beach, Contrib. Neg. 370; Wood, Mast. & S. p. 763.

The master is liable for negligence where either the master, or vice principal, personally interferes, and either does, or commands the doing of, the act which caused the injury.

2 Thomp. Neg. p. 969; Beach, Contrib. Neg. 311-350; Wood, Mast. & S. pp. 676, 699, 837, 843; Wharton, Neg. 205.

It is the duty of the master to provide suitable places, appliances, and agents.

Buswell, Personal Injuries, §§ 192-197;

The statement of the third prerequisite to the maintenance of the servants' action at once suggests what is, for practical purposes, the most important point to be remembered in connection with these actions, viz., that any case which is submitted on the theory of a breach of the duty to instruct must involve an examination into the legal effect of evidence which is equally competent upon the question whether the servant shall, as a result of his knowing the conditions under which he is working, be charged with the legal consequences of an assumption of the risks or of contributory negligence. The closeness of the connection between these defenses and the duty to instruct the servant is indicated by the fact that the courts, in affirming or denying the existence of the duty, often express their conclusions by declaring that the servant's acceptance of the responsibility or his want of care had or had not been established by the testimony. So intimate, indeed, is the correlation between the duty and the defenses that, in many cases in the books, it seems to have been a mere matter of accident that they were tried on the theory of a breach of the duty, rather than on the theory that the defenses were available. It is worth noting, however, that a servant who seeks to recover damages upon a complaint of which the essence is a breach of the duty to communicate certain facts will often place himself in a less advantageous position than if he had relied generally upon the existence of the conditions indicated by these facts as charging the master with a want of care in the furnishing or maintenance of the instrumentalities. Manifestly the breach of a duty to instruct is at once negatived by proof of the servant's knowledge, actual or constructive, whereas such knowledge is not in any jurisdiction regarded as being in all cases conclusive proof of contributory negligence, and by many courts of the very highest authority (see Smith v. Baker [1891] A. C. 320; Mahoney v. Dore [1892] 155 Mass. 513), is considered not to be conclusive proof, even of an assumption of the risk.

In Perry v. Marsh (1854) 25 Ala. 659, the action was on the case for a fraudulent misrepresentation as to a material fact, the allegation being that the employer knew of the dangerous condition of the building in which the work was to be done, and failed to disclose that fact to the employee. The concealment of the danger being the gist of the action, it is evident that this case, although it arrives at a conclusion similar to that which would have been reached if the ordinary duty of the master to provide a safe place of work had been relied Helm v. O'Rourke, 46 La. Ann. 178; Towns v. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. 37 La. Ann. 630; Clairain v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 40 La. Ann. 182; 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 889-900.

Watkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted by the plaintiff for $4,000 damages for the use of his minor son, Paul Anthony Calvit James, against the defendant company, for the injuries he suffered for the deprivation and loss of his left hand, which was cut off at the wrist by a diminutivesaw in its mill, through the fault and negligence of the company, its officers and employees. The defendant answered at length and in detail, and also filed a plea of no cause of action, which was considered with the merits. The cause was tried by a jury, who found a verdict for the plain-on, belongs to a rather different category from those reviewed in the present note.

That this conception of deceit quite naturally suggests itself in such cases is evident from such a passage as the following:

"If a master employs a servant to do work for him, not knowing of any special or latent danger in the work, the servant takes the consequence of any danger there may be in it. The master does not mislead the servant, but only avails himself of his voluntary service. On the other hand, if the master knows of danger which the servant does not, it is clearly the duty of the master to communicate his knowledge of the danger to the servant." Griffiths v. London & St. K. Docks Co. (1884) L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 498.

The use of the word "trap" in regard to certain latent dangers indicates another connecting link between the principle of the Alabama case above cited, and those under discussion. See, for example, Plank v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1875) 60 N. Y. 607.

It will be noticed, also, that the cases cited infra, in III. c. 1 and 2, might readily be referred to the principle that the circumstances are such as to induce a false sense of security in the servant, if the implied obligations arising from the contract of service were not available as a ground of decision.

We are now in a position to review and test the correctness of the various forms of statement which the courts have employed in enunciating the rule which expresses the character and extent of the master's duty to instruct a servant.

In the first place, as showing the necessity for proof of the master's knowledge of the danger, whether existent or expected to arise in the future, we may cite Melchert v. Smith Brewing Co. (1891) 140 Pa. 448. There the plaintiff's proposition was that the danger of explosion was an actual, latent danger, which was known to the defendant, or ought to have been known, and therefore it was the duty of the defendant to warn the plaintiff of this latent danger, and for not doing this the defendant was negligent. The court said: "It will be seen at once, from the above review of the testimony, that the plaintiff entirely failed to show any knowledge by the defendant of this alleged danger, since the fact of the explosions was not communicated by either of the witnesses who say they had knowledge, and all the other testimony proves there was no such danger, because there never were such explosions. The learned court below could not possibly commit that question to the jury upon such a state of testimony."

tiff in the sum of $3,750; and, after an unsuccessful effort to obtain a new trial, the defendant prayed for and obtained this appeal.

The plaintiff's demand is for $3,000 general damages and for $1,000 insurance. He represents that on the 17th of September, 1897, his minor son was working in the employment of the defendant company as watchman and lumber grader, and that while so employed he was ordered to go to work at one of their machines, known as an "edger," and that upon going to work at the edger, and upon taking hold of the first piece of lumber from it, his left hand was cut off at the wrist by the edger. He shows that his son was a minor, that the edger is an exceedingly dangerous machine, and that it was situated in an exceedingly dangerous position; that its appliances were not properly protected, so as to prevent the happening of accidents, and that, consequently, only skilled and well-trained workmen should be employed to work there; that at the time his son was assigned to duty at the edger, the defendant well knew that he was a minor, that he was not a skilled workman, that he knew nothing about working at the edger, and that he had been theretofore employed at work which was not dangerous; that, notwithstanding all that, the defendant's foreman called upon him suddenly, upon the spur of the moment, at a time when the mill was in full operation, to assume that position of danger; and that his son, being called upon to make a sudden and unexpected election whether he would undertake the employment, or by declining it run the risk of a discharge, chose the former, not having

Similarly, a minor who has been fully instructed as to such dangers of his work as are reasonably to be anticipated, cannot recover for an injury arising from an unexpected cause, not indicating negligence on the master's part. Ash v. Verienden Bros. (1893) 154 Pa. 247.

Nor can any actionable breach of duty be predicated of the master's omission to warn a servant not to work at a place in a ditch where the sides are not shored up if there is no reason to anticipate that they will fall in. Burns v. Pethcal (1894) 75 Hun. 437.

Dangers which "the employer" himself cannot be deemed to have foreseen" are also exempted from those in regard to which a duty of instruction can be predicated. In Wagner v. H. W. Jayne Chemical Co. (1892) 147 Pa. 475.

In the second place, we find numerous recognitions of the principle that, before the master can be held liable on the ground of a breach of the duty to instruct, he must be shown to have had knowledge, actual or constructive, of the servant's ignorance and inability to appreciate the danger alleged to exist.

The rule which requires an employer to warn a servant of danger is applicable only where there is a danger which is known or ought to be known to the employer, and which the employee, owing to youth or inexperience, does not know and cannot reasonably be expected to discover by the exercise of ordinary care. Rooney v. Sewall & D. Cordage Co. (1894) 161 Mass. 153.

Where the work of a servant exposes him to danger of which he is ignorant, and which, from youth or inexperience, he is manifestly incapable of comprehending without assistance, it is the duty of his master, if he knows or ought to know of it, to give him such warning and instruction as are necessary for his safety. Cirlick v. Merchants' Woolen Co. (1890) 151 Mass. 152, 6 L. R. A. 733.

Where an employer knows the danger to which his servant will be exposed in the performance of any labor to which he assigns him, and does not give him sufficient and reasonable notice thereof, its dangers not being obvious, and the servant, without negligence on his own part, through inexperience, or through reliance on the directions given, fails to perceive or understand the risk, and is injured, the employer is responsible. The dangers of a particular position or mode of doing work are often apparent to a person of capacity or knowledge of the subject, while others, from youth, inexperience, or want of capacity, may fail to appreciate them; and a servant, even with his own consent, is not to be exposed to such dangers, unless with instructions and cautions sufficient to enable him to comprehend them, and to do his 44 L. R. A.

work safely with proper care on his own part. Leary v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1885) 139 Mass. 580, 52 Am. Rep. 733.

The duty of an employer to give instructions to one about to work on dangerous machinery exists only when there are dangers in the employment of which he has or ought to have knowledge, and which he has reason to believe his employee does not know, and will not discover in time to protect himself from injury. Stuart v. West End Street R. Co. (1895) 163 Mass. 391.

To show negligence in the defendants, it must appear that the danger was such that the plaintiff would not be presumed to know it, and that the defendants did not give him information of it. If he knew and appreciated the danger, he cannot recover. Pratt v. Prouty (1891) 153 Mass. 333.

An employer is under no obligation to warn an employee of dangers which are obvious, nor to instruct him in matters which he may fairly be supposed thoroughly to understand. Cirlick v. Merchants' Woolen Co. (1890) 151 Mass. 152, 6 L. R. A. 733.

It is a fact, if proved, tending to show gross negligence in a railway company, to employ any inexperienced person, knowing such person to be ignorant of the business for which he is employed, in any hazardous and dangerous business, unless said company makes known and explains fully the hazard and danger connected with such business, and instructs such person how to avoid the danger. St. Louis & S. E. R. Co. v. Vallrius (1877) 56 Ind. 511.

The rule that the employee impliedly assumes the risks of the service, and of such dangers as are obvious and open to ordinary observation, does not embrace such risks as the employer knows, or which, by the exercise of reasonable care, he might have known, beforehand, that the employee, by reason of his immaturity and inexperience, is ignorant of, or such as the employer knows the employee, without experience, cannot appreciate or avoid without instruction or warning. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Frawley (1886) 110 Ind. 18.

The duty of the master to instruct and warn the servant only arises as to dangers which the master knows or has reason to believe the servant is ignorant of. Yeager v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (1894) 93 Iowa, 1.

When an employer engages one to perform a dangerous service which requires caution and the exercise of peculiar skill, knowing that he is without experience, and ignorant of its dangers, it is the duty of the employer to give the employee suitable instructions and warnings as to the dangers he is likely to meet in the perform-been warned by the foreman of the defendant, or any officer of the company, of the danger there was in working at the edger, nor given any instructions as to the character of the work he was expected to perform or of the means of guarding against accident. He shows that, when he was employed by the defendant, the amount of 75 cents per month was exacted from his son by the company, and deducted from his wages, as premium on accident insurance, the policy representing which the company had obtained from the Union Casualty & Surety Company of St. Louis, Missouri. He shows that no policy was issued to him, and that none was applied for in his name, but that same was applied for by, and was issued in favor of and made payable to, the defendant company: that notwithstanding the aforesaid monthly exactions of insurance premiums from his son as an employee, the conditions of the insurance were never explained to him; that since the accident he has made demand of the defendant first, and afterwards of the insurance company, for a statement of the insurance, but was refused information by both of them,—the latter only admitting that it carried an accident policy indemnifying the defendant company against loss or damage they might sustain or had to pay their employees. It is on this score that the plaintiff claims $1,000, and it was at this demand that the defendant's plea of no cause of action was leveled.

In this court the plaintiff and appellee filed an answer to the appeal, and requested an amendment of the judgment, so as to award him $1,000 insurance money against the defendant. This demand, as we understand it, is that his son is entitled to the sum of $1,- ance of the services he is engaged in and is required by the employer to perform. Reynolds v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1891) 64 Vt. 66.

Employers "are bound to see that their employees have reasonable notice of any hidden danger known to the employer, but of which the employee might be ignorant without blame, and of which, at the time he is hired, he may reasonably be supposed to be in fact ignorant." Dowling v. Allen (1878) 6 Mo. App. 195.

Unless the defendant knew or ought to have known of some occasion for information or instruction on this point, its neglect to impart any could not be regarded as the proximate cause of any injury that ensued to the plaintiff for want of such information or instruction. The mere fact that he was injured because he was inexperienced and ignorant of the danger and hazard would not suffice to charge the defendant. Klochinski v. Shores Lumber Co. (1896) 93 Wis. 417 (holding that a special verdict was defective because there was no finding of the employer's knowledge of the need of instruction).

The servant is not entitled to rely on the want of proper instruction, "unless . . . the defendant was not justified in believing that he had done his duty by him. If he did all that most other men, under like circumstances, would have done, that is enough." Foster v. Pusey (1888) 8 Houst. (Del.) 168 (charge to jury). To the same effect, see Crowley v. Pacific Mills (1889) 148 Mass. 228; Mannion v. Hagan (1896) 9 App. Div. 98; Arizona Lumber & T. Co. v. Mooney (Ariz. 1893) 83 Pac. 590; Missouri P. R. Co. v. King (1893) 2 Tex. Civ. App. 122; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Sasse (1893, Tex. Civ. App.) 22 S. W. 187; Fort Smith Oil Co. v. Slover (1893) 58 Ark. 168; Riliston v. Mather (1891) 44 Fed. Rep. 743.

In Ingerman v. Moore (1891) 90 Cal. 410, a case where the plaintiff was caught upon a set-screw in a revolving shaft, it was remarked that, in passing upon the question of defendant's alleged negligence, it was necessary for the jury to determine: (1) Was plaintiff in fact inexperienced in the work in which he was engaged? and, if so (2) were defendants informed of this fact? (3) If defendants were so informed, did they neglect to give him notice of the location of the set screw, and to instruct him in the manner of running the machine, so as to guard him against the injury which he received?

With these statements may be classed those in which the duty to instruct the servant is predicated in regard to latent or hidden dangers, or, what is the same thing, dangers which are not obvious to a person of ordinary intelligence in the exercise of ordinary care, the employer being presumably chargeable with knowledge that the servant cannot be expected to ascertain the existence of dangers answering that description. (For the cases illustrating the converse of this proposition that there is no duty to instruct as to patent dangers, see III. d. infra.)

An employee engaging in work "new to him should be instructed in it, and if he is not acquainted with the latent dangers incident to it they should be explained to him, that he may, so far as is consistent with a proper performance of it, avoid them; and in such case he is not presumed to know whether his employer has furnished appliances which are reasonably safe and in ordinary use, and he is not chargeable with an assumption of the risks involved in the failure to provide them." Bannon v. Lutz (1893) 158 Pa. 166.

The rule that the master is not required to inform his servant of dangers pertaining to his duties "is true as to dangers which are obvious, and which the servant would necessarily see."

It is also true of the ordinary dangers pertaining to a particular service, and which all persons who engage in it are presumed to know. But the statement is far from being universally true. The true rule on this subject is well stated in Wharton on Negligence, § 206. It is there said, that a "servant generally assumes only those risks of which he has expressed or implied notice. Some risks are so obvious that notice of them will be presumed. Where there are special risks in an employment, of which the employee is not, from the nature of the employment, cognizant, or which are not patent in the work, it is the duty of the employer to notify him of such risks, and on failure of such notice, if he is hurt by exposure to such risks, he is entitled to recover from the employer." United States Rolling Stock Co. v. Wilder (1886) 116 Ill. 100.

The servant does not assume latent dangers known to the master that are actually unknown to him, and which one of his capacity and experience would not have known by the use of ordinary care. It is the duty of the master to notify the servant of such dangers. Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Erickson (1893) 12 U. S. App. 260, 55 Fed. Rep. 943, 5 C. C. A. 341.

A master is bound to notify his servant of risks which the latter has no reason to believe from the nature of his employment he will have to encounter, and which arise from hidden causes or such as would reasonably escape his observation, if the master knows, or by the exercise of necessary care ought to know, of them. Wood v. Helges (1896) 83 Md. 257.

One who contracts to perform labor for an-

000 of the insurance money which is ultimately recoverable from the accident insurance company on the policies of insurance which were issued payable to the defendant company, because he had paid the premiums which bought the insurance. Or, in other words, the insurance premiums having been exacted from its employee, and used to keep in force a policy guaranteeing the defendant against loss or damage it may have to pay said employee on account of an accident, the amount of said insurance, when realized by the defendant from the insurance company, should be paid over to his son in diminution of the full amount of the damages due him. That is to say, the insurance policies should inure to the benefit of an employee who has kept up the premiums which give life to the policy.

The defendant, for answer, pleads a general denial, and then admits that plaintiff's son was injured in the hand by its mill, but avers "that if, in any event, respondent was liable for damages, which is expressly denied. . . . then respondent avers that the damages claimed . . . are out of all proportion to the injury done," etc. It denies any knowledge of the minority of the plaintiff's son, and affirms that from his size and appearance it was believed that he was a grown man, several years past majority. It avers that he came to the mill several months prior to the accident, sought employment, and was employed in several capacities, especially as night watchman, and had received his wages in his own name, without disclosing his minority; that, after having been employed as a night other taken upon himself such risks only as are necessarily and usually incident to the employment. If the employer has knowledge that the particular employment is, from extraneous causes, hazardous or dangerous to a degree beyond what it fairly imports or is understood by the employee to be, he is bound to inform [him] the employee of the fact. Baxter v. Roberts (1872) 44 Cal. 187, 13 Am. Rep. 160.

A superior is bound to know whatever may endanger the person or life of an employee in the discharge of the duties of his employment, and is bound specially to warn him of the nature of the danger, unless said employee well knew of the existence of the hazard or risk, and willingly exposed himself to it. Stucke v. Orleans R. Co. (1898) 50 La. Ann. 188.

The master may not wilfully expose his servant to danger of loss or injury in the course of his employment, the risk of which is known to him, but notice of which is wrongfully withheld. Guirney v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1890) 43 Minn. 496.

Where an employee is young and inexperienced, or the risk is a latent or unusual one, and for either reason there is more than ordinary danger of getting hurt, the employee should be specially warned. Northern P. R. Co. v. Blake (1894) 27 U. S. App. 190, 63 Fed. Rep. 45, 11 C. C. A. 93.

It is presumed that the master or foreman placed in charge of and conducting a manufacturing business knows and is familiar with the dangers, latent and patent, ordinarily accompanying that business, and if there are latent risks that a servant is, from ignorance or inexperience, not capable of understanding and appreciating, or which he would not be likely to know, the master should inform him of such dangers. Smith v. Peninsular Car Works (1886) 60 Mich. 501.

It is culpable negligence in the master to fail to notify the servant of risks which are not patent, and of which he is not cognizant from the nature of his employment. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Wombacher (1890) 134 Ill. 57.

It is a master's duty to notify his servant of any hidden defect in the place where the latter is expected to work which increases the ordinary risks of his employment, and to advise him of any latent danger which may attend the doing of any work which the servant is called upon to perform, provided the defect or the danger in question is known to the master and is unknown to the servant. Gowen v. Bush (1896) 40 U. S. App. 349, 76 Fed. Rep. 349, 22 C. C. A. 196. (Doctrine said to be "elementary.") and appliances that are reasonably safe, or of giving notice to the employee of defects that are not obvious, or of which the latter has no knowledge." George H. Hammond & Co. v. Schweitzer (1887) 112 Ind. 246.

If the danger is apparent, and is as well known to the employee as to the employer, the former takes the risk of it; but if the employer knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known, that the employment was hazardous to a degree beyond that which it fairly imports, he was bound to inform the latter of such fact or put him in possession of such information. Thompson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1883) 14 Fed. Rep. 566.

Whether a master is negligent in failing to notify a servant of a danger depends upon whether the peril involved was patent or latent—"such as could be seen and known by ordinary care and prudence, . . . or such as was obscured and could not be seen or appreciated." Holland v. Tennessee Coal, I. & R. Co. (1890) 91 Ala. 444, 11 L. R. A. 619.

In all cases the master is bound to disclose to the servant latent defects and dangers of which he has knowledge or of which he ought to have knowledge by the exercise of reasonable attention, care, and diligence, and of which the servant has no knowledge, and would not discover by the exercise of reasonable care. This is particularly so when the master employs, for a hazardous and dangerous work, a child, young person, or other person without experience, and of immature judgment. In such a case the master is bound to point out the dangers of which he has, or ought to have, knowledge, and give to the employee such instructions as will enable him to avoid injury by the exercise of reasonable care, unless both the danger and the means of avoiding it are apparent, and within the comprehension of the servant. A neglect of such duties may, in a proper case, the servant being without contributory negligence, render the master liable, regardless of the fact that he may have exercised reasonable care in making and keeping the premises, machinery, and appliances in a safe condition. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Adams (1886) 105 Ind. 165. See also, for similar statements, Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McMullen (1895) 58 N. J. L. 155, 32 L. R. A. 351; Hightower v. Bamberg Cotton Mills (1896) 48 S. C. 190; Salem Stone & Lime Co. v. Griffin (1894) 139 Ind. 141; Williams v. Walton & W. Co. (1892) 9 Houst. (Del.) 322; Turner v. Goldsboro Lumber Co. (1896) 119 N. C. 387; McDade v. Washington & G. R. Co. (1886) 5 Mackey, 144; Bromley v. Smith, B. & R. Mach. Co. (1882) 12 Mo. App. 594.

watchman for several months, the plaintiff's son sought work at the mill, "expressing to the defendant's foreman and superintendent his capacity to fill, and his desire to fill, any place to which he might be assigned," etc., and that at his request "he was put to work in the mill at day work, and had worked in the mill for several days in different capacities, in plain view of the machine and saw, where he was finally hurt in his hand; that on the morning of the accident [the plaintiff's son] was by the foreman of the mill hands requested to fill the place of one of the men who was sick and absent, and whose duty and work were to take plank which had been sawed and planed off a table and platform, to lay them on a machine about 8 or 10 feet away from the saws, [which were] so placed [as] to cut off square both ends of the plank, and which machine was operated by steam power and worked rollers and dogs, so that, after the plank was laid on the rollers, it was not necessary for a workman to follow the planks, or to remove from his safe and remote position with reference to the saws." It avers "that the machine was first-class of its kind, and in perfect working order, and that it was so placed, and all of its appliances were so arranged, as to furnish the best possible protection to the men engaged in operating it; that it required no particular skill or knowledge to safely and properly perform the labor required of the workman at the machine; that any man who could lift, with other men at the other end, one or several planks, and lay them on the rollers, could perform the work required of the plaintiff's son; . . .

Similarly, we find that the master's knowledge of the servant's ignorance of the danger is an implied element in statements which predicate the duty to instruct from circumstances increasing the risks of the employment beyond its ordinary hazards. Of the existence of this extraordinary peril the servant is presumably not aware, and the master must, of course, take notice of this fact.

If by reason of the omission to supply the usual and ordinary means to prevent accident, the hazard to its servants was increased, and the changes in appliances was not known to the servants, or so open and visible that they, by the exercise of ordinary care, would see and know of it, the legal duty rested upon the master to notify them of the increased danger to which they were thereby exposed. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack (1892) 143 Ill. 242. 18 L. R. A. 215, where the employer was held liable for his failure to supply a stopcock to prevent the outflow of oil from a tank, where the pipe which conveyed it had been broken.

If the master knew, or under the circumstances ought to have known, that a machine in use was out of repair and dangerous, it was his duty to see that it was put in proper repair, or to warn those using it of the danger, if they were ignorant of it. Rice v. King Philip Mills (1887) 144 Mass. 229, 59 Am. Rep. 80. For another example of the form of statement, see Strahlendorf v. Rosenthal (1872) 30 Wis. 674. Illustrative cases as to the duty to give instructions with regard to extraordinary risks will be found cited in III. c. infra.

The essential feature of the legal situation supposed in the above cases to exist is, as will be noticed, that the master is regarded as a person who, being in possession of information which he understands to be necessary for the safe performance of the work which he orders to be done, fails to impart that information to a servant whom he knows to be without it. (See the form of statement used in Connor v. Saunders (1894) 9 Tex. Civ. App. 56.)

Since the obligation of the master is to place the servant on the same footing as himself in respect to knowledge of the dangers of the work, it follows that the duty of instruction arises when the master possesses what the courts term "superior means" of knowledge. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Shivel (1892) 13 Ky. L. Rep. 902.

It is error to leave it to the jury to say whether a master should have warned his servants how to handle heavy locomotive wheels without danger, where no evidence has been offered tending to show that any such method was either known to him, or generally known 44 L. R. A.

and practised by other employers. Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford (1897) 94 Va. 627.

Other statements of the circumstances under which a master is held liable, on the ground of a failure to instruct, do not take account of the necessary element of his knowledge of the need of instruction, and to this extent are imperfect as formal enunciations of the rule. But the omission is evidently merely accidental, and cannot be construed as indicating any real antagonism between the courts in regard to a principle so elementary. Of such statements the following may serve as illustrations:

If the master knows of danger which the servant does not, it is clearly the duty of the master to communicate his knowledge of the danger to the servant. Griffiths v. London & St. K. Docks Co. (1884) L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 495.

If persons engaged in dangerous occupations are not informed of the accompanying dangers by the promoters thereof, or by the employers of laborers thereon, and such laborers remain in ignorance of the dangers and suffer in consequence, the employers will also be chargeable for the injuries sustained. Mather v. Rillston (1895) 156 U. S. 391, 89 L. ed. 464.

A workman must know the dangers of his employment by actual experience in the employment, or by the instructions of his employer, before he can be held to have assumed them. Rummel v. Dilworth (1890) 131 Pa. 509.

A master is bound to inform his servant of facts within his knowledge affecting the safety of the servant in the service to be performed, when the latter is ignorant of such facts. McGowan v. La Plata Min. & Smelting Co. (1882) 9 Fed. Rep. 361.

A master who withholds from his servant such information as is necessary to enable him to provide for his own safety does so at his own peril. George H. Hammond Co. v. Johnson (1893) 38 Neb. 244.

"If a master employs a servant to do work in a dangerous place, or where the mode of doing the work is dangerous and apparent to a person of capacity and knowledge of the subject, yet, if the servant employed to do work of such a dangerous character or in a dangerous place, from youth, inexperience, ignorance, or want of general capacity may fail to appreciate the danger, it is a breach of duty on the part of the master to expose the servant of such character, even with his consent, to such dangers, unless he first gives him such instructions or caution as will enable him to apprehend them, and do his work safely, with proper care on his part." Hughes v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1891) 79 Wis. 264. Other such defective state-that, instead of maintaining the position he was told to take, at a perfectly safe distance from the saw, which was intended to cut off the ends of the planks, at the end of which he was put at work, as soon as he had put the plank on the rollers, he immediately began to follow them up the incline, and in the direction of the saw; that the other workmen warned him by calling to him in a loud voice, but he continued to follow the planks until they had reached the saw, which was in plain view of him; and that he reached his hand forward until it touched the saw, and was injured by it." Under the foregoing statement of facts, the answer charges the plaintiff's son with contributory negligence which exonerates the company from liability for damages; and its averment is that he voluntarily and knowingly assumed all of the risks which were incident to his employment, and for that additional reason there can be no recovery.

In the answer there is no mention made of the plaintiff's demand for the payment of insurance money; consequently, it must rest on the general issue. From the evidence it appears that young James was assigned to work at the trimmer, which is a small circular saw, situated near the edger, a much larger machine. From the parol evidence, as well as the photographs which were taken of the locus in quo while the machinery was in operation, it appears that there is visible to the eye not more than one fourth of the saw, which is apparently of but a few inches in diameter. As stating defendant's view very succinctly, we make the following quotation from counsel's brief, viz.: "That ments occur in Roth v. Northern P. Lumbering Co. (1889) 18 Or. 205; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Callbreath (1886) 66 Tex. 526; Monnion v. Hagan (1896) 9 App. Div. 98; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Garrett (1889) 73 Tex. 262.

It has been held not to be the duty of the master to instruct a servant respecting the rules, regulations, and usages by which the service is governed, unless he is asked for such information, or unless he knew the servant to be inexperienced. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Watts (1885) 63 Tex. 549. In the same case in (1885) 64 Tex. 568, however, an instruction was approved which made the master liable if he knew that the servant was inexperienced and uninformed as to the rules—a very different proposition. The servant's duty to seek for information is denied.

In some cases in which we find statements similarly imperfect it will be found that the correct principle was actually relied upon, since the fact that the servant needed instruction was alleged and testified to in the course of the action. See, for example, Wolski v. Knapp-Stout & Co. (1895) 90 Wis. 178; Ogley v. Miles (1898) 139 N. Y. 458; American S. B. Co. v. Foust (1895) 12 Ind. App. 421; Verdell v. Gray's Harbor Commercial Co. (1897) 115 Cal. 517.

In the opinion in Consolidated Coal Co. v. Haenni (1893) 146 Ill. 614, we find another of these defective statements, but by the charge of the trial judge the master's knowledge of the servant's inexperience has been made a prerequisite of recovery. In Mather v. Rillston (1895) 156 U. S. 391, 39 L. ed. 464, the ignorance of the plaintiff was established, but nothing is said as to the employer's knowledge of his ignorance. The implication apparently is that the danger that dynamite may explode from the jarring of machinery or from the overheating of a room is one which the employer is bound to know not to be within the comprehension of a man hired merely to run machinery, unless he has been specially instructed. See V. infra, as to the servant's presumptive knowledge of scientific facts.

The fact that a servant upon entering the employment received from the master a specific promise that instructions would be given is of course sufficient to negative the inference of an assumption of the risk. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. v. Burandt (1891) 136 Ill. 170.

As one of the purposes of rules promulgated by a master is to warn the servant that it is dangerous to do certain acts in a certain manner, or that his fellow employee will, at fixed or indefinite times, do certain acts which will imperil his safety if he does not keep a vigilant 44 L. R. A.

lookout, it is evident that there is a very intimate relation between the duty to instruct and the duty to make rules. (This duty is discussed in a note published in 43 L. R. A. 305.) Both duties in fact are merely special forms of the more comprehensive obligation of a master to see that a servant may be secured from all unnecessary perils, whether these perils spring from causes under the control of the master himself, of the servant to be protected, or of his co-servants. As might be expected, therefore, we sometimes find the duty of the master, as regards the plaintiff himself, stated in the alternative to be that of instructing the particular servant, or of promulgating some general rule. Latorre v. Central Stamping Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 145. Compare also the cases cited in VII. infra, with regard to the duty to warn as to sporadic perils.

The decisions illustrating the general principles set forth above will now be collected under headings suggested by the terms in which the nature and extent of the master's obligations have been stated by the court.

II. Actual knowledge of servant, existence of duty to instruct negatived by.

It is "not the duty of the master to admonish his servant to be careful, when the servant well knows his danger and the importance of using care to avoid it. It is the duty of the servant to exercise care proportionate to the danger of his situation as he understands it, and if he fails to do so the fault is his and not his master's." Cirlack v. Merchants' Woolen Co. (1890) 151 Mass. 152, 6 L. R. A. 733. To the same effect, see Goodnow v. Walpole Emery Mills (1888) 146 Mass. 261; Perry v. Old Colony R. Co. (1895) 164 Mass. 296; Hathaway v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1894) 92 Iowa, 337; Junior v. Missouri Electric Light & P. Co. (1895) 127 Mo. 79; Yeager v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (1894) 93 Iowa, 1.

This principle has been also stated thus: "Even if a master is negligent in not giving his servant instructions and cautions as to the dangers of his employment, yet if the servant receives the same information and cautions from other sources, whether from other persons or from his own observation, and is nevertheless thereafter injured, the negligence of the master is not the proximate cause of the injury. Trumble v. North Star Woolen Mill Co. (1894) 57 Minn. 52.

But this is manifestly an illogical way of putting the matter. No question of causation is involved. The conception underlying the rule is merely that this duty, being essentially a duty of supplying the servant with one particular on the day of the accident the plaintiff's son was requested to take the place at the trimmer of the regular workman, who was sick and temporarily absent; that the duties required of him were to take the planks, after they had been sawed, from a table or platform, and lay them on the apron of the trimmer, several feet from the saws, and were taken thence to the saws by machinery for the purpose of having their ends squared; so that it was not necessary for the workman to follow up the planks, or to move from his safe position, remote from the saws," etc. And he further places the defendant's charge of contributory fault on the part of young James on the ground stated in its answer,—“that it charges specially that he did not leave his position and follow up the timber until it and his hand reached the saw, and this carelessness caused the accident," etc.

Before analyzing the evidence, or stating our conclusions thereon, we may just as well disembarass the case of young James' minority, as he testifies as a witness that he was 19 years of age at the time of his engagement in the defendant's service, and there is no evidence tending to show that the defendant was aware of his minority. And it is shown that the young man was very well grown for his years, and justified the assumption of his being a major, resulting from the fact, which was pointed out by the witnesses, that he had made his contract with the company, and collected and received for his monthly wages.

Counsel for the defendant claim that after young James had served the defendant for means of securing his safety, cannot be predicated of a case where the servant already possesses such means.

Failure of an employer to warn an employee who has been about twenty days in the service of the danger of stepping upon a grating beneath which there is machinery will not render him liable for an injury to the employee caused by stumbling and falling upon the grating, where the employee knew that the openings were large enough to let his foot through, and that there was machinery beneath the grating, although he did not know how far beneath. Here the servant already possesses all the information he could have obtained by instructions, as the master could only have told him that it was dangerous to step on the grating. Cmielewski v. Mollenhauer Sugar Ref. Co. (1896) 11 App. Div. 111.

So, also, railroad companies do not owe any duty to trainmen to place signals at snow banks along their tracks, or to give them notice by whistle or bell of the approach of their train to such banks. They assume the risks arising from the existence of such banks just as they assume the risk of the existence of permanent structures which they know to be near the track. Brown v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1886) 69 Iowa, 161.

The disability of the servant to recover on the ground of his previous acquaintance with the conditions is altogether independent of the source from which he has derived his information. Downey v. Sawyer (1892) 157 Mass. 418. Citing Pratt v. Prouty (1891) 153 Mass. 333; De Souza v. Stafford Mills (1892) 155 Mass. 476; s. p. Emma Cotton Seed Oil Co. v. Hale (1892) 56 Ark. 232.

Where a father hires out his son for the purpose of piling lumber, with which business the son is somewhat familiar, having assisted his father frequently in such work, the employer may assume that the father has given his son all instructions necessary to enable him to do the work in safety to himself, and is under no obligations to warn him of danger, where no danger is apparent, and the work is not extraordinary, hazardous, and dangerous. East & West R. Co. v. Sims (1888) 80 Ga. 807.

A servant cannot recover if he has been sufficiently notified and cautioned by a coservant. Alabama C. Coal & C. Co. v. Pitts (1892-93) 98 Ala. 285.

A charge like the following is therefore correct: "If the plaintiff [servant] had such instruction, caution, information, or knowledge as would enable him, with a reasonable exercise of care on his part, to do his work with safety to himself, the defendant was not liable, and that it made no difference whether he derived it [such knowledge] from the defendant's officers, from a second hand in another part of the room, from a stranger, or from his own perceptions and intelligence." Sullivan v. India Mfg. Co. (1873) 113 Mass. 396 (a case of a minor servant).

So, also, a servant cannot hold his master liable for failing to instruct him as to the danger of moving heavy locomotive wheels by hand, where, before his own injury was received, he had seen an accident in which one of the workmen had very narrowly escaped injury while a wheel was being moved in this manner, and his own testimony is to the effect that his fellow servants had told him that this method of doing the work was dangerous, and that this was also his own opinion. Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford (1897) 94 Va. 627.

On the other hand, the plaintiff is not entitled to a charge that "the duty of cautioning a boy of the plaintiff's age [fourteen years], and giving him full notice of the risks attending the work, is a responsibility from which the company cannot free itself by delegating it to a foreman or to a second hand." Such an instruction would create the erroneous impression that, even if the plaintiff had full instructions, it would have been of no avail, if they proceeded from the defendant's foreman or second hand. The master cannot escape the responsibility, if there be one upon him, of notifying the servant of the risks of the work by merely delegating it to one of the servants, but if the duty thus delegated was performed, the servant had all the notice requisite for his safety. Sullivan v. India Mfg. Co. (1873) 113 Mass. 396.

In Tagg v. McGeorge (1893) 155 Pa. 368, plaintiff requested the court to charge that, if the jury found the boy to be young and inexperienced, it was the duty of defendants to explain to him the danger. The answer was: "I affirm that point, . . . also, with the qualification, perhaps, that, if he had that experience from any other source, then it would not be necessary." In the general charge the court explicitly instructed the jury that, if the boy had knowledge of the dangerous character of the machine by information from others or by experience, he could not recover. Held, that the use of the word "perhaps" was not, under the circumstances, sufficient ground for reversing the judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

A verdict is rightly directed for the defendant in an action in which the servant seeks to recover on the ground that he, being immature and inexperienced, was sent by his master into danger the full extent of which he did not comprehend, where it appears from his own testi-several months in the capacity of night watchman, and afterwards of lumber grader, he was assigned to duty in trucking lumber as it came from the trimmer, and "in doing this work he was about ten steps from the trimmer saw which afterwards hurt him, . . . and, consequently, had the opportunity to observe the machinery, and know the danger of the situation." They take the further position that young James subsequently worked at the "live rollers," an automatic contrivance to carry boards away after they have been trimmed, and that while thus engaged he was only about five steps from the trimming saw by means of which he lost his hand, and that in this way he had become familiar with the position and movement of the saw, and knew of the danger of the employment to which he was thereafter assigned. With these statements kept in view, we will make some extracts from the evidence, and apply same thereto.

Young James testifies, in speaking of the incidents which occurred just previous to the accident, that he went to the mill to work loading trucks, but that he continued in that occupation about "three hours, and was then changed to the live rollers"; that he worked at that employment one "evening and the next day until about four o'clock." Then occur the following interrogations and responses, viz.:

Q. Then what did you do?

A. The next morning I went up to go to work. Did not know what to start at, and stayed around expecting to take my same place at the live rollers.

Q. What occurred then?

mony that he was over twenty years of age, that he was not wanting in the average intelligence of his age, that his duties were explained to him when he entered on his employment, and that he understood the very danger into which he fell (an unblocked frog), and had in mind the purpose to avoid it. McGinnis v. Canada Southern Bridge Co. (1882) 49 Mich. 466.

So, also, where the only evidence in the case, including that of the plaintiff himself, is to the effect that he had complete knowledge of the danger which caused his injury. It is the duty of the court to direct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, and a charge setting forth the character of the obligation of the master to instruct the plaintiff is erroneous and misleading, inasmuch as it has no relevancy to the facts of the case. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Mealer (1892) 6 U. S. App. 86, 50 Fed. Rep. 725, 1 C. C. A. 633.

A rule frequently insisted on in the cases applying the doctrine of assumption of risks, viz., that the material question is not whether the plaintiff was aware of the conditions which produced the danger, but whether he understood the danger itself, has sometimes been emphasized in cases of the type under discussion.

The situation or circumstances may be such that while the character of machinery and its mode of operation may be sufficiently obvious to the senses, yet the risks attending its use may not be appreciated or understood by the employee without proper explanation or warning. McDonald v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (1889) 41 Minn. 439.

It is not so much a question whether the party injured has knowledge of all the facts in his situation, but whether he is aware of the danger that threatens him. What avails it to him that all the facts are known if he cannot make the deduction that peril arises from the relation of the facts? The peril may be a fact in itself of which he should be informed. So, in Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. (1869) 102 Mass. 573, 3 Am. Rep. 506, the machinery which caused the injury was open to view, and probably it was seen by the party injured. But the danger of the position was not explained, as was necessary for the protection of one who had no knowledge of it. McGowan v. La Plata Min. & Smelting Co. (1882) 9 Fed. Rep. 861.

The mere general knowledge possessed by a minor that when he engages in a given employment he will be exposed to certain dangers which are not incident to other employments does not constitute that full appreciation of the dangers which will absolve the master of the obligation of instructing him as to the particular nature of the perils to which he will be exposed. Nadau v. White River Lumber Co. (1890) 76 Wis. 120.

Thus, "It is not a conclusion of law from the fact that plaintiff was aware of the existence of the set-screw, and was seventeen years old and sprightly for one of his years, that he was aware of the risk and danger of passing over the shaft while it was in motion." Dowling v. Allen (1881) 74 Mo. 13, 41 Am. Rep. 298.

The following charge was held appropriate in the case of a servant who was wholly inexperienced in the use of machinery, and was killed owing to his clothes being caught by a rapidly revolving shaft about 1½ inches in diameter: "The servant knowing the fact of machinery being in motion close by the place where he is working, may be entirely ignorant of the risk he would incur by falling against or coming into contact with it. In such a case it is the duty of the master, not only to exercise due care, but good faith, toward the servant, and to inform him of the risks he undertakes." Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Harkins (1893) 17 U. S. App. 22, 55 Fed. Rep. 932, 5 C. C. A. 326.

In Davis v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (1890) 53 Ark. 117, 7 L. R. A. 283, we find the following remarks: "Service about the unblocked rails was attended with danger, and the knowledge of the fact that the rails were unblocked did not necessarily imply knowledge of the attendant danger. Knowledge of the danger was itself a question of fact; and, if the jury believed that the deceased, by reason of his youth and inexperience, did not know of or appreciate the danger incident to service about the unblocked rails, and that the company had exposed him to the danger without warning him of it, they should have found that the risk was not one he had assumed by entering the service."

III. Constructive knowledge of servant as bearing upon the duty of the master to instruct him.

As to the duty of a master to bring his rules to the knowledge of his servants, and the effect of a servant's knowledge or ignorance of a rule which he is alleged to have violated. See note on "Rules." Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 43 L. R. A. 305, IV., XI. c.

a. Generally.

It is a universal principle in jurisprudence that, for the purposes of legal responsibility, imputed and actual knowledge stand upon the same footing.

Knowledge of a risk may be imputed to the

A. The foreman ballooned at me,—Mr. Chester was the foreman,—telling me to take the place behind the edger at the trimmer.

Q. On what day was that?

A. On the 17th of September.

Q. What occurred when you took your place behind the edger at the trimmer?

A. I got back there; had not been there a minute, I suppose, when two pieces of two by fours came through the edger, and I took hold of them. They were crossed so I could not see the saws, and to uncross them I gave them a push, and pushed my hand through the saw.

Q. The saw then cut off your hand?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Cut it entirely off?

A. Except a little skin.

Q. Up to that time had you ever been employed in working about the machinery of the sawmill?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you have any skill or knowledge about working about machinery?

A. None at all; no, sir.

Q. Did anyone instruct you about the duties you were about to perform at the time you were behind the edger?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did any one warn you that it was a dangerous place, or explain the machinery there to you?

A. Not that I remember; no, sir.

Q. Well, you do remember, don't you?

A. I do remember that no one told me.

Q. You say Mr. Chester, the foreman, called you there?

A. He passed by. He was on one side of servant, either on the ground that the risk is one ordinarily incident to the employment, or that, although extraordinary, it is one of which a person of the servant's intelligence could not have failed to be aware if he had used due diligence in observing his environment.

A master "must warn them [his servants] of all the dangers to which they will be exposed in the course of their employment, except those which the employee may be deemed to have foreseen as necessarily incidental to the employment, or which may be open and obvious to a person of his experience and understanding,

[or] as the employer [himself] cannot be deemed to have foreseen." Wagner v. H. W. Jayne Chemical Co. (1892) 147 Pa. 475.

The presumption of knowledge in the former case is one which the employer is always entitled to draw unless he has notice that the person he is hiring is inexperienced or of less than average intelligence, the most frequent illustrations of this limitation being furnished by the decisions which deal with minors. (See V. infra.)

Precisely the opposite presumption arises in regard to the servant's knowledge of extraordinary dangers. With these dangers the servant is prima facie unacquainted, as he has a right to rely upon the master's having so far done his duty that the instrumentalities of his business are in a normally safe condition. Hence, in an action in which the servant seeks to recover on the theory that he was left by the master in ignorance of such a danger, the defendant has the burden of proving that the plaintiff ought to have appreciated the risk without instruction. The effect of entertaining these presumptions will be apparent from the cases cited in the following sections:

The knowledge possessed by a foreman in charge of a piece of work is not imputed to his subordinates, there being no agency in such a case. Lechman v. Hooper (1890) 52 N. J. L. 253. Compare Covey v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1887) 27 Mo. App. 170.

b. Ordinary perils of an employment, no duty to instruct as to.

As has just been pointed out, the doctrine that an employer is not bound to give his employee notice of the ordinary dangers pertaining to a particular service is founded upon the presumption that all persons engaged in it are presumed to know them. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Scheller (1892) 42 Ill. App. 619.

Similarly, the rule that servants are presumed to contract against the hazards incident to the service has been mentioned as limiting the obligation of the master to instruct his servant. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Donahue (1874) 75 Ill. 106.

Hence, as it is one of the natural incidents of the handling of glass in the processes of its manufacture, that it will be broken without violence from, or the fault of, those who handle it, the employer is under no duty to instruct them as to the risk of such fracture. Myers v. W. C. De Pauw Co. (1894) 138 Ind. 590.

It is error to instruct a jury that "it is the duty of the master to inform his servants of all danger in and about the premises where they are required, by his authority, to perform labor." Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Clark (1883) 108 Ill. 118. The court said: "Railroad employees, as all the books lay down the doctrine, assume the ordinary risks and hazards of the employment. The presumption is that the employee understands the nature and dangers of the employment when he engages in the service, and if not, that he will inform himself. It would be wholly impracticable for railroads and manufacturers to employ men of experience to inform each of the hands that any particular act he is required to perform is dangerous. It would be ruinous to such bodies to hire a person to accompany every brakeman and other employees to inform them of danger in the performance of every duty, or of the danger in the manner of its performance. It is impossible that the law can ever impose such requirements—and that is what this instruction in substance asserts as a legal requirement."

In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Watts (1885) 63 Tex. 549, the trial judge in substance instructed the jury that, if the appellee was inexperienced as to the operation of the business upon the repair tracks, that it was then the duty of appellant to instruct him as to the rules and regulations respecting the same. This instruction the supreme court held to be incorrect, saying: "By seeking and accepting the service the appellee assumed all the risks incident to the employment. It was not the duty of appellant to instruct him respecting the rules, regulations, and usages by which the service was governed, unless asked for such information, unless the employee was known to be an inexperienced person in the business, and in its transaction subject to danger not open to his observation, known to the employer."

The same result is reached if the situation is viewed from the standpoint of the principle expressed in the maxim, Spondet peritiam artis.

By entering an employment in any capacity a man holds himself out as being competent to perform the duties of the position. McDermott the rollers. He pointed his finger at me, and told me to go back there. That was all that passed,—all he said.

Q. What is the custom of the mill about obeying orders?

A. If I had not gone there, I guess I would have had to go home.

Again:

Q. How far was the saw that cut your hand from where you were put to work?

A. I don't know exactly. I never saw the saw; never moved out of my tracks; only gave the planks a little push.

Q. Are you sure you did not follow up the planks?

A. Quite sure.

Q. When you started to put your hand out to follow it up, . . . did anybody say anything to you?

A. If they did, I did not hear it. I could not have heard a shotgun behind that edger when it was running.

Q. Anderson was just the length of the plank from you, on the same side, and working at the machine?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You did not hear him halloo at you, and warn you to let the plank alone?

A. No, sir.

Again:

Q. Mr. James, I will ask you this question: If you had been warned and instruct-

v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1896) 56 Kan. 319; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Hester (1885) 64 Tex. 401.

Hence, we find it laid down that the rule, that an employer who places a young and inexperienced person in a dangerous situation is bound to warn him of the danger, has no application to a case where an adult servant is injured in the performance of the ordinary duties which he has deliberately undertaken, owing to his own failure to make such use of his senses as is required from a person of average intelligence, when he has the option of doing something in one of two or more ways, involving various degrees of danger. Such a case is governed by the principle that, when an adult person solicits employment in a particular line of work, the act of solicitation is an assertion on his part that he is competent to discharge all the ordinary duties incident to that employment. Union P. R. Co. v. Estes (1887) 37 Kan. 715.

It follows, therefore, that the master has a right to assume that an adult employee possesses that knowledge which is acquired by common experience. Ruchinsky v. French (1897) 168 Mass. 68.

The employer may assume—unless he has knowledge to the contrary—without a critical examination, as was in effect said in Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Adams (1886) 105 Ind. 151, that a person who seeks employment in a particular capacity is possessed of sufficient ability and experience, and is of such an age as qualifies him to discharge the duties incident to the service applied for, and that he is competent to apprehend and avoid all the apparent and obvious hazards of the service, as they may appear during its progress. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Frawley (1886) 110 Ind. 18.

That the master is not bound to examine an adult applicant for a position as to his fitness or knowledge of its dangers is also laid down in O'Neal v. Chicago & I. Coal R. Co. (1892) 132 Ind. 110.

In Guinard v. Knapp-Stout & Co. Co. (1895) 90 Wis. 123, however, the court declined to hold that, because the plaintiff, some time after he was employed as an oiler, applied to be retained in that capacity, he thereby represented himself as competent for the position and assumed all the risks, the special ground assigned being that there was no evidence or finding that he was retained in his position on account of his request, or that the request had anything to do with the defendant's action in the premises.

Whether the master at the time of engaging the servant, or afterwards, ought to have inquired whether he was experienced or not, or should have taken notice, under all the facts, of the probability that he was not, nothing being said on the subject by either party, is a question for the jury. May v. Smith (1893) 92 Ga. 95.

The fact that an employee asked for no instructions, and gave no sign that he was not familiar with the method by which an order could properly be obeyed, will sometimes strengthen the inference that there was no culpability on the master's part in omitting instructions. Crown v. Orr (1893) 140 N. Y. 450.

The express statement of an employee, at the time of the contract of employment, that he is accustomed to the work, will, of course, excuse the employer from explaining to him peculiar dangers ordinarily incident to such work. Steen v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (1887) 37 Minn. 310.

Especially will this result follow where the servant deliberately made a false representation as to his familiarity with the work, in order that he might obtain employment. Stanley v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. (1894) 101 Mich. 202.

An employer has no right to an instruction to the effect that "unless the jury find that the plaintiff was a man of manifest imbecility their verdict must be for the defendant, because the defendant had a right to assume that the plaintiff would protect himself by whatever precautions were necessary." The duty of instruction exists in all cases where it is reasonably required by the youth, or inexperience, or want of capacity of the servant, and is not confined to cases where the servant is "a man of manifest imbecility." Atkins v. Merrick Thread Co. (1886) 142 Mass. 431. (The instruction here asked for was an attempted generalization from the remarks made by Judge Holmes in denying the servant the right of recovery under the special circumstances in Russell v. Tillotson (1885) 140 Mass. 201.)

The incompetency of a fellow servant is not an ordinary risk in such a sense that the servant is presumed to be cognizant of it merely by reason of the character of the employment. United States Rolling Stock Co. v. Wilder (1886) 116 Ill. 100.

c. Extraordinary risks of employment, master prima facie bound to instruct servant with regard to.

The risks which are presumed to be unknown to the servant by reason of their extraordinary or unusual character are those which arise from some act or omission on the master's part resulting in the creation of a new environment more hazardous in some respects than that which the servant has a right to expect. The novelty of the environment may be produced in three different ways: (1) The instrumentalities which the servant has been using or the ed about that machine, would you have put your hand where it could get cut off?

A. I would not; certainly not.

Another witness's testimony is as follows, viz.:

Q. Mr. Morris, were you an employee of the Rapides Lumber Company when this accident occurred?

A. I was.

Q. How long had you been working there?

A. Well, I have been working there, off and on, about four years.

Q. Do you know this trimmer at which Mr. James got hurt?

A. Yes, sir; I do.

Q. Mr. Morris, state whether you would place in which he has been working may undergo some alteration which brings into existence an additional danger. (2) New appliances may be introduced by the master. (8) The servant may be transferred to new duties or a new place of work. The cases illustrating each of these situations will now be reviewed.

1. Risks arising from a changed condition of the instrumentalities or place of work.

Compare also VII. infra.

It is "the duty of the employer to inform the employee of increased danger, created by him in the change of the machinery, unless the employee has notice, or such changes and increased danger are so apparent that he ought to take notice." Hawkins v. Johnson (1886) 105 Ind. 29, 55 Am. Rep. 169.

The master of a steamer who causes the spare-wheel, which, in its ordinary condition, rested loosely upon the drum of the steam-wheel, to be lashed so that it would necessarily rotate with the drum, thereby rendering the apparatus dangerous to anyone engaged in cleaning it, and gives no notice thereof to the seaman whose duty it was to clean the apparatus is liable for injuries received by such seaman as a result of his ignorance of the change which had been made in the conditions. Witkowsky v. Wier (1887) 32 Fed. Rep. 301.

An employer who changes a dangerous machine used by an employee in such a manner that it becomes more dangerous than it would be as ordinarily used, and demands a different operation, is liable for an injury to the employee resulting from a failure to notify him of the change made in the machine. This is not a slight change amounting to an "ordinary adaptation," such as a skilled employee (here of twenty years' experience) should anticipate. Ryan v. Chelsea Paper Mfg. Co. (1897) 69 Conn. 454.

A master who, between the time when his servant was last using an appliance, and the time when he was injured thereby, made an essential alteration in the appliance, and so rendered it more insecure, is bound to notify the servant of the change. O'Donnell v. Sargent (1897) 69 Conn. 476 (spikes removed from the feet of a ladder, the result being that it slipped on the floor when the servant climbed it).

An employer who knows, or whose duty it is to know, that an elevator which an employee is obliged to use on occasions has been undergoing repairs which are not completed, and that the elevator is out of order, and who neglects to inform the employee, who is ignorant of that fact, on a day when, with the employer's knowledge, the employee will have occasion to use the elevator, is liable to the latter for resulting inconsider that a dangerous machine at which to place an unskilled workman.

A. I consider it quite dangerous. I did not like to work there myself. I call it quite dangerous.

Q. As a sawmill man, would you consider it necessary to instruct and warn the new men that were put there?

A. I would. Yes, sir.

This question was objected to, and the answer of the witness thereto, as eliciting an opinion; and, same having been overruled, the defendant's counsel reserved a bill of exceptions thereto. In our opinion, the testimony sought to be elicited of this witness is not exclusively a matter of opinion, as it is predicated upon the facts about which he had juries. Dervin v. Herrman (1890) 26 Jones & S. 193.

It is the duty of the master not to change the place of work so as to make it more insecure, without notifying the servant of the change. Clark v. Liston (1894) 54 Ill. App. 578.

An employee engaged in shoveling coal and removing materials from a dock beneath a trestle does not assume the risk incident to the tearing down of such trestle while he is at work, where no notice is given him that it will be done; but it is the duty of the employer to notify him of the danger. Northwestern Fuel Co. v. Danielson (1893) 12 U. S. App. 688, 57 Fed. Rep. 915, 6 C. C. A. 636.

It is the duty of a railroad company to notify an engineer of the opening of a switch, or to place over it the customary warning signals, where, after it has been practically abandoned for a long time, it is reopened for use by the company. Town v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1896) 84 Mich. 214.

The liability of an employer for injuries which an inexperienced laborer entirely ignorant of the conditions receives in consequence of his being sent to work in ground where there is an unexploded charge of dynamite is governed by the principle that, where "the master provides the place for his servant to work, and, if his acts create special danger, he is not alone chargeable with the positive duty to exercise the utmost care and every available precaution against possible injury to those who are to work there; but, if danger impends, notwithstanding the precautions taken, he is further obligated to give due information and timely warning to those in his service who are ignorant of its extent before calling upon them to incur the risk." Burke v. Anderson (1895) 34 U. S. App. 132, 69 Fed. Rep. 814, 16 C. C. A. 442.

Whether a foreman was negligent in not notifying a switchman that a switch had already been turned, and that it was, therefore, unnecessary for him to cross the track to tend it, depends upon what the foreman should have foreseen the switchman would undertake to do, if he was not informed that the switch had been changed to the required position. Grant v. Union P. R. Co. (1891) 45 Fed. Rep. 673.

The fact that one switch at a station was farther from a cattle guard than another does not constitute an unusual danger against which a brakeman is entitled to a special warning when he is ordered to make a coupling. Robinson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1887) 71 Iowa, 102.

The case should be submitted to the jury, where there is evidence tending to show that been interrogated, and upon which he was requested to express his judgment. He had, in the previous question, been asked whether he considered a trimmer saw a dangerous machine; and, replying thereto without objection, he said he considered it quite dangerous. The present question is, Being by you considered a dangerous machine, "would you consider it necessary to instruct a new man" to that effect? Taken in that connection, it was a proper question.

In the further interrogation of this witness, he stated, in confirmation of the testimony of young James, that Mr. Chester, the foreman, said to him, when assigning him to duty at the trimmer, "You work over that way," pointing in the direction of the edger. He states that this was the direction which was given to young James in his presence.

On cross-examination this witness was asked the following questions, and thereto made the following replies, viz.:

Q. Well, are not those two saws on the trimmer in plain view from almost anywhere around the mill?

A. I always saw the saws. I knew where they were. I did not run into them. At the place where this man was working, this board covers the saw, and might worry a person who did not know the saw was there.

Q. Well, is not that saw in plain view of a man standing in the proper place,—there where James was put to work?

A. I do not think it is. These planks may be rather in the way. A man not knowing where to look for the saw might not no-the defendant's agents put the plaintiff in a place of peculiar danger, of which he had no knowledge or experience, without informing him of the risks, or instructing him how to avoid them. O'Connor v. Adams (1876) 120 Mass. 427.

In Ryan v. Tarbox (1883) 135 Mass. 207, the servant, while engaged in taking down an old building, was injured by the collapse of a wall which the defendant knew to be unsafe owing to a fissure in it. This being presumably a circumstance which the servant was not in a position to ascertain, the master was held liable on the ground that he had set the servant to work in a place of peculiar danger without giving him due warning.

Compare also Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. Love (1858) 10 Ind. 554, where it was said to be negligence on the part of a railroad company to allow its employee to pass over a defective bridge, the condition of which was known to the corporation and not known to the servant.

If the master finds it necessary, as he may at times, to employ and retain incompetent servants, he should either inform their employeess of that fact, or give them a reasonable opportunity to acquire knowledge of such fact, before he can screen himself from the consequences of such incompetency. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Champion (1894) 9 Ind. App. 510.

2. Risks arising from the introduction of new or abnormally dangerous appliances.

If the employer introduces, without notice to the employee, some new and unusual machinery involving an unexpected or unanticipated danger, through the introduction of which the employee, while using the care and diligence incident to his employment, meets with an accident like that in question, it is not unreasonable to hold that the employer should answer therefor in damages. O'Neil v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (1881) 9 Fed. Rep. 337.

A railroad company is not under obligation to its employees to discard the old and adopt all the new appliances that come along, because the new are less dangerous than the old, yet, where mechanical devices, such as hand brakes, are in use, and some of them have stiff and others limber staffs, differing from each other only in the size of their staffs, and the limber ones are shown to be inherently dangerous in the hands of inexperienced brakemen who do not understand how to handle them, it certainly becomes the duty of the employer to adopt and use the less dangerous kind, or, if not, to warn the inexperienced operator, placed in charge of the more dangerous, of their dangers, and thus do what is reasonable and proper to prevent 44 L. R. A.

his being injured in their use. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Binion (1894) 107 Ala. 645.

A mere difference between the couplings of foreign and domestic cars is not an extraordinary risk in regard to which a railway servant is entitled to receive a notification before he can be charged with assuming the risks of handling them. Simms v. South Carolina R. Co. (1880) 28 S. C. 490.

But the duty of enlightening the servant may, in such a case, be predicated from a special circumstance, such as the employer's knowledge of the servant's inexperience. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Price (1895) 72 Miss. 862. The court remarked: "Every servant undertakes to assume the known and obvious and ordinary risks incident to his employment, but if the employer require the servant to undertake the performance of a dangerous or extra hazardous work, demanding caution and more than usual skill, the employer must give the servant proper instruction as to the method of executing the service required, and notice of the danger to which he will be exposed, if he knows of the inexperience or ignorance of his servant in and about the service to be performed."

The duty to instruct an inexperienced servant is especially strong, where the couplings are not only materially different from those in use on the defendant's cars, but also from those which are in general use on other lines. Missouri P. R. Co. v. White (1890) 76 Tex. 102. Compare also Grannis v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. (1890) 81 Iowa, 444.

3. Risks arising from the servant's transfer to new duties.

For other cases presenting the same or analogous facts, see IV. and V. infra, especially the latter subdivision.

A duty devolves upon the master of a servant hitherto serving in the capacity of a common laborer, before such laborer is put in charge of dangerous machinery with which he is not acquainted, to instruct and qualify him for such new duty. Brennan v. Gordon (1890) 118 N. Y. 489, 8 L. R. A. 818.

If the nature and magnitude of the master's work, whether it be that of construction or otherwise, and the number of men engaged in its execution, are such that the exercise of ordinary care for the safety and protection of the workmen from unusual and unnecessary dangers requires that they be given reasonable orders, and that they be not ordered from one part of the work to another, without warning, into places of unusual danger and risks, which are not obvious to the senses and known to them, but which might be ascertained by the master tice it. But you can see the saw from where he works.

Q. The plank is high enough up to see under it?

A. He can see under it, or over it, either one. If he undertakes to look for the saw, he can see it.

The board referred to by this witness is the swinging board that is exhibited in the photographs, and is shown by the testimony to be employed as a protection to the employees against injury from the small ends of the planks which are cut off by the trimmer saws.

Q. What particular skill or experience does it require for a man to go there and do by a proper inspection, the absolute duty rests upon the master to give such reasonable orders. Considerations of justice and a sound public policy impose this duty upon the master as such which he cannot delegate so as to relieve himself from the consequences of a negligent discharge of it. Where a large number of men are employed upon the same work, it is essential that reasonable orders, regulating their conduct, and assigning to them proper places in which to work, should be given. It is the duty and the right of the master to give orders and direct the places where his servants shall work. Their duty is instant and absolute obedience, unless it be obvious to them that such obedience will expose them to unusual dangers. Dispatch, discipline, and the safety of person and property in the execution of work imperatively require that the master should order and the servant obey. It would be practically impossible to carry on a work of any magnitude on any other basis. A workman, when ordered from one part of the work to another, cannot be allowed to stop, examine, and experiment for himself, in order to ascertain if the place assigned to him is a safe one; and therefore, in obeying the order, while he assumes obvious and ordinary risks, he has a right to rely upon a faithful discharge of the master's duty to use ordinary care to warn and protect him against unusual dangers. Carlson v. Northwestern Teleph. Exch. Co. (1896) 63 Minn. 433.

A charge to the effect that a foundry superintendent when about to order an extra-hazardous piece of work to be done is under no obligation to warn workmen not then present, but whose duties may call them to the place at any moment, is rightly refused. Girard v. St. Louis Car-Wheel Co. (1891) 46 Mo. App. 79.

If the injury was received by the servant while doing work outside the scope of his employment, it becomes a material question whether he was acting under proper authority, for it is clear, upon general principle, that negligence cannot be predicated of the master's omission to instruct a servant as to work which he was neither expected nor ordered to do. Lels-tritz v. American Zylonite Co. (1891) 154 Mass. 382; Gillen v. Rowley (1890) 134 Pa. 209; Hinckley v. Horadowsky (1890) 133 Ill. 359, 8 L. R. A. 490; Stewart v. Patrick (1892) 5 Ind. App. 50.

Thus, where a master does not require his servant to repair machinery used by the latter, when out of order, but has a machinist employed to perform that duty, to whom the servant is required to report in case the machinery becomes out of order, it is not required of the master to instruct the servant as to the manner of repairing or the danger of attempting it, and 44 L. R. A.

that work,—to put the plank on the trimmer?

A. It requires a man who knows something about it. He must know something about it, or he might do like this man, and get his hand cut off.

Mr. Julius Levin, a sawmill proprietor of large experience, was also interrogated, with the following result, vis.:

Q. If you should place a green hand [at work] at the machinery, would you not consider it your duty to instruct him as to his danger and duties?

A. I would have him instructed.

Q. State whether or not you consider that position I have just mentioned—at the in case the servant does attempt it without orders, and is injured, the master is not liable. McCue v. National Starch Mfg. Co. (1894) 142 N. Y. 106.

Where the foreman told the plaintiff, who was employed to load cars, to fix up the dump car as a mill temporarily, as well as he could, this order cannot be construed into a direction to incur any danger, or to go to any part of the mill, or to saw a piece of scantling on any saw he might select. The rights of the parties must, in such a case, be determined by the rule that the master is under no duty of specially guarding dangerous machinery, or of giving special warning as to the dangers arising therefrom, as respects persons who, without authority, go into places where such machinery is in operation. Lindstrand v. Delta Lumber Co. (1887) 65 Mich. 254.

The absence of any specific order from the master does not, however, operate as a conclusive bar to the servant's action under such circumstances. He may still rely on the duty of the master to instruct him, if the employer knew that he had engaged, or was likely to engage, in the work from which his injury resulted. Lels-tritz v. American Zylonite Co. (1891) 154 Mass. 382.

The same principle applies where such knowledge is possessed by a representative of the master. Thus, in Donahoe v. Old Colony R. Co. (1891) 153 Mass. 356, the defendant contended that a conductor who left his train before the accident happened was not negligent in omitting to tell the plaintiff of a broken draw-bar, because the movements of the train and the coupling and uncoupling of cars were wholly under his direction, and a brakeman was not expected to uncouple cars without his orders. The court, however, said that, when the conductor permitted it to proceed without him, it might properly be inferred by the jury that he expected and permitted such things to be done as were necessary in the management of the train until he should rejoin it, without a specific order from himself for each particular act; and if so that it might properly be found to have been negligence on his part to omit to tell the plaintiff of the broken draw-bar.

The situation which results when the servant is ordered by the master to perform temporary service beyond and without the scope of that which he has engaged to do, is thus discussed in a recent case: "The master may not lawfully expose his servant to greater risks than those pertaining to the particular service for which he has engaged, and against which the servant, through want of skill, or by reason of tender age or physical inability, could not presumably defend himself, if unapprised of the trimmer—a dangerous position, particularly for a green hand.

A. All positions behind any saw are dangerous, if a person is not very careful.

Q. It requires a good deal of skill and activity.

A. A great deal of care and watching.

The foregoing is a fair summary of plaintiff's evidence, though there are some general statements of the defendant's witnesses which differ therefrom in minor particulars.

The testimony of Mr. Ohester, foreman of defendant's mill, is of the following tenor, via:

Q. How long had you been working at danger. He is bound to warn the servant of the danger if it be not obvious, and to instruct him how it may be avoided. If, however, the servant be of mature years, and of ordinary intelligence and experience, he is presumed to know and comprehend obvious dangers. In such case the master is not liable for injury happening to the servant in the performance of dangerous work without the scope of his engagement for service, merely because he has been directed by the master to perform such work. If the servant is possessed of knowledge and experience sufficient to comprehend the danger, and without objection undertakes the service, the master is not liable for injury received by the servant in such new and more dangerous employment. Cole v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1888) 71 Wis. 114; Paule v. Florence Min. Co. (1891) 80 Wis. 350; Dougherty v. West Superior Iron & S. Co. (1894) 88 Wis. 343; Buzzell v. Laconia Mfg. Co. (1861) 48 Me. 113, 121, 77 Am. Dec. 212. The liability upon the master in cases of injury to the servant received in a dangerous employment outside of that for which he had engaged arises, therefore, not from the direction of the master to the servant to depart from the one service and to engage in the other and more dangerous work, but from failure to give proper warning of the attendant danger in cases where the danger is not obvious, or where the servant is of immature years, or unable to comprehend the danger." Reed v. Stockmeyer (1896) 34 U. S. App. 727, 74 Fed. Rep. 186, 20 C. C. A. 381.

In Quinn v. Johnson Forge Co. (1892) 9 Houst. (Del.) 338, the jury were instructed that a master is bound to warn a servant set to work upon machinery of whose management he is ignorant, and which is not part of the work he has agreed to perform, of the dangers incident thereto.

In Whitelaw v. Memphis & C. R. Co. (1886) 16 Lea, 391, the court said with regard to the case under review: "If the plaintiff had never in fact been employed in the particular work specified in the declaration, and was ignorant of the proper tools to perform it with safety, and the work was such as only a skilled mechanic could perform without risk, it was the duty of the railroad company to see that he was properly instructed as to the danger of the work, and to furnish him with suitable tools to do the work as an experienced mechanic would do it."

A company is liable for personal injuries to an employee caused by running a heavy crane used in moving machinery against him while he was in a dangerous position under the foreman's orders, where his ordinary duties were those of helper in a boiler shop, and he had never before performed such service, and was 44 L. R. A.

this mill of the Rapides Lumber Company when this accident happened to Mr. Tony James?

A. I had not been there but a short while, probably a month or six weeks. I went to work on the 28th of July.

But he was foreman at the time of the accident. Again:

Q. When you told Mr. James to go in there,—i. e., to the trimmer machine,—and take Boone's place, did he make any objection to it?

A. He did not.

Q. Was it done suddenly, or hurriedly, or in such a way that he was obliged to?

A. I simply told him to take that posi-not warned or instructed by the foreman, and the crane was started without any signal or any lookout provided or precaution taken to warn him of its approach. Michael v. Roanoke Mach. Works (1894) 90 Va. 492.

It is not without the scope of the employment of one employed in a car shop to do general work,—such as lifting, carrying timber, painting, etc.,—to assist in lifting a car upon its trucks with a steam winch, so as to render the employer liable for injuries sustained on the ground of failure to warn him of the danger, where the like service had been rendered on other prior occasions by him and his fellows. Findlay v. Russel Wheel & F. Co. (1896) 108 Mich. 286.

A street-railway company which puts a servant to work on the spur of the moment to repair a car in a position unfamiliar to him is bound to apprise him as to the dangers of the situation. Stucke v. Orleans R. Co. (1898) 50 La. Ann. 188 (switch inadvertently left open allowed car to run against the one under repair).

So, it is negligence of the foreman of a steam sawmill to call upon one of its (here a minor nineteen-years old) employees, suddenly and on the spur of the moment, to take a position in the mill that is dangerous, without giving him any instruction or explanation whatever of the movements of the machinery, or the risk and hazard of the employment, with which the employee had neither a previous knowledge nor acquaintance. JAMES v. RAPIDES LUMBER CO. (Small trimmer saw cut off plaintiff's hand immediately after he went to work.)

Whether the raising of an immense iron smoke stack, and placing it in position on a base prepared for it, is an operation which requires such special skill or knowledge that a servant previously employed as a blacksmith, who is called upon to assist in pulling upon the rope of the hoisting apparatus, is entitled to instructions as to the dangers of the work, is a question for the jury. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Haenni (1893) 146 Ill. 614.

An employer is not ipso facto liable for injuries to an employee employed to do other work, in setting him to work upon a dangerous machine, although he does not understand the danger, where the machine is perfect in its construction and operation. National Malleable Castings Co. v. Luscomb (1895) 2 Ohio Dec. 636.

An employer is liable for injuries to a carpenter employed upon the ground from the falling of a chimney stack which was being painted, through the painter's use of a swinging scaffold, notwithstanding he warned the painter that the stack was too shaky to so paint it, where he had reason to anticipate that the painter was going tion, and he just walked in, and went at it. I went back into the file room, etc.

In conclusion we will refer to the statement of Mr. Anderson, who was the associate of young James, and saw the accident, and thus describes it, viz.: "There were two two by fours, and Mr. James and I caught hold of a piece of lumber; he caught one end, and I caught the other; and we carried it, and put it on the trimmer chains; and one of the two by fours got on top of the other two by four, and Mr. James undertook to shove one off the other, and carried his hand up onto the saw." He then stated that in making this movement young James moved just a little from his position in the effort to push the planks, and that as he did so "he hallooed as loud as he could to let it alone,—that he just screamed,—but he followed the timber until it got to the saw."

In so doing young James was attempting the performance, ignorantly, of an office which the machinery was provided to do without his aid; and this was evidently the result of his inexperience and want of information as to his duties. No particular analysis of the foregoing testimony is deemed necessary. That the employment to which young James was assigned was dangerous, we make no doubt. We think the dangerous character of the trimmer saw is made clear by the testimony, and is made apparent by the photographs. To our thinking, the mere recital—even as it is related in the defendant's answer—of the occurrence discloses a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the defendant. The proof discloses a total upon the stack with a swinging scaffold, and took no means of warning such carpenter or other employees near the stack. Olmstead v. Distilling & Cattle Feeding Co. (1895) 35 Ohio L. J. 133.

d. Fact that danger was or was not discoverable by the exercise of ordinary care, duty of instruction discussed with reference to.

See also subd. V. infra, as to the constructive knowledge of minors.

In stating the three general prerequisites to the maintenance of an action for a breach of the duty of instruction we referred to a principle which logically connotes the doctrine that a master is under no duty to instruct a servant as to the existence of ordinary perils, and which, in practice, very materially modifies the operation of the rule that a master is bound to instruct a servant as to extraordinary perils. The existence of the duty, as was then pointed out, is necessarily negated or predicated, according as the servant is or is not legally chargeable with the possession of that information which he would have acquired as a result of the instruction alleged to have been obligatory on the master.

The true scope and force of this principle will be most clearly indicated by considering it under both its aspects,—that which bars the servant's action, and that which permits him to recover.

1. No duty to instruct where knowledge imputed to the servant.

Viewed from one side, the principle appears in the form that no duty to instruct a servant can be predicated of a case in which the instruction will not add to the knowledge which under the circumstances is attributed to him. Rooney v. Sewall & D. Cordage Co. (1894) 161 Mass. 153.

"In the early cases the doctrine [as to instruction] was applied in favor of boys. In favor of adults it should be applied with great caution. Where the elements of the danger are obvious to a person of average intelligence using due care, it would be unreasonable to require an employer to warn his employee to avoid dangers which ordinary prudence ought to make him avoid without warning. The mere fact that he cannot tell the exact degree of the danger if the nature and character of it can easily be seen is not enough to require warning and instruction to a man of full age and average intelligence. Something may properly be left to the instinct of self-preservation, and to the exercise of the ordinary faculties which every man should use when his safety is known to be involved—citing Russell v. Tillotson (1885) 140 Mass. 201; Clirack v. Merchants' Woolen Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 182; Goodnow v. Walpole Emery Mills (1888) 146 Mass. 261, 267; Carey v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1893) 158 Mass. 228, 231; Connolly v. Eldredge (1894) 160 Mass. 566; Rooney v. Sewall & D. Cordage Co. (1894) 161 Mass. 153, 160; Wilson v. Steel Edge Stamping & Retinning Co. (1895) 163 Mass. 315." Stuart v. West End Street R. Co. (1895) 163 Mass. 391.

No duty to instruct can be predicated in a case where it is only by a want of ordinary care and observation that the servant could have failed to know of the true state of affairs. Campbell v. Mullen (1895) 60 Ill. App. 497.

In other words, the employer is under no legal obligation to warn a servant of dangers which "any man of ordinary intelligence in the exercise of ordinary care . . . could not have failed to see and comprehend." Johnson v. Ashland Water Co. (1890) 77 Wis. 51.

Or, as the doctrine may also be put, the duty resting on the master to instruct or warn the servant as to the risks of his employment "does not extend to dangers open to ordinary observation, except in cases of youth, inexperience, ignorance, or want of capacity of the servant." Collins v. Laconia Car Co. (1895, N. H.) 38 Atl. 1047.

For this reason a charge is erroneous which in effect declares that, given an uninstructed, inexperienced employee, not comprehending the danger, but using ordinary care, and an injury to such an employee caused by that danger, a recovery must follow; for, under such an instruction, the employee would be able to recover even though the danger was one which he ought to have appreciated. Craven v. Smith (1894) 89 Wis. 119.

So, a charge which leaves to the jury to say whether, as a matter of fact, the plaintiff knew what, according to his own testimony he did know, and whether he could appreciate a danger which he was just as much bound to appreciate as the defendant was,—here the liability of a stool to slip on a greasy floor,—and thus impliedly authorizes a finding that the defendant was guilty of an omission of duty in failing to warn the plaintiff as to the danger, is erroneous and a ground for ordering a new trial, even though the court may also have charged the jury that it was unnecessary to instruct the plaintiff if he knew the conditions and the danger which was likely to result therefrom. Koehler v. Syracuse Specialty Mfg. Co. (1896) 12 App. Div. 50.

This principle is applicable, even where the obligation to instruct would otherwise arise, as want of knowledge on the part of young James of the situation, and of the duties he was expected to perform, and of which he was vouchsafed not a word of information or instruction by the defendant's foreman. Suddenly called upon by the company's foreman to undertake the performance of a delicate and important duty, in a sawmill, in full operation, and supply the place of a sick man who had been engaged thereat for about two years, without warning or precaution, young James was unwittingly cast into the teeth of a small saw, which cut his left hand off within twenty seconds after he had assumed its performance. Plaintiff's counsel graphically describes the situation thus: "Into this trap of flying wheels, machinery, belts, and whistling saws, noise, dust, plank, and rollers, Chester thrust, without a moment's warning, advice, instruction, or preparation, a boy, a minor, who knew nothing of its dangers." It is quite out of the question for us to affirm, under these circumstances, that young James had assumed the responsibility of the dangers of the position to which he had been assigned. In our opinion his right to recover damages of the defendant is very clear, under the provisions of the Code (Rev. Civ. Code, arts. 2315, 2317, 2320), and likewise under the construction of the general law applicable to master and servant which is given in the decisions cited in Stucke v. Orleans R. Co. 50 La. Ann. 188, emitting those appertaining to fellow servants as not pertinent to the issue. Under all the authorities, it is the recognized and bounden duty of the master to provide a reasonably safe place at which his servant is where there is an increase in the risks of the employment. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack (1892) 143 Ill. 242, 18 L. R. A. 215; Hawkins v. Johnson (1886) 105 Ind. 20, 55 Am. Rep. 169.

So, it has been said that the rule which makes it the duty of a master not to expose a servant to any abnormal perils without warning is subject to the qualification that, "if the risk and danger to which the service required to be performed exposes the servant are plainly apparent, both the instrumentality to be employed by the servant in performing the required service and the danger to be encountered in the use of the instrumentality being obvious, so as that there shall cease to be necessity for instruction or warning, the employer may remain silent, and leave the servant to avoid clearly seen danger by the reasonable use of his own faculties." Illinois C. R. Co. v. Price (1895) 72 Miss. 862.

The omission of an employer to notify a servant of the removal of some tackling supporting the rafters of a building, on which he was working, the result being that the building fell, is not in itself negligence, as he must be held to have known what was clearly visible to his sight. The true question for the jury, under such circumstances, is whether the employer acted with reasonable prudence in compliance with the rule which requires him to provide for the safety of his servants to the best of his judgment. Sykes v. Packer (1882) 99 Pa. 465.

The following cases will furnish sufficient illustrations of the various words and phrases used in describing dangers of this class, all of them being clearly expressive of the idea that the failure of the servant to observe them indicates a want of due care:

Dangers which the servant "can at a glance observe for himself." Simms v. South Carolina R. Co. (1886) 26 S. C. 490.

Elements of the danger so obvious to a careful person of average intelligence that ordinary prudence should make him avoid them without warning. Bjbjian v. Woonsocket Rubber Co. (1893) 164 Mass. 214.

Danger "so simple that it can as well be ascertained at a single view as at many." Hathaway v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1883) 51 Mich. 253, 47 Am. Rep. 569.

Dangers which the servant "may see and guard against as well as could the master himself, if present, or anyone else" deputed by him. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Strycharski (1894) 6 Tex. Civ. App. 555.

"Obvious" dangers. Connors v. Morton (1894) 160 Mass. 333; Cirlack v. Merchants' Woolen Co. (1890) 151 Mass. 152, 6 L. R. A. 733; Hoyle v. Excelsior Steam Laundry Co. 44 L. R. A.

(1894) 95 Ga. 34; Gibson v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. (1893) 23 Or. 493; Bohn v. Havemeyer (1889) 114 N. Y. 296; Brady v. Ludlow Mfg. Co. (1891) 154 Mass. 468; Rooney v. Sewall & D. Cordage Co. (1894) 161 Mass. 153; Costello v. Judson (1880) 21 Hun, 396; Mississippi River Logging Co. v. Schneider (1896) 34 U. S. App. 743, 74 Fed. Rep. 195, 20 C. C. A. 390.

Dangers "obvious even to a casual observer." Findlay v. Russel Wheel & Foundry Co. (1896) 108 Mich. 286.

Dangers "obvious to anyone of ordinary capacity." Connolly v. Eldredge (1894) 160 Mass. 566.

Dangers "so open and obvious that by the exercise of care he [the servant] would know of them." Yeager v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (1894) 93 Iowa, 1.

Dangers "open and apparent to casual observers." Hogele v. Wilson (1892) 5 Wash. 160.

Dangers "open and obvious to the senses." Railsback v. Wayne County Turnp. Co. (1894) 10 Ind. App. 622.

Dangers "plain and open to observation." Dougherty v. West Superior Iron & S. Co. (1894) 88 Wis. 343.

Dangers "open to the ordinary observation of any person using reasonable care and prudence." East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Turville (1892-93) 97 Ala. 122.

"Apparent" dangers. Wolter v. Harrison Wire Co. (1883) 14 Mo. App. 592; Campbell v. Mullen (1895) 60 Ill. App. 497.

Dangers "apparent to ordinary observation." Kean v. Detroit Copper & Brass Rolling Mills (1887) 66 Mich. 277.

Dangers "apparent on mere casual observation." Vilas v. Vanderbilt (1897) 20 Misc. 51.

Dangers "apparent to the servant and within his comprehension." Bohn v. Havemeyer (1887) 46 Hun, 557, Affirmed in (1889) 114 N. Y. 296.

Dangers "apparent from brief observation and experience." De Souza v. Stafford Mills (1892) 155 Mass. 476.

The master is not required, in order to relieve himself of liability, to show that the attention of the servant was called to the special risk from which an injury resulted, if the general dangers of the situation were apparent. Goodridge v. Washington Mills Co. (1893) 160 Mass. 234.

Thus, where employees of a railroad company know that the road runs through pasture land, and that the road is not fenced, it is not the duty of the company to notify them at what particular place cattle may be expected to be to work, and to see to it that he is not exposed to unnecessary risks in the course of his employment. And in order that a dangerous service be intelligently undertaken by his servant, it is the duty of the master sufficiently to acquaint him with its risks and dangers, and give him a fair knowledge of the situation at the time of his employment. Failing in either of the foregoing particulars, the master will be held liable for whatever injury results to the servant. Cooley, Torts, § 550; Ryan v. Fowler, 24 N. Y. 410, 82 Am. Dec. 315; Perry v. Marsh, 25 Ala. 659; Horner v. Nicholson, 56 Mo. 220; Wheeler v. Wason Mfg. Co. 135 Mass. 294; Nason v. West, 78 Me. 253. In Smith v. Sellers, 40 La. Ann. 527, this court said that the servant "assumes the risk only of such hazards as are apparently incidental to an employment intelligently undertaken." In Erslew v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. 49 La. Ann. 86, we held that if an employee of a steam-railway company knew or ought reasonably to have known the precise danger to him of the guy wire of the electric street-car company in the course of his employment, and saw fit, notwithstanding, to continue in it, he might be held to have assumed the extraordinary risks, as well as the ordinary risks, of his service. But this consequence must rest upon positive knowledge, or reasonable means of positive knowledge, of the precise danger assumed. Meyers v. Illinois C. R. Co. 49 La. Ann. 21; Myhan v. Louisiana Electric Light & P. Co. 41 La. Ann. 964, 7 L. R. A. 172; Buswell, Personal Injuries, §§ 202, 203; Faren v. Sellers, 39 La. Ann. 1011; Helm v. O'Rourke, encountered. Patton v. Central Iowa R. Co. (1887) 73 Iowa, 306.

Compare also the two last cases cited in IV. b, infra.

2. Cases illustrating this general rule.

When the dangerous character of machinery is in plain sight, an employee working near it must ordinarily take notice of the perils to which it subjects him, and no duty rests on the employer to point this out. Murphy v. American Rubber Co. (1893) 159 Mass. 266 (case of unboxed machinery which the plaintiff had to pass). S. P. Collins v. Laconia Car Co. (1895, N. H.) 38 Atl. 1047 (uncovered gearing).

An employer is not bound to instruct an experienced employee of mature years as to the danger of being caught by a set-screw in a revolving shaft, visible when the shaft is at rest, but not when it is in motion. Rooney v. Sewall & D. Cordage Co. (1894) 161 Mass. 153; Keats v. National Heeling Mach. Co. (1895) 21 U. S. App. 656, 65 Fed. Rep. 940, 13 C. C. A. 221; Goodnow v. Walpole Emery Mills (1888) 146 Mass. 261.

A master is not bound to warn a man of twenty-seven years that, if he attempts to reach over an uncovered gearing to grasp a lever, without looking where his hand is going, he may be injured. Wilson v. Massachusetts Cotton Mills (1897) 169 Mass. 67.

A master cannot be held liable for a failure to instruct a youth of nineteen years as to such an obvious danger as that of having his hand injured by striking against a hook near to one upon which he is hanging hot tongues in the cooling room of a packing house. Ryan v. Armour (1897) 166 Ill. 568, Affirming (1896) 67 Ill. App. 102.

An experienced machinist who is manipulating a drill operated by an uncovered gearing is not entitled to a warning as to the obvious danger that his hand may be injured by being caught in it. Foley v. Pettie Mach. Works (1889) 149 Mass. 294, 4 L. R. A. 51.

In Russell v. Tillotson (1885) 140 Mass. 201, the plaintiff sought to recover for damage to his person, caused by his apron and jacket catching on a revolving shaft, while he was standing on a ladder and replacing a board upon a belt box into which the shaft ran at right angles. The shaft was plainly visible, and was seen by the plaintiff. If the ladder had been placed on the opposite side of the box, there would have been no danger. He testified that the ladder was standing where he mounted it at the time when he was ordered by the "boss" to go up and nail the board on, and that, al- 44 L. R. A.

though he had worked in mills for a long time, and was acting within the scope of the duties which he had undertaken, he did not know any better way to do the work than that which he took. Upon the evidence a verdict for the defendant was directed, and the plaintiff excepted, contending that he was sent into a concealed danger without due warning or instruction. Holmes, J., said: "The exception must be overruled. The plaintiff does not pretend that he was ignorant of the danger of a revolving shaft, nor that the order to him carried any prohibition to put the ladder in such position as he might deem best, nor that there was anything in the form of it to hurry him or disturb his judgment; but simply that he had not sufficient intelligence—for that is what it comes to—to see that he was less likely to come in contact with the shaft if he had the barrier of the belt box between him and the shaft; or, if he took a worse place, to keep away from the danger which he knew. As it is not suggested that he was a man of manifest imbecility, we think that the foreman was entitled to assume that the plaintiff would protect himself by whatever precautions were necessary."

An adult employee, though inexperienced in the work of a sawmill, is not entitled to any special warning that an accumulation of sawdust and refuse matter on the floor will render his footing insecure, and that if he should stumble, he might come into contact with any unguarded saws there might be in the vicinity, and so be injured. Hazen v. West Superior Lumber Co. (1895) 91 Wis. 208.

There is no obligation to instruct an employee in a sawmill that a board lying on the dead rollers may be shoved forward and to one side by another board coming from the live rollers, and that if it is thus brought in contact with a revolving circular saw close by it may be thrown off the saw, and injure anyone who may be operating it. Mississippi River Logging Co. v. Schneider (1896) 34 U. S. App. 743, 74 Fed. Rep. 195, 20 C. C. A. 390.

That the danger incident to the operation of a buzz saw is deemed to be at once apparent on mere casual observation, and therefore one as to which no instruction need be given, see also Vilas v. Vanderbilt (1897) 20 Misc. 51.

A master is not bound to instruct a servant as to the danger of having his hand caught while he is manipulating machinery with moving rollers which nearly touch each other. Kean v. Detroit Copper & Brass Rolling Mills (1887) 66 Mich. 277 (injury received while servant was cleaning machine); Connolly v. Eldredge (1894) 160 Mass. 566 (injury received while employee was assisting in putting a new

46 La. Ann. 178. See Buswell, Personal Injuries, p. 338. And we take the following extract from Ciriack v. Merchant's Woolen Co. 146 Mass. 182, viz.: "The duty of the defendant would be sufficiently discharged by pointing out to the plaintiff the situation of the machine, and the rapid revolution of the wheels when in operation, and explaining the probable effect of touching them under these circumstances." This statement of the law we accept as perfectly accurate; but, when it is applied to this case, it is made evident that the defendant's foreman was greatly in fault, in that he gave young James no explanation or instructions of any kind. Indeed, the foreman had, necessarily, an imperfect knowledge of the situation, as he had been in charge of defendant's mill covering cloth on the upper roller of an ironing machine).

A fortiori, there can be no recovery for an injury received in handling such machinery where the servant is familiar with the use of machinery. Richstain v. Washington Mills Co. (1803) 157 Mass. 538.

A master is not negligent in failing to instruct a female employee thirty years of age, as to the danger of getting her hands caught in cog-wheels on the machine at which she is put at work, where such wheels are in plain sight and the danger therefrom is obvious. Ruchinsky v. French (1897) 168 Mass. 68.

It is not negligence for a master not to warn an employee of the danger that a hand kept upon a rope which is running through a sheave will be drawn into the sheave. Findlay v. Russell Wheel & Foundry Co. (1896) 108 Mich. 286.

The danger of cleaning machinery in motion is apparent to anyone, and even a common laborer who undertakes to do this, when he knows how to stop the machinery and thus avoid the risk, cannot recover for injuries which he receives while thus employed, on the ground that it was the duty of the employer to instruct and warn him. Stoll v. Hoopes (1888) 22 W. N. C. 159.

The failure to warn an adult employee whose duty it is to clean a revolving cylinder that, if a part of the cloth which she wrapped around her hand during the process was allowed to hang down it was likely to be taken up by the cylinder and draw her hand into the machine, is not negligence. Hoyle v. Excelsior Steam Laundry Co. (1894) 95 Ga. 34.

The danger of having a coat sleeve caught in gear wheels while cleaning a commutator close to them is one which a motorman is presumed to be able to appreciate without special instruction. Burnell v. West Side R. Co. (1894) 87 Wis. 387.

The risk of having the hand caught by revolving knives in a planing machine is a patent danger of which the master is not bound to notify the servant. Arkadelphia Lumber Co. v. Bethea (1892) 57 Ark. 76.

It is for the jury to say whether a man who, before hiring himself to the defendant, had worked for about a year in the picker room of a cotton mill, but who testifies that he knew nothing of the internal construction of a picker should have been instructed as to the risk of removing clogs of cotton from the machine while the beater was in motion,—especially where it is also in evidence that the picker boss had, in his presence, removed clogs without stopping the machinery, and had thus set an example which it might have been dangerous 44 L. R. A.

only for a few weeks at the time of the accident.

With regard to the plaintiff's demand for insurance money, but little need be said. The demand is made of the defendant as a negotiorum gestor, and not on a claim arising ex contractu, against the insurance company, as being liable for a loss sustained on its policy. We do not think that his demand against the company is well founded, as he avers that it has not yet recovered from the insurance company; and the plaintiff could not, in any event, recover from the insurance company, because his name does not appear as a beneficiary in either one of the policies which were written in favor of the defendant, exclusively. That the defendant had made exactions of young James for the plaintiff to follow. De Costa v. Hargraves Mills (1898) 170 Mass. 375.

An employer is not bound to instruct a servant as to such an obvious danger as that an iron gate which he has swung back to reach a gearing may shut to and throw him against the gearing, where it is plain that the gate is liable to be set in motion if touched by his person. Brady v. Ludlow Mfg. Co. (1891) 154 Mass. 468.

An employee injured by the sudden dropping of an elevator while he was engaged in placing heavy granite sills upon it cannot recover if the danger was as obvious to him as to his employer and the other employees. Connors v. Morton (1894) 160 Mass. 333.

Upon the ground that, provided the danger is obvious, instruction is not obligatory merely because the work is new to the servant, it has been held that an action for breach of the duty of instruction cannot be maintained where the complaint merely shows that the servant was injured owing to the sudden jumping of a plank which threw his hand against a rip-saw, although it also is stated that he had never before used such a saw; that his only experience in such work had been with a circular saw which he had used for half a day; and that he had not done any carpentering at all until about three weeks before the accident. Gaertner v. Schmitt (1897) 21 App. Div. 403.

In Reinig v. Broadway R. Co. (1888) 49 Hun, 289, the court said that there was no decision which required that a master who directs his servant to clean off the snow from a roof should notify him of the existence of a skylight in another roof suddenly covered by a heavy fall of snow. (The evidence went to show that the servant, when he had reached the bottom of the ladder by which he had reached the roof to which he was sent, jumped off on one side to avoid a snow drift and so alighted on the skylight through which he fell. It is not apparent from the report what the court regarded as the controlling feature in the case. For a contrary ruling upon a somewhat similar set of facts, see Kaffery v. Central Park, N. & E. R. R. Co. (1895) 14 Misc. 560, cited in III. d. 8, infra.)

A man of mature age and ordinary intelligence who applies for and obtains a position as brakeman cannot recover for an injury caused by the crushing of his arm between the deadwoods on the trolley that he had no experience, and that it was the duty of the company to instruct him before sending him to couple and uncouple cars. The danger of such an injury is apparent without any special skill or training. Dysinger v. Cincinnati, S. & M. R. Co. (1892) 93 Mich. 646.

monthly, from his wages, in order to keep up the premiums, cannot have the effect of establishing in his favor a beneficial interest in the insurance policy. The contrary doctrine was maintained by this court in Putnam v. New York L. Ins. Co. 42 La. Ann. 740. We are of the opinion that so much of the plaintiff's demand as relates to the insurance must be rejected and disallowed, and the amount of the demand for damages be reduced to $3,000.

It is therefore ordered and decreed that the judgment appealed from be so amended as to reject and disallow the plaintiff's demand for $1,000 insurance, and, thus reduced to $3,000, same be affirmed, with costs of appeal to be taxed against the plaintiff and appellee, with the reservation of whatever rights he may have against the defendant upon a quantum meruit for an interest in the insurance money when same has been collected.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Breaux, J., on April 18, 1898, handed down the following response:

Three witnesses for the plaintiff, men of experience in the management of sawmill machinery, stated that there was danger if one without experience or instruction of any sort undertook to work as a hand at the machine known as the trimmer: that it is unsafe to place one at that work who is a green hand without warning or instruction; that the danger should have been explained to him; that it was an act of imprudence to call the plaintiff who had been engaged elsewhere in the mill, and at once give him in

There is no obligation to warn even an inexperienced brakeman that the dangers incident to coupling cars with double buffers are greater than those incident to the coupling of cars with single deadwoods of the common type. The difference between the character of the two styles of couplings is manifest to ordinary observation, and of itself invites the exercise of greater care in handling the double buffers. Boland v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1894) 106 Ala. 641 (1892-93) 96 Ala. 626, 18 L. R. A. 260.

This rule holds even where the plaintiff is a brakeman temporarily employed in the absence of the regular brakeman. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Turvaville (1892-93) 97 Ala. 122.

In a leading case upon this particular peril (Michigan C. R. Co. v. Smithson (1881) 45 Mich. 212), the court thus discussed the liability of the railroad company: "We have had produced for our inspection, on the argument, a model of the double deadwoods which caused the injury, and it seems impossible to give to the coupler any better or more effectual notification of their presence, and of the difference from those belonging to the defendants than their very form necessarily gives of itself. The difference is very marked and striking, and it is quite impossible to couple the double deadwoods, or to approach them for the purpose with any degree of attention, without observing it. This is so whether the coupling is done in the day-time or in the night-time; for in the night every switchman has his lantern with him, or should have it on all occasions. If, therefore, a switchman were to declare that he had attempted to couple the double deadwoods without noticing how they differed from the cars of defendant, the conclusion would be inevitable that he had gone heedlessly in the performance of a duty requiring great care, and that he had not allowed his eyes to inform him what was before him. Moreover, the business of the road was of itself a notification that many differences requiring attention in coupling were to be encountered by the switchmen and brakemen. The Michigan Central is a great common way for the cars of all the railroad companies of the country, and every man in the employ of the defendant, if he has ordinary intelligence, is perfectly cognizant of the fact. He knows, too, that the cars of the several railroad and transportation companies differ, and that at one time or another all these differences may appear in the cars he may be called upon to couple or uncouple. Every train is likely to have several kinds, and he cannot assume, as he passes from one to another, that the two will be alike, 44 L. R. A.

much less that the whole train will be. To notify him specially of the differences would not only be troublesome and expensive, and oftentimes, as above explained, confusing, but it would be a work of supererogation, for any man capable intelligently of performing the duty would be no wiser after the notice than before; and a man who would not heed the information the very nature and course of the business would impart to him, would be protected by no notice. The best notice is that which a man must of necessity see and which cannot confuse or mislead him; he needs no printed placard to announce a precipice when he stands before it."

The danger of placing the hand upon the deadwood of one car at the very place where it had been previously struck twice by the buffer of another car which the servant had unsuccessfully attempted to couple to it is not an extraordinary or concealed danger which it is requisite to point out specially to a person of mature years and ordinary intelligence. Wormell v. Maine C. R. Co. (1887) 79 Me. 397.

Where the difference between the couplings of two cars is such that a coupler, if competent for his business, can see at a glance that, if he attempts to make the coupling while standing between the cars, he will be crushed to death, the trial judge is entitled to say, as a matter of law, that the company was not guilty of a breach of duty in failing to notify the servant of the existence of a peculiar danger. Slims v. South Carolina R. Co. (1886) 26 S. C. 490.

Where it is alleged on the one hand, and admitted on the other, that the employee was inexperienced and ignorant in respect to the difference in the construction of deadwoods, and of the hazard of coupling cars equipped with double deadwoods, that the fact of his want of knowledge and inexperience was, or by the exercise of care might have been, known by the railway company, and that the defendant nevertheless, without instructing or warning him of the hazard, required him to make such coupling, and while so engaged the plaintiff was, as is alleged, injured without fault on his part, the facts present a case on which an issue may be made for trial. The gravamen of such a case is the omission of duty on the part of the employer in failing to instruct an inexperienced servant, who, although he may see the danger, may nevertheless be utterly ignorant of the risk, or of the manner of performing the service, so as to avoid injury therefrom. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Frawley (1886) 110 Ind. 18, the court remarking that whatever application the case of Atlas Engine Works v. Randall (1885) 100 Ind. 293, 50 Am. Rep. 798, may have to the evidence in this case, it was not controlling charge the work necessary to be done at the end of the trimmer in transferring the lumber from the edger to the trimmer. On the other hand, three witnesses for the defendant testified that the work was not as hazardous as represented; that men without experience and warning sometimes were placed to work at trimmers. The jury and the trial judge, who saw and heard the witnesses, believed the former. Great weight, it is clear, should be given to their finding as relates to the facts of the case. It does seem that the act of the plaintiff in putting his hands on two pieces of timber, 2x4 (crossed one over the other), as they were about to pass the trimmer saws, was an act of the greatest imprudence; that one with the least experience or warning would not have thus exposed himself. The plaintiff, it appears, was not deficient in intelligence. Had he been made aware of the danger, it would be proper to hold that he had assumed the risk of the dangerous employment. It must have been evident to the jury he had not had sufficient opportunity to become familiar with his duties; nor had he been, it appears, sufficiently instructed. It was not, the jury found, an ordinary danger. It was not, their verdict implies, a danger known to the employee, and one which he, without warning, should have appreciated. The defendant in the brief asserts, in opposition to the position that the plaintiff should have been warned and instructed before placing him at the trimmer, that the only instruction which could have been given him would have been not to put his hand on the saw, and that this would have added nothing to his knowl-as to the facts stated in the complaint under consideration.

It is not negligence for a foreman to order an employee to paint a machine without informing him that others are also at work upon it, where, by the exercise of reasonable care, he can himself see that other workmen are so engaged. Williams v. Hensler (1890) 38 Ill. App. 584.

It is not the duty of an electric street-railway company to notify a conductor, upon his entering the service, of the danger of getting caught in a place 3¼ inches wide, between a trail car and a doorway in the power-house, through which the car must be pushed to attach it to the dummy. Jennings v. Tacoma R. & Motor Co. (1893) 7 Wash. 275.

The danger that a trackwalker may be caught by a train on a trestle, and the readiest way of reaching a place of safety, viz., by getting on one of the bent caps at either side of the track, are both obvious, and he cannot hold the railroad company liable for a failure to instruct him as to this method of securing himself. Gibson v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. (1893) 23 Or. 493.

3. Master bound to instruct, where no knowledge of the danger can be imputed to the servant.

Viewed from the opposite standpoint, the principle we are discussing appears in the form that it is the master's duty "to give [a servant] notice . . . [of] latent defects or hazards incident to an occupation, of which the master knows or ought to know, and which the servant, from ignorance or inexperience, is not capable of understanding and appreciating." Consolidated Coal Co. v. Haenni (1893) 146 Ill. 614, affirming (1891) 48 Ill. App. 115.

What dangers are considered "latent" in the sense implied by the rule is indicated by the following decisions:

A mine owner is liable, where he sends a servant into a shaft, knowing that there is a fissure which renders it probable that the roof will fall. Strahlendorf v. Rosenthal (1872) 30 Wis. 674.

It is negligence in a mining company to fail to inform its employee of any danger from an unexploded blast in the vicinity of which such employee is working, of which the company or its foreman knows, or by the use of reasonable diligence ought to know. Kelley v. Cable Co. (1887) 7 Mont. 70.

It is the duty of an employer before using a highly dangerous explosive to ascertain and make known to his employees the dangers to be reasonably apprehended from its use; and his ignorance is no excuse if knowledge can be obtained by the exercise of reasonable diligence. Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin (1895) 93 Va. 791.

A mechanic employed by, and in the presence of, the inventor of a new machine to move it, who is injured in the hand by the fall of part of the machine owing to its imperfect construction, may recover damages from the inventor, if he did not know or have reason to know that it was dangerous to place his hand as he did. In order to move the machine as directed, and if the inventor knew or ought to have known it, and gave him no warning. Walsh v. Peet Valve Co. (1872) 110 Mass. 23.

A request for a charge to the effect that the perils of the work were obvious, and that the master was therefore under no obligation to instruct the servant, should not be granted, where the servant's duty was to dig under a bank which was not expected to fall by the action of gravitation, and which had, up to the time of the accident, been taken down by prying over the top when an excavation of a sufficient depth had been made at the bottom. Lynch v. Allyn (1893) 160 Mass. 248, distinguishing the cases where a man is set to work to undermine a bank which is expected to fall by the force of gravitation, and he is required to look out for himself.

In any jurisdiction in which the maintenance of a low overhead bridge is regarded as negligence on the part of the railroad company, it is necessarily liable for injuries which trainmen may receive therefrom, unless it warns them of the danger, or they ascertain from some other source, that it exists. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wright (1888) 115 Ind. 378.

A nonsuit is rightly refused where there is evidence that the defendant ordered the plaintiff, a brakeman, to do work which required him to be on the top of freight cars, without warning him that they passed under bridges too low to admit of his standing erect with safety, he being entirely ignorant of the danger. Altee v. South Carolina R. Co. (1884) 21 S. C. 550, note to 53 Am. Rep. 699.

The section of the Alabama Code of 1886 (1144), which requires railroad companies to blow the whistle or ring the bell before coming to and while passing a public crossing, is intended to secure protection for persons crossing on the track itself, and has no application to the case of employees on the top of cars which are passing under a low overhead bridge. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hall (1888) 87 Ala. 708, 4 L. R. A. 710.

Where the plaintiff attempts to mount a moving car by putting his foot on the jaw-strap, and is injured in consequence of the absence of the jaw-strap, which the evidence tends to show has been gone for some time, it is for the jury edge. This contention, as stated by defendant, as relating to visible danger, is supported by several well-considered decisions of courts of other states. From the point of view just stated they recommend themselves as eminently just and correct. But the jury here, substantially, found a different state of facts. They must have concluded, in order to arrive at their verdict, that the instruction which could have been given him would have been given had it not escaped attention; that is, the instruction not to put his hands on the pieces of lumber after having placed them on the trimmer, and particularly after they were being carried on the endless chains to the saws. We have no hesitation in saying, if the facts were as the verdict implies, the judgment was correct and legal. The evidence before us did not disclose that the facts were not as found by the jury. There is no good reason to infer that the foreman of the mill did not have a proper knowledge of the situation, and that he was not, in every respect, a well-qualified and competent foreman. But the ability of the foreman is not of itself ground to discredit the return of the jury. Under the most careful and experienced foreman an accident may happen for which the employer must be held in damages. It may be stated, also, as related to the lumber mill, that the situation was not more grave and dangerous than it is in all factories in which there are many fast revolving circular saws with white steel surface a few inches above the horizontal line of their shafts. It is not negligence to own and operate such machinery. The demands of commerce require ef-to say whether the company is liable on the ground that the plaintiff was ordered into a place where there was a concealed danger known to the company, and not known to the plaintiff by a warning or otherwise. Coates v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1891) 153 Mass. 297, 10 L. R. A. 769.

An employer is liable for an injury to an employee caused by his falling through a flooring formed partly of glass and partly of wood, the whole of which was covered by dust and the nature thereof unknown to him, upon which he was directed to go without warning by the employer's foreman. Here there was apparent safety, but actual danger. Rafferty v. Central Park, N. & E. R. Co. (1895) 14 Misc. 560. (See, however, Reinlg v. Broadway R. Co. (1888) 49 Hun, 269, cited in III. d. 2, supra.)

So, an employer who knows the danger to an employee from stepping upon a rotten canvas covering a hole in a third-story floor is required to notify the employee of such danger, where he is ignorant thereof. Muncie Pulp Co. v. Jones (1894) 11 Ind. App. 110.

In Paulmier v. Erie R. Co. (1870) 34 N. J. L. 151, the court, in upholding a verdict finding the defendant liable on the ground that the structure in question subjected its servants to unnecessary danger, and that no means had been taken to warn the plaintiff, said: "Stripped of all verbal disguises, the argument is this: That by their arrangements they required their employees almost hourly to run their engines to the brink of danger, and that their orders were to stop there. The roadbed over the water was supported by wood-work, which the defendants admit was dangerous to a locomotive, and what they required was, that the locomotive should be stopped on the fast land. As occasion called for it, in pushing the loaded cars out over the water, the engines were brought necessarily to this line between the water and land. Here was a danger constantly recurring—just as imminent as though the requirement had been to run these engines up to the edge of a precipice. And, to make the matter worse, the danger in this case was entirely latent, for there was nothing to indicate that this part of the road extending beyond the land would not support a locomotive. It is obvious that it required the constant exercise of skill and vigilance to avoid this unnecessary risk, and yet it is not pretended that there was any notification to the engineers and other employees of the insecurity of this part of the roadbed. All that is claimed is, that from time to time the engineers were told not to run their engines beyond the edge of the fast land. These orders were merely verbal, and pro- 44 L. R. A.

ceeded from the yard-master, who appears himself to have been ignorant of the greatness of the danger. It is manifest from the evidence on both sides that adequate means to inform the parties in charge of these locomotives of the peril at hand were not used, for several of the engineers themselves testify that occasionally they put their engines upon this insecure structure. Some of them said that they were not aware of its insecurity. These circumstances seem to me to constitute a legal default in the defendants. To require their servants, in the ordinary routine of daily duty, to run these engines up to the margin of this covert danger, was subjecting them to an unnecessary hazard. This, of itself, would be sufficient to sustain the action. So, likewise, I think the omission to use any means of making the danger known to those who were to incur it, would have a like effect. On either of these grounds the jury could rightly rest their verdict."

An employee who is ordered to dig a trench so as to shift a telegraph pole, without being notified that props are necessary to hold it in an upright position, and that another employee has been sent to fetch them, may recover for an injury caused by the fall of the pole. East St. Louis Connecting R. Co. v. Enright (1893) 47 Ill. App. 494.

A railroad company is negligent in attempting to use upon its road a car from another road, the drawbar of which differs so much in height from those on its own cars that it will slide past them and permit the cars to come so close together as to endanger the lives of its employees whose duty it is to couple such cars, without notifying them of its condition. Such a danger is not one of which a servant busily engaged in coupling can be required to take notice. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Wangelin (1892) 43 Ill. App. 324.

Carriages running along an overhead wire for the conveyance of parcels in a store, and so adjusted that when pushed backwards they are likely to leave the wire and fall, constitute a dangerous appliance under certain conditions, and the storekeeper is bound to inform the employees of this peculiarity, when he furnishes them with poles to push the carriages. Stock v. Le Boutillier (1897) 19 Misc. 112. Affirmed (1896) 18 Misc. 349. The hypothesis underlying the decision apparently was that the danger was not apparent, and that the act which would create that danger was likely to be done for the purpose of loosening the carriages when they happened to stick at some point on the wire. But the precise theory of the court is not altogether clear from its opinion.

The danger caused by the fact that the fective, improved machinery. In the case here, it was not defective, and not unavoidably dangerous. The fact remains that it was not properly handled, due, as the jury thought, to the want of notice and instruction which should have been given to an inexperienced hand. Under our jurisprudence, until it clearly appears that such a finding is erroneous, we are constrained to accept the conclusion as correct.

Lastly, our decision held that claim for insurance cannot be recovered in this case. Defendant asserts that reservation in the decree invites new and troublesome litigation. In order to put that matter at rest,

"beater" of a machine known as a picker continued to revolve by its own momentum for two or three minutes after all the rest of the machine had come to a standstill is a latent danger of which a servant ordered to clean the machine should be notified. Hightower v. Bamberg Cotton Mills (1896) 48 S. C. 190.

A verdict finding the employer guilty of negligence in not instructing a servant as to the dangers of holding red-hot rivets while they are being hammered into boilers will be upheld where the evidence tends to show that he was ignorant of the dangers of the work. Mannion v. Hagan (1896) 9 App. Div. 98.

A case which may usefully be contrasted with those cited in the last section to illustrate the circumstances under which the servant is chargeable with a comprehension of the risks caused by moving machinery is Hanson v. Ludlow Mfg. Co. (1894) 162 Mass. 187, the special point of which will be apparent from the following passage of the opinion: "The general danger of contact with a circular saw in operation is of course obvious. But the particular danger by which the plaintiff was hurt is not one which is apparent. The saw teeth move with such velocity that they are indistinguishable. Objects which come in contact with the front of the saw in its ordinary use are not thrown upward but by its action are held in contact with the table. The fact that objects which touch the opposite side of the saw will be affected in a different manner, and one attended with danger, although easily understood from explanation and readily learned by experience, is not of itself plain and obvious, but is one of those obscure dangers of which an employer should give warning if he has reason to suppose that a workman who may encounter it in his work does not know of this action of the saw, and is ignorant of this particular danger."

A verdict holding an employer liable will not be set aside where there is evidence tending to show that his agents put a servant to work "in a place of peculiar danger, of which he had no knowledge or experience, without informing him of the risks or instructing him how to avoid them." O'Connor v. Adams (1876) 120 Mass. 427 (where the servant was ordered to oil a rapidly revolving machine).

While the fact that if the hands are so placed between the upper portions of revolving cylinders as to be in contact with the surfaces there is danger is obvious to a man of ordinary intelligence after even a day's experience, a court will not say, as a matter of law, that the increased danger arising from their having been left on one occasion further apart by a coemployee of the plaintiff is so patent to a new employee that the master is absolved from the duty of instruction. Bjbjian v. Woonsocket Rubber Co. (1895) 164 Mass. 214.

An employer who knowingly furnishes an employee a kicking horse to work with, without notice or warning, is liable to the employee for injuries from a kick by the horse. Such a peril is not "apparent and visible." Helmeke v. Stetler (1893) 69 Hun. 107.

ployee a kicking horse to work with, without notice or warning, is liable to the employee for injuries from a kick by the horse. Such a peril is not "apparent and visible." Helmeke v. Stetler (1893) 69 Hun. 107.

So, it has been held to be the duty of an employer to furnish a driver with a safe team, or inform him of its bad or vicious habits, so that he may guard against them. Leigh v. Omaha Street R. Co. (1893) 36 Neb. 131; s. v. George H. Hammond Co. v. Johnson (1893) 38 Neb. 244. (In these two cases the special point made by defendant's counsel and negatively by the court was that the rule where animals were concerned was different from that which prevailed in regard to inanimate appliances.)

In Lane v. Minnesota State Agri. Soc. (1895) 62 Minn. 175, 29 L. R. A. 708, it was held that a complaint was not demurrable which alleged that the defendant engaged the plaintiff to ride a running race for horses, which was prompted and controlled by it; that, knowing a certain horse was dangerous and unsafe to run in any race by reason of a vicious habit of track bolting, of which plaintiff was ignorant, it negligently permitted such horse to run in the race in which she rode, pursuant to her engagement with defendant, without warning her of the unusual danger to which she was thus exposed; that by reason of such horse bolting the track during such race, she was thrown from her own horse and injured.

The presence of a solution of potash in a waste-pipe from the toilet room of a saloon is a latent danger against which the proprietor is bound to caution an employee whom he directs to remove an obstruction from the pipe. Dunn v. Connell (1897) 21 Misc. 295.

The principle which makes a master liable for exposing a servant without warning to latent dangers in machinery of which he has no knowledge, either actual or constructive, has also been applied in the analogous case of the exposure of the servant to an infectious or contagious disease. Kilgeel v. Aitken (1896) 94 Wis. 432, 35 L. R. A. 249, where the defendant allowed the plaintiff to work in the room in which one of the household was sick with typhoid fever, and omitted to inform her what the malady was.

A carpenter hired to erect a fence on a lot does not assume the risk of being shot by a person who is in adverse possession, unless the employer notifies him beforehand that forcible resistance may be expected. Baxter v. Roberts (1872) 44 Cal. 188, 13 Am. Rep. 160. The court said: "The general principle which forbids the employer to expose the employee to unusual risks in the course of his employment, and to conceal from him the fact of such danger, is not affected by the fact that the danger known to the employer arose from the tortious or felonious purposes or designs of third persons."

acting in hostility to the interests of the employer and through agencies beyond his control. The employee is as clearly entitled to information of such known danger of that character as of any other, the existence of which is known to the employer. The employer if he knew or was informed of a threatened danger of that character was bound to communicate the information to his employee about to be exposed to it in the course of his employment and in ignorance of its existence. The nature or character of the agency or means through which the danger of injury to the employee is to be apprehended can make no difference in the rule, for the employee is entitled in all cases to such information upon the subject as the employer may possess, and this with a view to enable him to determine for himself if at the proffered compensation he will be willing to assume the risk and incur the hazards of the business; and if the employer have such information or knowledge and withhold it from the employee, and the latter afterwards be injured in consequence thereof, the employer is liable to him in damages therefor."

Where the servant of a corporation does acts in obedience to its orders which are in violation of an injunction restraining such acts, or which amount to a trespass, and such servant has no notice of the injunction or the invalidity or wrongfulness of such acts, or of any liability or danger of arrest likely to be incurred in the performance thereof, and such liability and threatened danger are known to his principal, but concealed from him, the principal is bound to indemnify him for the dangers suffered by him as the natural result of his acts done in obedience to the orders of his superiors. Guirney v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1890) 43 Minn. 496.

And the liability of the principal does not, in such case, depend upon the ultimate determination of the question whether an alleged trespass by or upon the servant is or is not legally justifiable, or whether the issuance of the injunction is legal and proper. Ibid.

IV. Experience of servant as a special factor bearing upon the master's duty of instruction.

See also III. c. 3, supra, and the cases in V. infra.

a. Generally.

The extent of an adult servant's experience in the work which he was doing at the time he received the injury has a material bearing upon the question whether any duty of instruction rested on the master.

The "rule which requires the employer to give proper instructions is most frequently applied in cases where persons of immature years are employed about dangerous machinery; but the same principle governs where the person so put to work is of mature years, but without experience in the particular work, and without knowledge of the actual dangers attending it. But, of course, the fact that the person injured was of mature years . . . is a matter for the careful consideration of the jury in determining whether he fully understood and appreciated the dangers of his position." Ingerman v. Moore (1891) 90 Cal. 410.

Some presumptions indulged in with regard to this element of the employer's liability operate in his favor. Thus "it is not negligence to employ one who is physically and mentally qualified for the business, merely because he has not yet had experience. It is only by instructing the inexperienced that the necessary supply of experienced help can be secured." Gorman 44 L. R. A.

v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1889) 78 Iowa, 509 (man twenty-two years of age hired as brakeman).

Again, the want of experience in a certain employment cannot be of any moment in cases where the danger which actually caused the injury was such that no previous special experience was necessary to enable the servant to appreciate it. To this class of cases belong those already reviewed in which the obvious character of the danger was held to negative the existence of any duty to instruct. (See III. d, 1, supra.)

When a servant has actually operated, and seen others operate, an implement or machine often enough to enable him, by the exercise of ordinary intelligence and care, to learn how to avoid being injured by it, or when the mode of operating it is so simple as that a person of ordinary intelligence or care can at once perceive the safe and proper mode of operating it, there is no duty resting on the master to instruct him. Jones v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1894) 95 Ky. 576 (said of the danger of "loosing the motion" of the lever of a hand car).

An unqualified charge to the effect that an employer is liable for failure to warn an inexperienced employee ordered into a more hazardous position than that for which he was employed, as to dangers attending the same, is erroneous, inasmuch as such a liability does not exist, where they are so open and obvious that by the exercise of care such employee would know of them. Newbury v. Getchel & M. Lumber & Mfg. Co. (1896) 100 Iowa, 441.

The rule which absolves the master from liability for his omission to instruct an inexperienced employee as to a danger which is readily observable by anyone of ordinary intelligence may be referred to the consideration that the servant, knowing that there was such a danger, may be expected to proceed with great caution until he becomes familiar by experience with the forces with which he has to deal. Stuart v. West End Street R. Co. (1895) 163 Mass. 391, where it was held that the jury should have been directed to return a verdict for the defendant in an action for injuries caused by the plaintiff's allowing his hand to be drawn into the knives of a hay-cutting machine which he was feeding. "It may be," said the court, "that no one could tell the exact degree of the force with which the hay would move forward with the traction of the knives, nor just how great the danger was until he ascertained by actual experiment; but anybody could see at once that there was danger in doing the work unless care was used to avoid letting the fingers be drawn forward to the knives."

A presumption inuring to the disadvantage of the employer is that, although he is, as a general rule, not bound to anticipate that a servant of considerable experience will choose the most dangerous method of doing certain work (see Keats v. National Heeling Mach. Co. (1895) 21 U. S. App. 656, 65 Fed. Rep. 940, 13 C. C. A. 221), he is bound to take notice of the fact that a servant's experience may actually be a snare to him—as where the dangerous conditions consist in the unusual construction of an appliance, and that construction is so uncommon that a servant of long experience in the manipulation of such appliances may well have had no opportunity of becoming acquainted with one of that particular kind. Here the experience of the servant will tend to throw him off his guard, and the servant's want of experience strengthens rather than weakens the obligation of the master to give him instructions. See Missouri P. R. Co. v. Callbreath (1886) 86 Tex. 526.

Ordinarily, however, the servant's experience or inexperience is dealt with as a fact directly tending to establish or negative his knowledge of the dangers of the work. The importance attached to it in the case of adult employees will be apparent from the following decisions. (As regards the experience or inexperience of minor employees, see V. infra.)

b. Circumstances under which no instruction is necessary.

Failure to instruct an employee as to dangers is immaterial if he has worked long enough to learn by the ordinary exercise of diligence the dangers of his employment and the methods to avoid them. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wittig (1896, Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S. W. 857. (The methods referred to were those adopted for securing the safety of persons working on cars standing on a track.)

An employer may assume that no instructions are needed as to the use of a machine similar to that which the employee has handled for two years. A fortiori is he exempt from liability for an injury received by him in the ordinary course of his duties, where the person in charge of the machine questioned him as to his familiarity with it before starting it, and watched him operate it, until satisfied that he was a skilled operator. Keenan v. Waters (1897) 181 Pa. 247 (employee in steam laundry).

An employee cannot recover in an action for personal injuries received in the use of a "hand edger" in a sawmill, upon the ground that his employers were negligent in allowing him to use such a machine without instruction, where he had been working in the mill for more than a year, and upon this machine for four months when injured, and where its dangers were apparent to a casual observer. Hogele v. Wilson (1892) 5 Wash. 160.

Negligence is not imputable to a master failing to notify an experienced employee that a circular saw was dangerous, where the latter, while supplying wood to the man in charge of the saw, was injured by being struck by a piece of wood caught in it. Delaware River Iron-Ship Bldg. & Engine Works v. Nuttall (1888) 119 Pa. 149. The court said: "The negligence which the plaintiff imputes to the defendant, and for which a recovery was sought and allowed in the court below, is the failure to inform the plaintiff, when he was sent to carry the lumber, that a circular saw was a dangerous machine, and the failure to provide the saw with an attachment called a "spreader." As to the first of these, it must be remembered that the work Nuttall was asked to do was simply that of a bearer of burdens; work which is done by cheap and unskilled labor. He was a mechanic, and had for weeks been working in the same room in which this saw was operated. All that could have been told him by way of warning was, that there was a possibility of injury from a flying stick, but that during many years no such accident had happened in the defendant's works. That the omission of such a warning to a mechanic under the circumstances of this case was a failure in duty on the part of the employer is simply preposterous. There is risk and liability to accident in all employments, but the law does not require an employer to protect his employees against the possibility of an accident. He is bound to provide suitable machinery and implements for their use, see that they are in reasonable order, and that the usual precautions against accident are taken. The possibility of accident which lies beyond is a risk which every mechanic and every laborer takes and must take, as incidental to every form of activity."

In Mississippi River Logging Co. v. Schneider (1896) 54 U. S. App. 743, 74 Fed. Rep. 195, 20 C. C. A. 390, where a similar accident was the subject of an action, the court thus laid down the law: "If, however, it may be assumed that there was failure of duty here by the master with respect to the safeguard, its absence was an open, obvious fact. That it was wanting should have been observed by one of even slight experience in the business; certainly by one in the exercise of that ordinary care that the law casts upon the servant. The defendant in error was a man of mature years. He had had some six years' experience in this business. He was of ordinary intelligence and was no novice. He knew the operation and the use of every piece of machinery employed. He knew that the service was a dangerous one, and that even with the utmost care accidents would occur. He knew that material striking the revolving saw would be hurled with great force towards the operator. What warning from the master could have given him better instruction than he had,—instruction acquired by the experience of six years in the vicinity of dangerous machinery?" The court then referred to the passage just quoted from the Pennsylvania case, and proceeded thus: "It is said, however, that the servant could not anticipate that the operator at the edger would not remove one piece of lumber before another coming over the live rollers would strike it, force it over the space of dead rollers between the alley and the slab saw, nor that it would be swerved from its natural course by the direction given to it, either by the impinging force or by the operator in striving to secure it. That is true, and is equally true with respect to the master. The possibility was as palpable to the understanding of the one as to the other. The mill had been operated for some ten or eleven years without that safeguard and without accident from that cause. In marshaling the dangers that ordinary care would seek to guard against, it could hardly be anticipated that the piece of lumber would be projected such a distance over dead rollers, and would also be so swerved from its course, that it would strike the slab saw, 22 feet away from the end of the line of live rollers, and north of the line of dead rollers extended westerly upon a direct line from the live rollers. Nor can it be said that the danger was a concealed one, growing out of any defective machinery. It arose from the manner of operation, not because of defective machinery; and therefore was a risk incident to the business."

An adult employee of ordinary intelligence and familiar with the work cannot recover for an injury on the ground that he was not instructed as to the danger of his work, so "plain and open to observation," as the liability of his hand to be caught and drawn in by hay which he is feeding to a revolving spindle. Dougherty v. West Superior Iron & S. Co. (1894) 88 Wis. 343.

An experienced employee of full age, who has worked for four months in a room in which a loom having unprotected gearing is situated, assumes the risk of injury from being pushed against such gearing by a person passing him in the aisle, where his duties call upon him to work near such loom, and he has made no objection to the loom's being uncovered. Goodridge v. Washington Mills Co. (1893) 160 Mass. 234.

There is no negligence in omitting to instruct a man of ordinary intelligence, thirty-two years of age and familiar with the use of machinery, as to the danger of having his hand drawn under a moving roller on which he is endeavoring to make the loose end of a piece of cloth catch by throwing it over the roller, and tucking in the end between the roller and another piece of cloth. Richstain v. Washington Mills Co. (1893) 157 Mass. 538.

A machinist and engineer is charged with the knowledge that set-screws are in constant use in machinery, and that, from the purpose for which they are employed, it may be expected that the collar of a shaft will be kept in its position by one. If he is caught by such a screw while making some repairs, he cannot hold the employer liable for failing to apprise him of the danger arising from it while the shaft is in motion. Goodnow v. Walpole Emery Mills (1888) 146 Mass. 261.

An employer is not guilty of negligence in failing to warn a mechanic of mature years, who has worked upon the premises for some time, of the danger arising from a set-screw upon a revolving shaft, so as to render him liable for injuries from the clothing of such employee catching upon such screw, where he might have performed the work without danger by another method. Keats v. National Heeling Mach. Co. (1895) 21 U. S. App. 656, 65 Fed. Rep. 940, 13 C. C. A. 221.

Handling the line at the bow of a tug is a risk assumed by a man employed to do general work on the deck, although he has never previously handled any line but that at the stern. Williams v. Churchill (1884) 137 Mass. 243, 50 Am. Rep. 304.

A railroad company is under no duty to give warning of the enhanced risk due to the presence in its train of cars having double dead-woods, received from other companies, to an experienced brakeman who has been in service for seventeen years, where numerous like cars pass daily over the road. Northern P. R. Co. v. Blake (1894) 27 U. S. App. 190, 63 Fed. Rep. 45, 11 C. C. A. 98.

It is error to direct a jury to find a railroad company guilty of negligence on the ground of failure to instruct a brakeman specially as to the danger of coupling cars with double dead-woods where evidence has been given which tends to show that the plaintiff had had sufficient experience to dispense with the necessity of such special instructions. Hughes v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1891) 79 Wis. 264.

A verdict against a railroad company holding it negligent in failing to warn a brakeman of the danger in coupling cars having double dead-woods will be set aside, where the evidence shows that he saw and recognized the danger, and, on seeking employment from such company, had represented himself as having had twenty-seven days' experience in such work. Fenlon v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. (1896) 108 Mich. 284.

An employer is not bound to instruct an experienced lineman as to the danger of handling live electric wires. Junior v. Missouri Electric Light & P. R. Co. (1895) 127 Mo. 79.

Where a workman who has been in the employ of a telegraph company about one month is injured by a current of electricity which passes from an electric-light wire suspended on the same pole as a telegraph wire which he is handling, it is properly left to the jury to say whether the peril from which the injury resulted was one of which it was the duty of the master to warn him. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McMillen (1895) 58 N. J. L. 155, 32 L. R. A. 351.

Any person who has once worked the lever of a moving hand car, or seen another do it, is presumed to know without instruction that it is dangerous to "lose the motion of the lever." Jones v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1894) 95 Ky. 576.

Failure of a corporation to give warning to the master machinist employed in their establishment that there was danger that the wall or walls of the gas-room would fall in case fire occurred, where he was not ignorant of the danger or of the causes which produced it, will not make it criminally liable for his death, caused by the fall of such walls, while breaking down the door of the gas-room during the fire, under instructions from the superintendent. Allen v. Augusta Factory (1888) 82 Ga. 76.

No duty rests on a railroad company to instruct an experienced workman transferred from one machine to another of the same general character. Hence a skilled engineer cannot recover for an injury caused by striking his head against a bridge while leaning out of the car of his engine, on the ground that he should have been notified that this engine was 6 inches wider than those to which he was accustomed. Bel lows v. Pennsylvania & N. Y. Canal & R. Co. (1893) 157 Pa. 51.

In Reed v. Stockmeyer (1896) 34 U. S. App. 727, 74 Fed. Rep. 186, 20 C. C. A. 381, the plaintiff was called away from his regular work to split stones in a quarry by means of wedges, and, while so engaged, a piece broke off and fell upon him. The court in discussing the question whether the circumstances required a warning said: "The only possible concealed risk arose from the presence of seams in the stone in the quarry. Stockmeyer was no novice in this work. He was a man of mature age of ordinary intelligence, and for several years had been employed in and about quarries. His testimony shows beyond contention that, for some two months during his previous employment by Reed, he had worked at channelling stone; that he knew generally of the existence of seams throughout all the quarries in the neighborhood, and that the stone was liable to break by reason of the seams during the progress of the work of channelling and of cutting out the stone. He did not, it is true, know of seams in this particular block of stone; nor could Dreheble or the defendant in error know; and for the like reason, that it was covered with earth and dust. He, however, knew the fact that seams existed in stone throughout the quarries, and the danger therefrom, and had equal opportunity with the master and Dreheble of ascertaining the existence of seams in this particular stone, for he, with Dreheble, had been at work upon it prior to the injury. All the warning that could have been required of the master, or of the vice principal acting for the master, was to call the attention of the servant to the possible existence of seams in this particular stone. But Stockmeyer knew that fact from his general knowledge of the character of the quarries. It was a fact of which he was bound to take notice. No warning could make the danger more manifest to him. The danger arising from this employment to which he was directed by the master was either obvious to the senses or was known to the servant as most likely to exist; and he had the sense and experience necessary to comprehend the danger and to guard against it. There was consequently no breach by the master of any positive duty owing to the servant which produced or contributed to his injury."

c. Circumstances under which instruction is necessary.

The obligation to instruct a man hired to do certain work as to the peculiar peril of different work requiring special skill is peremptory, as the master is then necessarily chargeable with the fact that he is probably ignorant of the hazards to be encountered, and the proper methods of obviating them, and there is no room for the application of the doctrine as to obvious risks. Upon this principle it has been held that tightening up the nuts on the generator of a refrigerating machine without reducing the pressure, when there is an ammonia pressure of about 120 pounds which is increasing, is a dangerous work which a carpenter employed as a general laborer or handyman, but unfamiliar with and uninstructed as to the danger of the mode of operation necessary to preserve an equal strain on all parts of the generator, cannot be set to do without rendering the employer liable to him for injury resulting from an explosion caused by his lack of skill. Ryan v. Los Angeles Ice & Cold Storage Co. (1896) 112 Cal. 244, 32 L. R. A. 524.

So, a servant is set to work in a dangerous place, within the rule as to the master's liability in such case, where, without being given proper instructions, he is directed to start a fire in a furnace which is safe if the fire is properly made therein, but is dangerous if made by an inexperienced employee. La Fortune v. Jolly (1896) 167 Mass. 170.

So, a common laborer who has had no experience in or knowledge of the use or danger of explosives employed for loosening frozen ground which is to be excavated for the roadbed of a railroad is entitled to assume that the representative of his employer will not put him to work with a pick in a place where a blast has been set off, without taking proper precautions to guard against the consequences of a part of the blast being left unexploded, and warning him of the danger to be apprehended from this source. The risk arising from the want of information under such circumstances cannot be held to have been contemplated in the service in which he engaged. Burke v. Anderson (1895) 34 U. S. App. 132, 69 Fed. Rep. 814, 16 C. C. A. 442 (distinguishing Minneapolis v. Lundin (1893) 19 U. S. App. 245, 58 Fed. Rep. 525, 7 C. C. A. 844, and Cornellison v. Eastern R. Co. (1892) 50 Minn. 23, where the injured servants were experienced and hired for and engaged in the use of the explosives).

The danger that a link in a drawhead may prove to be stuck, thus exposing a person engaged in coupling to the danger of having his fingers crushed, if he does not let it go before the cars meet, is in a sense obvious, but it is one as to which the railroad company is bound to warn an inexperienced brakeman known to be ignorant of such danger. Bonner v. Moore (1893) 3 Tex. Civ. App. 416.

So, it is negligence in a railroad company to cause a switchman who has been only a short time in its employ to go to a place in the nighttime, over a cattle guard, to couple cars, without warning him that the cattle guard is there and of the danger he thereby assumes; and it is immaterial that it has been the custom to couple cars in that place, and that no injury has before occurred by coupling there. Fredenburg v. Northern C. R. Co. (1889) 114 N. Y. 582.

The tendency of a board which is warped to spring back while it is being sawed by a circular saw is not so obvious that an inexperienced workman must be held, as a matter of law, to take cognizance of it without being warned. Wheeler v. Wason Mfg. Co. (1883) 135 Mass. 294.

A complaint is not demurrable, which alleges that an inexperienced and ignorant employee was put to work at a machine which had a saw defectively and insecurely fastened to its shaft, which was known to the employer but not to the employee, and that no instructions were given in respect to the danger. Greenberg v. Whitcomb Lumber Co. (1895) 90 Wis. 225, 28 L. R. A. 439.

A special finding that the plaintiff, a common laborer, was assigned without instructions to the work of poking brickbats into a crusher, and was injured fifteen minutes afterwards, is not inconsistent with a general verdict against the defendant. Chicago Anderson Pressed Brick Co. v. Rembarz (1893) 51 Ill. App. 543, Affirmed in Barnes v. Rembarz (1894) 150 Ill. 192.

An employee who is set to work upon a boring machine with uncovered cogs, and, by his own testimony, without experience, instructions, or warnings, does not, as a matter of law, assume the risk. Thompson v. Edward P. Allis Co. (1895) 89 Wis. 523.

A verdict will not be set aside which finds that a rapidly-revolving saw placed under a bench used by the plaintiff in such a position that he could not see it unless he lowered his eye to within 18 inches of the floor, was an appliance on which it was unsafe and improper to set an inexperienced man to work without giving him proper notice and reasonable instructions. Campbell v. Eveleth (1890) 83 Me. 50.

It is the duty of a railway company, upon temporarily employing a brakeman to do the coupling in the absence of the regular coupler, to inform him of a rule requiring the use of a stick in coupling, where he is a stranger to the service and not familiar with its rules and regulations. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Turville (1892-93) 97 Ala. 122.

See, generally, as to the duty of the master to bring his rules to the servant's knowledge, the note to Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 43 L. R. A. 305.

It is the duty of the proprietor of a lime kiln to warn an inexperienced laborer who is set to work on the top of the kiln as to the danger of falling into the fire when the stone at the base is removed, and the mass above consequently subsides. Parkhurst v. Johnson (1883) 50 Mich. 70, 45 Am. Rep. 28.

If a servant is inexperienced and ignorant of the approaches to a meal conveyor, and the apparent approaches to the same are such as are likely to lead him, on account of his inexperience and ignorance, to undertake to ascend to the meal conveyor in a certain manner, and the danger of ascending to it in that manner was not apparent to him on account of such ignorance and inexperience, and the master's foreman knows or ought to have known these facts, it is his duty to inform the servant how to reach the meal conveyor, and to instruct and caution him sufficiently to enable him to comprehend the dangers, and to ascend to the meal conveyor safely by the exercise of proper care. Fort Smith Oil Co. v. Slever (1893) 58 Ark. 168.

Where the testimony justifies the inference that the knives of a planing machine were concealed from one doing the work assigned to the plaintiff, an inexperienced employee, it is error to nonsuit him in an action to recover damages for an injury caused by his stepping into the knives while they were temporarily left without the protection of the hood which ordinarily covered them. Turner v. Coldsboro Lumber Co. (1896) 119 N. C. 387.

It is error to direct a verdict for the defendant where a brakeman, new to such work, is injured in coupling a car with double deadwoods, six days after entering on his duties, where the evidence tends to show that he had neither been instructed as to such cars, nor even informed of their existence. Reynolds v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1891) 64 Vt. 66.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Veach (1898) 20 Ky. L. Rep. 403, the same ruling was made as to a brakeman who had been only a few weeks in the service, and was injured in handling a foreign car so constructed.

In Ingerman v. Moore (1891) 90 Cal. 410, where the injury was caused by a projecting set-screw, the plaintiff's own testimony showed that he had worked inside of the mill, taking lumber from the big saw, for nearly two years, and had been employed as assistant on the scantling-machine—that is, in putting the lumber in place to be cut by the saw—for about nine months, and that during that time he had, upon different occasions when the foreman was absent, run the machine in all eighteen days prior to the accident. The court said: "It does not appear that plaintiff's duty as assistant was such as would necessarily give him knowledge of the structure of the machine or of the existence of the projecting set-screw, which was a concealed danger. It is not shown that he had ever been called upon, or that it was any part of his duty, to become acquainted with this machinery, or to adjust it when out of order. It is doubtless true that some men with the same opportunity would have become familiar with its mechanism and fully qualified to take charge of it, but it is a matter of common experience that all men would not. There is a difference in the capacity of men to acquire a particular knowledge of machinery, or of the arrangement of its parts, or manner of construction, some having greater power of observation, and more desire to investigate and understand, than others. The extent of plaintiff's knowledge of this machinery was therefore a question of fact for the jury to determine from the evidence before them, and we think it was fairly submitted to them in the instructions of the court."

A verdict in favor of a servant who is injured in handling a dangerous machine in the use of which he has had no practical experience except such as he has acquired on a few previous occasions during the period of two months which has elapsed since he entered the employment will not be set aside. Verdell v. Gray's Harbor Commercial Co. (1897) 115 Cal. 517.

An objection to a charge that it was abstract, in that the jury were told that it was the defendant's duty to warn an inexperienced servant of the hazards and risks of his employment, and did not limit the obligation to the risk which was the actual cause of the injury, will not be allowed to prevail where there is no pretense that warning was given to the deceased about any other danger, and other parts of the charge given at the instance of the railway pointedly limit the jury's consideration to particular risk to which the injury was due. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Davis (1892) 55 Ark. 462.

Where a servant testifies that he had no experience in the management of the machine by which he was injured, and received no instruction or warning as to the dangers incident to its use, it will not be held, as a matter of law, that he appreciated those dangers. Thompson v. Edward P. Allis Co. (1895) 89 Wis. 528.

V. Minority of servant as a special factor bearing upon the master's duty of instruction.

See also VI. infra.

a. General principles stated.

1. Introductory.

The mere fact that a servant is a minor is not sufficient to affect the master with liability 44 L. R. A.

for an injury received by him, provided he was competent and physically able to perform the duties for which he was hired. Youll v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. (1885) 66 Iowa, 346; Houston & G. N. R. Co. v. Miller (1879) 51 Tex. 270.

Whether a minor may, without negligence, be set to do dangerous work "depends upon the particular circumstances of each case, upon the character and degree of the danger, and the capacity of the minor to comprehend and avoid it." Anderson v. Morrison (1875) 22 Minn. 274.

The minority of a servant, therefore, is material only for the reason that it may in some cases constitute a special ground for predicating the existence of some additional obligation on the master's part to see that the servant is not exposed to unnecessary dangers.

"The almost universally accepted doctrine is that the care to be observed to avoid injuries to children is greater than that in respect to adults. That course of conduct which would be ordinary care, when applied to persons of mature judgment and discretion, might be gross, and even criminal, negligence toward children of tender years. The same discernment and foresight that older and experienced persons habitually employ in discovering defects and dangers, cannot be reasonably expected of them; and therefore the greater precaution should be taken, where children are exposed to them." Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. v. Corrigan (1889) 46 Ohio St. 283, 3 L. R. A. 385.

The proper application of the general principle in the present connection is obvious. As has been shown in the preceding subdivisions, a duty to instruct an adult can be implied only in cases where, for some special reason, he is incapable of appreciating the peril of his employment, and the master has actual or constructive knowledge of this lack of appreciation. Similarly the minority of the servant, as a circumstance bearing upon the responsibilities of the master in this regard is important only in so far as it may tend to show that the master knew that the servant did not comprehend the perils of his environment. The obligation to instruct a minor, therefore, is not absolute. Whether the master shall be charged with it is a question to be determined with reference both to the character of the danger under discussion and to the actual age of the servant. As will be seen below, the courts have made numerous rulings on the theory that there are some perils so obvious that even children of tender years will be presumed to understand them, and have also absolved the master from liability where the servant's physical appearance was such that, in the absence of special information, the master was justified in acting on the hypothesis that he was of full age. That this is the real significance of minority as a factor in cases involving the duty of instruction is apparent both from a general survey of the decisions and from several passages like the following which we find scattered through the reports.

Youth is an evidence of inexperience, and greater strictness in the application of the rule as to the necessity of instruction should be required in the employment of minors than in the employment of servants of mature years, even when employed by and with the consent of the parent or guardian. St. Louis & S. E. R. Co. v. Valtrius (1877) 56 Ind. 511.

In the case of young persons it is the duty of the employer to take notice of their age and ability, and to use ordinary care to protect them from risks which they cannot properly appreciate and to which they should not be exposed. Rummel v. Dilworth (1890) 131 Pa. 509.

If the youth, inexperience, and incapacity of a minor, who is employed in a hazardous occupation, are such that a master of ordinary intelligence and prudence would know that he is not aware of, or does not appreciate, the ordinary risks of his employment. It is his duty to notify him of them, and to instruct him how to avoid them. Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Erickson (1893) 12 U. S. App. 260, 55 Fed. Rep. 943, 5 C. C. A. 341.

It may frequently happen that the dangers of a particular position for, or mode of doing, work, are great, and apparent to persons of capacity and knowledge of the subject, and yet a party from youth, inexperience, ignorance, or general want of capacity may fail to appreciate them. It would be a breach of duty on the part of a master to expose a servant of this character, even with his own consent, to such dangers, unless with instructions or cautions sufficient to enable him to comprehend them, and to do his work safely, with proper care on his own part. Sullivan v. India Mfg. Co. (1873) 113 Mass. 396.

It is "the duty of an employer to take proper precautions for the safety of a person employed in running or tending machinery, and where such person is young and inexperienced, to give him proper instructions so as to enable him to understand and appreciate the danger attending his employment." Glover v. Dwight Mfg. Co. (1888) 148 Mass. 22.

It is the duty of one who employs an immature and inexperienced person for a dangerous service to explain to him the perils incident to his work and instruct him how to avoid them. Hayes v. Colchester Mills (1894) 89 Vt. 1.

Although the machinery, or that part of it complained of as especially dangerous, is visible, yet if, by reason of the youth and inexperience of the servant, he is not aware of the danger to which he is exposed in operating it, or approaching near to it, it is the duty of the master to apprise him of the danger, if known to him. Dowling v. Allen (1881) 74 Mo. 13, 41 Am. Rep. 298.

It is not a conclusion of law from the fact that a servant seventeen years old was aware of the existence of a set-screw on a revolving shaft, and was sprightly for one of his years, that he was aware of the risk and danger of passing over the shaft, while it was in motion. Ibid.

A master is liable where "an inexperienced youth . . . employed to work about dangerous machinery of whose perils he is known by his employer to be ignorant, and while exercising ordinary care in executing the orders of his superior, is injured by some part of the machinery, of whose danger no warning has been given him, and which is not obvious to a person of his age of ordinary intelligence and prudence." (Plaintiff seventeen years old caught by set-screw in passing.) Dowling v. Allen (1890) 102 Mo. 213, Reiterating doctrine laid down in (1881) 74 Mo. 13, 41 Am. Rep. 298.

That the plaintiff was not a child, but was seventeen years of age, would not deprive him of the right to be warned, if, as a question of fact, the employers, or the man representing them, ought under all the circumstances to have inquired of him as to his experience, or taken notice of the probability that he was so inexperienced as to render it proper to give him warning. May v. Smith (1893) 92 Ga. 95.

In Kehler v. Schwenk (1892) 151 Pa. 505, the court, after citing Patterson v. Pittsburg & C. R. Co. (1874) 78 Pa. 389, 18 Am. Rep. 412, proceeded thus: "It will be seen from this decision that, in actions by young persons against their employers, we recognize as sources of liability the inexperience of the servant, and 44 L. R. A.

the want of specific instruction as to the dangers of the service, and we suspend the rule that the servant assumes the risk of the service when he has not knowledge by experience, or by specific instruction. All these sources of liability existed in the present case. The plaintiff was very young; he had no knowledge, by experience or by instruction, as to the dangers of the service; the service was in reality highly dangerous; the plaintiff was not employed to engage in this particular service but in another, and was urged into it against his will; the appliance from the use of which the injury arose was only in partial use; and the testimony disclosed a perfectly simple device, in extensive use, which practically removed all danger. The most of these facts were proved without contradiction, and ample testimony was given as to all of them. In such circumstances the case was clearly for the jury, and, as it seems to us, the verdict was entirely justified by the evidence. We are of the opinion that there was no error in the charge nor in the answers to points, and therefore think the judgment should be affirmed."

It is the duty of one employing a person of tender years (here a boy of thirteen) about machinery to give suitable instructions to him, having reference to his age and capacity, so as to enable him to understand the dangers, whatever they are, of his employment. Rock v. Indian Orchard Mills (1886) 142 Mass. 622.

It is the duty of the master to give such warning, advice, and instructions to a youthful and inexperienced employee as will enable him, by the exercise of reasonable care, to perform the duties of the employment with safety to himself. Whitelaw v. Memphis & C. R. Co. (1886) 16 Lea. 391.

If the servant, by reason of his youth and inexperience, is not aware of or does not appreciate the danger incident to the work he is employed to do, or to the place he is engaged to occupy, he does not assume the risks of his employment until the master apprises him of the dangers. It would be a breach of duty on the part of the master to expose a servant of this character, even with his consent, to such dangers, without first giving him such instructions and cautions as would, in the judgment of men of ordinary minds, understanding, and prudence, be sufficient to enable him to appreciate the dangers, and the necessity for the exercise of due care and caution, and to do the work safely, with proper care on his part. Emma Cotton Seed Oil Co. v. Hale (1892) 56 Ark. 232.

"When a master engages an inexperienced servant, especially if of tender years and presumed ignorance, and places him in a place of latent or obscure danger, it is the duty of the master to instruct the servant how to do the work, and at the same time to be on his guard against the danger," and he is liable for injuries occasioned by failure to give such instructions. Thall v. Carnie (1889) 1 Sliv. Sup. Ct. 401, cited with approval in New Albany Forge & Rolling Mill v. Cooper (1892) 131 Ind. 363.

Where a boy is of that tender age and that lack of capacity that he cannot be held exactly to that accountability which a person of more mature years would be held to, then the failure to furnish him with those appliances which are safe and proper, and the failure to instruct him as to the use of them, is negligence in his employers. Steller v. Hart (1887) 65 Mich. 644.

The rule as to the assumption of risk by a servant having equal knowledge with the master of the danger incident to the work "presupposes that the servant has sufficient discretion to appreciate the dangers, and has no anollication to the case of young and inexperienced children." In such a case it is the duty of the master to warn and instruct the child as to the dangers of the employment and the means of avoiding them. Fisk v. Central P. R. Co. (1887) 72 Cal. 38.

It may be safely laid down as a general rule, supported by authority, that persons who employ children to work with or about dangerous machinery, or in dangerous places, should anticipate that they will exercise only such judgment, discretion, and care as are usual among children of the same age, under similar circumstances, and they are bound to use due care, having regard to their age and inexperience, to protect them from the dangers incident to the situation in which they are placed; and as a reasonable precaution, in the exercise of such care in that behalf, it is the duty of the employer to so instruct such employees, concerning the dangers connected with their employment, which from their youth and inexperience they may not appreciate or comprehend, that they may, by the exercise of such care as ought reasonably to be expected of them, guard against and avoid injuries arising therefrom. Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. v. Corrigan (1889) 46 Ohio St. 283, 3 L. R. A. 385. There exception was taken by the defendant to the following instruction: If the plaintiff was injured in consequence of the defendant's negligence, and he "by reason of his youth and want of judgment as to the perils of his position, did some act in the discharge of his duty, as he understood it, which also contributed to his injury, but which he did not know to be likely to injure him, and he had not been properly advised and instructed in regard thereto," he cannot recover. But the supreme court said: "The instruction negatives any inference of negligence; for, according to it, to enable the plaintiff to recover, it was necessary for the jury to find that he did not know that the act which he did, that contributed to his injury, was likely to injure him, and that this want of knowledge was owing to his age and lack of judgment and the failure of the defendant to properly instruct him, and that the act so done by him was in the discharge of his duty as he understood it."

If it is the duty of persons employing children in dangerous situations, to properly instruct them concerning the dangers, which on account of their youth and inexperience they may not understand, it would seem to follow, as a necessary conclusion, that such employee, who has not been so instructed, and who, while in the discharge of his duty as he understands it, suffers an injury in consequence of the employer's negligence, may maintain an action against his employer therefor, notwithstanding that, by reason of his youth and inexperience, and the failure of the employer to properly instruct him, he did some act, in the performance of his duty according to the judgment and knowledge he possessed, which contributed to the injury, but which he did not know, and was not advised would be likely to injure him."

Where a child is employed the employer must look out for the child, and must see that it is not exposed to danger arising from the structure of building or machinery which an operative of ordinary intelligence and experience would perceive. Notice of danger is not enough. The child must have sufficient instructions to enable him to avoid danger. Wharton on Neg. § 218, quoted with approval in Hinckley v. Horzowsky (1890) 133 Ill. 359, 8 L. R. A. 490.

While the mere fact of minority is deemed immaterial, it is well settled, in America at least, that any actual incapacity of a minor to understand and appreciate the perils to which he is exposed is to be fully considered, and that he can recover from his master for injuries suffered from any peril the nature of which he did not know, or could not properly appreciate if he did nominally know, and to which a prudent and right-minded master would not have allowed him to be exposed. 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 218, quoted with approval in Hinckley v. Horzowsky (1890) 133 Ill. 359, 8 L. R. A. 490.

In New Albany Forge & Rolling Mill v. Cooper (1892) 131 Ind. 363, the following statement of the rule by Judge Thompson, in his work on Negligence, vol. 2, pp. 977, 978, was adopted: "The law imposes upon the master, when he takes an infant into his service, the duty of explaining to him fully the hazard and dangers connected with the business, and of instructing him how to avoid them. . . . The master will not have discharged his duty in this regard unless the instructions and precautions given are so graduated to the youth, ignorance, and inexperience of the servant as to make him fully aware of the danger to him and to place him, with reference to it, in substantially the same situation as if he were an adult." (Quoted also in Taylor v. Wootan (1890) 1 Ind. App. 188; Smith v. Irwin (1889) 51 N. J. L. 507.)

This statement, however, in so far as it seems to imply that there is an absolute duty to instruct an infant, is not worded with entire accuracy, as will be seen from the decisions cited above, as well as from those to be hereafter noticed.

In another part of the New Jersey case just referred to the court approved a change to the effect that the rule that an employee takes upon himself all the risks incident to the employment is modified to the extent of requiring one who employs an infant in work that is "in its nature hazardous to give him such notice of the danger and such instruction as will enable him to comprehend the dangers that are incident" thereto.

But the phrase "in its nature hazardous" is altogether too vague to serve as a basis for differentiating between perils of which the servant should or should not be notified. The only safe ground on which a distinction can be taken is that of the servant's knowledge or ignorance of the actual danger incident to the work. (See V. c. d. e. infra.)

A jury may properly be instructed that they may "consider the appearance of the plaintiff [a minor employee] as he has been exhibited before them on the witness stand, in determining the question of his intelligence and capacity to apprehend and avoid the dangers incident to his employment." Disotell v. Henry Luther Co. (1895) 90 Wis. 635.

2. Rationale of rule requiring the master to instruct a minor servant.

In Jones v. Florence Min. Co. (1886) 66 Wis. 268, 57 Am. Rep. 269, the court considered that of the various reasons assigned by the courts for imposing on the master the duty of instructing a minor servant the most satisfactory were these: "(1) That the master owes a duty towards an employee who is directed to perform a hazardous and dangerous work, or to perform his work in a dangerous place, when the employee, from want of age, experience, or general capacity, does not comprehend the dangers, to point out to him the dangers incident to the employment, and thus enable him to comprehend, and so avoid them, and that neglect to discharge such duty is gross negligence on the part of the employer; (2) that such an employee does not assume the risk of the dangers incident to such hazardous employment, because he does not comprehend them, and the law will not therefore presume that he contracted to assume them."

It would, however, be more correct to say that the second of these reasons merely states the legal result of the first. The proper standpoint, as already indicated, is rather that which permits us to view the more extended duty of instruction which is predicated in regard to minors as a special application of the general principle, that the degree of care which is obligatory upon a person who owes a duty to another varies with the circumstances to be provided for. A servant who possesses less than the average amount of intelligence is clearly more likely to be injured, in any given case, than one whose intelligence comes up to that standard. That the intelligence of a minor usually fails to come up to this standard is, as has been pointed out, a fact of which the master is bound to take notice. The knowledge thus imputed may properly be deemed a sufficient warning to him that a minor servant will be exposed to greater danger than an adult, unless he takes some additional precautions with a view to diminishing the risks of injury. Clearly the additional precaution which is most readily suggested by the situation is that the presumably inadequate and defective information of the young servant should be supplemented by imparting to him that amount of knowledge which will, as respects the work to be done, place him in the same position as a servant of mature years.

Or, to put the same thought in a somewhat different form, it may be said that the essential basis of the rule is that the master is not justified in exposing a servant to any extraordinary risks, and that a servant who cannot, by the exercise of his own unaided intelligence, comprehend the dangers incident to his environment, must necessarily be exposed to such risks, relatively to servants who are capable of comprehending the same dangers.

That the duty of instructing minors is really referable to this consideration is strongly indicated by the language used in the earliest cases in which the liability of a master to servants of tender years was discussed. The significance of these cases in the present connection is due to the fact that, when they were decided, the theory that there was a positive duty of instruction had not found a footing in the courts.

In Bartonshill Coal Co. v. McGuire (1858) 8 Macq. H. L. Cas. 311, the Lord Chancellor, referring to the Scotch case of O'Byrne v. Burn (1854) 16 Dunlop, 1025, where a young girl was injured while attempting, in obedience to an order of the defendant's foreman, to remove some waste clay from the moving rollers in a clay-mill, said: "It was hardly possible to apply the principle of the servant having undertaken the service with the knowledge of the risks incident to it. She was an inexperienced girl employed in a hazardous manufactory, placed under the control, and, it may be added, the protection of an overseer, who was appointed by the defender and intrusted with this duty. And it might well be considered that, by employing such a helpless and ignorant child, the master contracted to keep her out of harm's way in assigning to her any work to be performed."

Compare also the following Scotch cases founded on the increase of obligations which the minority of a servant entails upon the master: Gemmill v. Gourrock Co. 23 Dunlop, 426; M'Millan v. M'Millan, 23 Dunlop, 1082; Trull v. Smith (1873) 11 Macph. 888; Darby v. Duncan (1861) 23 Dunlop, 529. 44 L. R. A.

The same conclusion may be drawn from the remark made, arguendo, in Union P. R. Co. v. Fort (1878) 17 Wall. 553, 21 L. ed. 739, the plaintiff being a mere youth, without experience, and not familiar with machinery, could not be expected to know the peril of the new work which he was ordered to do, and might be supposed to have entered upon the execution of the order without apprehension of danger, owing to his having relied, as he was justified in doing, on the judgment of his superior. The want of knowledge, therefore, may be adduced as a circumstance tending both to disprove assumption of the risk or contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and to prove negligence on the part of the master in giving a servant work to do, where he has reason to suppose that it will be specially perilous for a person of tender years or inexperience. The case just cited was decided on the latter ground.

The converse of the principle formulated above emerges in such a case as McGinnis v. Canada Southern Bridge Co. (1882) 49 Mich. 466. There the plaintiff had attempted in the trial court to recover on this ground, among others: That he, being immature and inexperienced, was sent by defendant into danger the full extent of which he did not comprehend, and that this was culpable fault on the part of the defendant which should render it liable for all injurious consequences. But this theory the supreme court declared to be inapplicable under the circumstances, saying: "This ground was first shown to be untenable by the plaintiff's own evidence. He was past twenty years of age, was not shown to be wanting in average intelligence of those of his age, and his duties were explained to him when he entered upon his employment. He besides understood the very danger into which he fell, and had in mind the purpose to avoid it. It was thus made to appear by his own examination that he was not sent into unknown dangers, and that he was not exposed to risks which he, through immaturity or for any other reason, failed to comprehend."

3. Special principles applicable in actions by the father of an injured minor.

The fact that the plaintiff in an action to recover for injuries received by a minor employee is the minor's father is immaterial so far as regards the necessity of proving the omission to instruct as one of the prerequisites to the maintenance of the action.

Hence we find it laid down that, where a minor is injured by reason of the alleged neglect of his employer, a complaint by his father for damages must show one of three things: (1) That the child was too young to be put to the service he was required to perform; or (2) that neither he nor the plaintiff had notice or knowledge of the augmented danger caused by the master's neglect; or (3) that the master, knowing the age and inexperience of the child, neglected to give him the necessary warning and instruction. Brazil Block Coal Co. v. Young (1889) 117 Ind. 520.

But under some circumstances such an action is barred by the defense of contributory negligence where the minor, if he had been himself the plaintiff, could have recovered.

Thus, the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in holding that a father who suffers his son of tender years to engage or continue in a dangerous service assumes all the risks reasonably incident thereto, including that of the son's indiscretion and rashness due to his youth, and cannot recover for loss of his services where he is killed by going without direction to a dangerous place to comply with a proper order, when there was a perfectly safe place (McCool v. Lucas Coal Co. (1892) 150 Pa. 638), used the following language: "If the unfortunate boy, for the loss of whose services the father seeks compensation in this suit, had escaped death, and were here asking indemnity for injuries received while in the service of the defendant, it might be a question whether the employer did not owe him the duty of exercising such watchfulness and oversight, or at least giving such instruction and admonition, as would, with proper obedience on his part, have insured him against serious harm. But it is not his cause that is to be passed upon; it is that of an adult father, who, if he did not actually place his son in a dangerous service, at least suffered him to engage and continue in such service. Such sufferance is said to have the sense of permission, and where the danger is great, and the child is of tender years, it is said to be negligence per se. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Long (1874) 75 Pa. 257; Smith v. Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. (1888) 92 Pa. 450, 37 Am. Rep. 705. The father owes to his infant child the duty of protection, and this includes restraint from exposure to dangers, with which one of its years and discretion is unfitted to cope. When this duty is neglected the father is said to be in part delicto with a negligent defendant, and though the infant may recover against a wrongdoer for an injury caused partly by his own imprudence, the father cannot. Smith v. O'Connor (1864) 48 Pa. 223, 86 Am. Dec. 582; Glassey v. Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. R. Co. (1868) 57 Pa. 172."

b. Minor employees usually on the same footing as adults, after proper instruction has been given.

The duty of instructing minors being predicated from the fact that, without such instruction, they would be exposed to avoidable dangers of which they are presumably ignorant, it follows that, after they have been properly instructed, their minority will usually cease to be a material factor in estimating the extent of the employer's liability. In other words, the defenses of assumption of risks and contributory negligence will then be available against them, if, under the same circumstances, these defenses would have been available against adults.

A case in which a minor's action was held to be barred, after instructions, on the ground of contributory negligence, is Probert v. Phipps (1889) 140 Mass. 258, where a boy fifteen years old was denied recovery for an injury received while walking between the gears of two machines which just gave room to pass, the court taking the ground that, as he had been cautioned as to the danger, he was negligent in not avoiding a danger which he understood perfectly well how to avoid.

In the following cases the defense of assumption of risks was allowed on the ground that instructions had previously been given: Chicago Anderson Pressed Brick Co. v. Reimneger (1892) 140 Ill. 384; Tinkham v. Sawyer (1891) 133 Mass. 485 (warning followed by minor's own opportunities for observation); Jones v. Florence Min. Co. (1886) 66 Wis. 268, 57 Am. Rep. 269; Zurn v. Tetlow (1890) 184 Pa. 213; Kaufhold v. Arnold (1894) 163 Pa. 269; Beckham v. Hillier (1884) 47 N. J. L. 12; Prentiss v. Kent Furniture Mfg. Co. (1886) 63 Mich. 478; Emma Cotton Seed Oil Co. v. Hale (1892) 56 Ark. 232; Flak v. Central P. R. Co. (1887) 72 Cal. 38; Daester v. Mechanics' Planing Mill (1882) 11 Mo. App. 593.

That the business might have been carried on in a less dangerous manner is a circumstance which is quite immaterial where the servant has been sufficiently instructed. Rock v. Indian Orchard Mills (1886) 142 Mass. 522.

There is no rule of law that a minor may not be employed about a dangerous machine, and the simple fact that a machine is dangerous does not make an employer liable for an injury received by a minor employed upon such machine. All the law requires is that the minor should be properly instructed as to the danger to which he is exposed, and if he is injured because he has not received such instruction then, as a general rule, the employer may be held responsible. But where the minor is familiar with the machine, and its character and operation are obvious, and he is aware of and fully appreciates the danger to be apprehended from working the machine, the fact that he is a minor does not alter the general rule that the employee takes upon himself the risks which are patent and incident to the employment." Buckley v. Gutta Percha & Rubber Mfg. Co. (1880) 113 N. Y. 540.

In Rummel v. Dilworth (1890) 181 Pa. 520, the defendant's counsel had questioned the correctness of the following passage from the opinion on the former appeal of the case (1885) 111 Pa. 343: "The plaintiff cannot be supposed or assumed to have accepted in advance a peril which he could not estimate, and the extent of which for lack of experience he could not have known." The court explained its meaning: "It was not meant to assert that the dangerous character of a piece of machinery, a bridge, or an effort to cross a railroad track in front of a moving train, should be determined by the result of an experiment in each case, but that a workman must know the dangers of his employment by actual experience in the employment, or by the instructions of his employer, before he can be held to have assumed them. In other words, it is not just to the employee to hold him to have assumed dangers of which he has no knowledge by experience in the business, or by the warning and instruction of his employer. Such risks cannot be estimated, because they are not known to exist, or because their real character and extent can only be known by familiarity with the business, or information from one who has such familiarity."

A minor cannot recover in an action under the New York Laws of 1876, chap. 122, "To Prevent and Punish Wrongs to Children," unless the master was guilty of some specific negligence. Hence a master who hires a boy of fifteen to work at a stamping machine is not responsible for such personal injuries as he may receive after proper precautions have been taken and adequate instructions given. Hayes v. Bush & D. Mfg. Co. (1886) 102 N. Y. 648.

This rule, however, is subject to one important limitation: "If a person is so young that, even after full instructions, he wholly fails to understand them and does not appreciate the dangers arising from a want of care, then he is too young for such employment, and the employer puts or keeps him at such work at his own risk." Hickey v. Taaffe (1887) 105 N. Y. 26.

Hence, an employer remains liable for injuries received by an inexperienced boy seven years old, to whom work is assigned which can be performed safely only by skillful and careful mechanics, even though such boy has been duly warned and instructed as to the dangers of the work. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Perego (1887) 36 Kan. 424.

This rule applies although the dangers in regard to which the instructions have been given belong to the class known as obvious. Williamson v. Sheldon Marble Co. (1893) 66 Vt. 427.

Other forms in which the same principle has been stated are these:

"The giving of proper instructions [at the commencement of the employment] will not relieve an employer from liability to a child, if the work required of him [at the time of the injury] was not within the scope of his employment, and not such as ought to have been required of a person of his capacity." Hayes v. Colchester Mills (1894) 69 Vt. 1.

The person employed may be so young, inexperienced, and immature in judgment, that no kind of warning and instruction would relieve the master from responsibility for injuries resulting from putting him at a hazardous and dangerous work. Pittsburgh. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Adams (1886) 105 Ind. 151.

If it appears that the minor was too young to understand even with instructions the dangerous character of a machine, or appreciate the peril of operating it, the master is not shielded from liability merely by the fact that the minor was properly instructed in the use of the machine. Steller v. Hart (1887) 85 Mich. 644.

In Taylor v. Wootan (1891) 1 Ind. App. 188, the following statement of the rule in Shearman & Redfield on Negligence was adopted: "And if he (the master) knows, or, in the exercise of ordinary care and sagacity would have known, that the servant has not capacity enough to understand the warning and appreciate the danger, he will be liable for an injury which such servant may suffer in consequence, if continued at such work."

In determining the question whether an employee understood a warning of the dangerous character of machinery it is proper and necessary to take into consideration, not only his youth and inexperience, but also the nature of the service, and the degree to which his attention while at work would need to be devoted to its performance. Kling v. Ford River Lumber Co. (1892) 93 Mich. 172.

A boy sixteen years old is presumed to have sufficient intelligence to comprehend instructions as to the danger of crossing a railroad yard by creeping under cars which may be moved at any moment. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Eggman (1895) 59 Ill. App. 680.

c. Constructive knowledge of dangers, when a bar to an action by minor servants.

See also VI. b.

It is well settled that "in respect to all matters wherein a young and inexperienced employee is competent to understand and avoid the dangers, such employee stands upon the same footing with an experienced adult." Levey v. Bigelow (1893) 6 Ind. App. 677; Goff v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (1888) 86 Fed. Rep. 299; De Graff v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1879) 76 N. Y. 125; Crown v. Orr (1893) 140 N. Y. 450; Jones v. Roberts (1894) 57 Ill. App. 56; White v. Wittmann Lithographic Co. (1892) 131 N. Y. 631; Hayden v. Smithville Mfg. Co. (1861) 29 Conn. 548; Herdman-Harrison Mill. Co. v. Spehr (1893) 145 Ill. 329; Probert v. Phipps (1889) 149 Mass. 258; Gilbert v. Guild (1887) 144 Mass. 601; Luebke v. Berlin Mach. Works (1894) 88 Wis. 442; Samborn v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1886) 35 Kan. 292.

Negligence, therefore, cannot be predicated of an employer's omission to instruct a minor servant, who knows everything that the employer could have told him. Couillard v. Tecumseh Mills (1890) 151 Mass. 85.

An instruction which, in effect, requires the master to caution a minor as to all dangers 44 L. R. A.

reasonably to be anticipated is incorrect. Fones v. Phillips (1882) 39 Ark. 17, 43 Am. Rep. 264.

That it is immaterial for the purpose of this rule from what source the knowledge is derived, see the cases cited in subd. II. supra, some of which, as noted, relate to minors.

It is, however, extremely difficult, if not impossible, to extract from the cases any definite and practical rule for determining the circumstances under which a capacity for comprehending the risk of the employment shall be imputed to a minor servant. As in cases involving the liability to adults we find some rather unsatisfactory attempts to impart precision to the subject by the use of such expressions as "obvious," "latent," and the like.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Boland (1892-93) 96 Ala. 626, 18 L. R. A. 260, it was said: "The duty of the master in cases of latent defects, to explain, is the same whether the servant be a minor or an intelligent adult; the difference being, however, that as great diligence in observing and comprehending the dangers is not to be expected of the young and inexperienced."

Minors, as much as intelligent adults, are held, on entering a particular service, to have assumed the ordinary hazards incident to such service, including the risks of injury from open defects in machinery and appliances. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Boland (1893) 96 Ala. 626, 18 L. R. A. 260.

Compare also May v. Smith (1893) 92 Ga. 95, to the effect that the necessity of warning an inexperienced boy of seventeen of the dangers incident to machinery at which he is set at work is not dispensed with by the fact that the machinery is in perfect order, where the danger is not open and obvious.

Minor servants are held to assume, by their contract of employment, those ordinary risks of their service which are obvious to them, or have been pointed out in a manner suited to the comprehension of their youth and inexperience. Beckham v. Hillier (1884) 47 N. J. L. 12; Smith v. Irwin (1889) 51 N. J. L. 507.

Compare also Williamson v. Sheldon Marble Co. (1893) 66 Vt. 427 (apparent); Crowley v. Pacific Mills (1889) 148 Mass. 228 (obvious); Downey v. Sawyer (1892) 157 Mass. 418 (obvious); Buckley v. Gutta Percha & Rubber Mfg. Co. (1889) 113 N. Y. 540; Crown v. Orr (1893) 140 N. Y. 450 (plain and obvious); Tolledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Trimble (1893) 8 Ind. App. 333 (open and obvious); Fones v. Phillips (1882) 39 Ark. 17, 43 Am. Rep. 264 (patent). (The actual substance of the above-cited decisions is noted elsewhere. See illustrative cases in this subdivision, infra.)

But the apparent simplicity and exactitude of such terminology are entirely delusive.

Obviously the line between dangers apparent and latent varies with the varying experience and capacity of the servant employed. Risks and dangers that are apparent to the man of long experience, and of a high order of intelligence, may be unknown to the inexperienced and ignorant. Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Erickson (1893) 12 U. S. App. 260, 55 Fed. Rep. 943, 5 C.C. A. 341.

The principle laid down in some cases, that, where the servant is a minor, there is no presumption that he understands and appreciates the ordinary dangers of the employment, takes us on to somewhat firmer ground. Wolski v. Knapp Stout & Co. Co. (1895) 90 Wis. 178; Evansville & R. R. Co. v. Maddux (1893) 134 Ind. 571.

In Hayes v. Colchester Mills (1894) 69 Vt. 1, it was said that the length of time a boy has been employed in a factory, the nature of the work he had been engaged in, and the knowledge he had acquired of the machinery, are all matters to be considered by the jury, but afford no basis for a conclusion of law, where the question is whether he should have received instructions as to the danger of certain unfamiliar work which he was suddenly called upon to do.

Compare De Losier v. Kentucky Lumber Co. (1892) 13 Ky. L. Rep. 818, where it was laid down that the jury should be instructed [in every case involving the liability of a master to a minor servant] to find for the plaintiff, unless his age, intelligence, and experience were such as to induce a man of ordinary care and prudence to believe him qualified and fitted for the business at which he was employed."

The limits of a minor servant's presumptive knowledge are further defined in the following passage in which the supreme court of Missouri considered the doctrine to be well settled by the authorities "that although the machinery, or that part of it complained of as especially dangerous, is visible, yet if, by reason of the youth and inexperience of the servant he is not aware of the danger to which he is exposed in operating it or approaching near to it, it is the duty of the master to apprise him of the danger, if known to him." Dowling v. Allen (1881) 74 Mo. 13, 41 Am. Rep. 298.

So, also, it has been said that the mere fact that an inexperienced minor might, by using his eyesight, have observed the peril to which his injury was due, will not enable his employer to defeat his claim for damages on the ground that he was guilty of contributory negligence. Hill v. Gust (1876) 55 Ind. 45; Haynes v. Erk (1893) 6 Ind. App. 332.

These statements, as will be remarked, embody the distinction so often applied in cases of this general type, between a knowledge of the material, physical conditions which may produce danger and an appreciation of the danger itself.

But on the whole the true and only reasonable view would seem to be that the minority of the servant is merely one of the circumstances to be considered in determining whether a knowledge of the danger in question shall be imputed to him. In the last analysis, therefore, it would seem that the only rule which can be profitably utilized for the solution of the problems which are involved in this class of cases is the very general and elementary one which, under our system of procedure, controls the settlement of every question of fact. That rule has been thus stated in the present connection.

Ordinarily it is within the function of the jury to say whether a minor servant comprehended a work in such a sense as to absolve the employer from the obligation to instruct him. It is only when the proper inference from the testimony is so clear as to be free from doubt, that it becomes a matter of law for the court. Wolski v. Knapp-Stout & Co. Co. (1895) 90 Wis. 178.

The finding of the jury is of course conclusive, whenever there is a conflict of evidence as to whether a minor has received proper instructions, or has by experience or in any other way acquired a knowledge of the danger incident to the appliances he is handling. Tagg v. McGeorge (1893) 155 Pa. 368.

But the widely different views entertained by judges as to the precise position of the boundary line between the functions of courts and juries in passing upon the proper inference to be drawn from certain groups of facts have, as will be seen from the following sections, produced in cases of this class an unusually prolific harvest of conflicting decisions.

d. Circumstances to be considered in determining whether knowledge of a danger is to be imputed to a minor.

The question whether a minor is chargeable with that complete comprehension of his environment which is sufficient to relieve the master of the duty of explaining to him the peril of the work must obviously be resolved by considering: (1) the presumable extent of his intelligence and capacity, as inferable simply from his age; (2) the actual extent, observed or observable, of his individual intelligence and capacity, exceeding or falling short of the average; (3) the extent of his opportunities for ascertaining by experience the nature of the hazard incurred by him in entering and continuing in the employment. Of these three factors in the problem, the first and the third are much the most important. But the second has, though rarely, been taken into account, in connection with the others, as corroborating the conclusion that the master should or should not have instructed an infant. Possibly it may be said that a court will be more disposed to lay stress upon this factor when the evidence tends to show the possession of a measure of intelligence less than the average and the inference will therefore be rather in the plaintiff's favor, than when it would have the effect of prejudicing him by making the superiority of his faculties a ground for ascribing to him a knowledge disabling him from maintaining an action. See Connors v. Grilley (1892) 155 Mass. 575, noted below in sec. e, ad finem.

Before proceeding to state the decisions upon specific groups of circumstances, it will be convenient to notice some general doctrines which have been laid down with respect to the age and experience of minors as an element bearing on the master's liability.

In order to lay a foundation for imputing fault to an employer merely by reason of the servant's minority, the latter must adduce evidence showing that the employer had knowledge of the minority, or, because of his appearance, was put upon inquiry as to his age. This rule is important in cases where the servant is approaching his majority, and has the stature and appearance of an adult. See Youll v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. (1885) 66 Iowa, 346.

Thus it has been laid down that if a servant was believed to be twenty-one years old when he was hired, the master is not liable by reason of his minority, even if the employment was without the consent of his parents. Goff v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (1888) 36 Fed. Rep. 299.

A servant of the age of twenty years and four months is not so young as to be within the rule that minors must be warned of the danger of the service into which they are taken, and properly instructed as to the duties required of them. Vincennes v. Citizens' Gaslight Co. (1892) 132 Ind. 114, 16 L. R. A. 485.

So, an employer may put an employee nearly twenty-one years old at work on a circular saw, without other instructions than running through one or two sticks, where the employee states that he has run a circular saw a very little, but is not an experienced hand, but makes no direct request for further instructions. Wilson v. Steel Edge Stamping & Retinning Co. (1894) 163 Mass. 315 (verdict held to have been rightly directed for defendant).

Of course where a master is misled by an employee to believe he is of age, when he is in fact a minor, and his age contributes to an injury, he is not liable. McDermott v. Iowa Falls & S. C. R. Co. (1891, Iowa) 47 N. W. 1087.

By some courts, reasoning from the analogies of other branches of law, a somewhat arbitrary importance has been ascribed to the fact that the employee is under fourteen years.

Thus, it has been held that a servant thirteen years of age has not reached the age when a capacity to see and appreciate danger is presumed, the theory of the court apparently being that as to such a servant the duty of instruction was peremptory. Nelson v. Hillside Coal & I. Co. (1895) 168 Pa. 256.

But this theory seems scarcely consistent with sound principles, which rather point to the conclusion that the question whether in any particular case a minor was or was not of such tender age and limited mental and physical development and experience that some particular caution should have been given him respecting the dangers and hazards attending the work at which he is placed, are questions of fact peculiarly within the province of the jury. See Keller v. Gaskill (1894) 9 Ind. App. 870.

In determining the master's duty the inquiry is, What instruction does the servant appear to need? Is there reason to believe him ignorant of anything which, for his protection, he ought to know, or incapable of appreciating the risks from what he sees around him? In the absence of anything to show the contrary, the master has a right to assume that he knows those facts of common experience with which ordinary persons of his age and appearance are familiar. In hiring a boy twelve years of age and apparently of average intelligence, an employer is not called upon to tell him that, if he holds his hand in fire, it will be burned, or strikes it with a sharp instrument, it will be cut, or thrusts it between the teeth of revolving cog-wheels in the gearing of a mill, it will be crushed. From infancy and through childhood, as well as in later life, we are all making observations and experiments with material substances and every person of ordinary faculties acquires knowledge at an early age of those familiar facts which force themselves on our attention through our senses. Cirlack v. Merchants' Woolen Co. (1890) 151 Mass. 152, 6 L. R. A. 733.

In Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Smith (1894) 94 Ga. 107, it was held to be a proposition too plain for argument that there is no presumption of law that a minor more than fourteen years of age who applies for a position involving dangerous service is aware of the danger and needs no instruction.

Under appropriate circumstances presumptions as to the intelligence of a minor may be allowed to run backwards. A boy who is dull at fifteen was probably dull at fourteen. Hence, where an action for personal injuries received by a boy fourteen years old is brought upon the theory that he was put to work in a dangerous place without proper instruction, evidence that the plaintiff, who was a foreigner and was examined through an interpreter, had no memory, was not a bright boy, and had to be told once or twice before he understood, and that, if he was asked a question he would answer "something else," is admissible, although the witnesses only knew him after the accident. Laplante v. Warren Cotton Mills (1896) 165 Mass. 487.

In Leistriz v. American Zylonite Co. (1891) 154 Mass. 382, "two witnesses were asked whether the plaintiff [a boy eighteen years and eight months old] was 'above or below the average intelligence of a boy of his age.' . . . the questions were properly excluded. They did not go to the extent of showing that he was manifestly incapable of undertaking the risk without instruction, so that the defendant knew, or from his appearance ought to have known, that cautions and instructions were necessary. Cirlack v. Merchants' Woolen Co. (1890) 151 Mass. 152, 6 L. R. A. 733. The case does not call for any nice consideration of what might be shown in the case of a young child, or under other circumstances. It is enough to say that under the circumstances of the present case, in view of the plaintiff's age, and of his long examination as a witness in the presence of the jury, the questions were of no material significance."

The mere fact that a minor has had experience in the work from which the injury resulted is not a sufficient ground for barring an action based on the master's omission to communicate certain facts.

A charge, therefore, is erroneous which would relieve a master of liability for injury to his apprentice by reason of hidden dangers, on the sole ground that the apprentice has been in the shop long enough to make him acquainted with the dangers complained of, even if he has never instructed him as to such dangers. Reisert v. Williams (1892) 51 Mo. App. 13.

A servant may ordinarily be expected to know when his tools need repairs, but in the absence of experience and instruction a lad cannot be expected to know intuitively, or as fully as his experienced master; and it is reasonable that he should be warned against such deterioration of them as endangers his safety, especially when it is of such a nature as requires instruction to arrest his attention or excite his apprehension. Heavey v. Hudson River Water Power & Paper Co. (1890) 57 Hun, 339.

e. Illustrative cases in regard to the constructive knowledge of minor servants.

See also VIII. b, infra.

The result of the various rulings upon particular groups of circumstances will, it is conceived, be most clearly exhibited, if we bring together the cases which involve the use of the same or analogous appliances. This juxtaposition indicates in a very striking manner the utter absence of anything like uniformity in the views of the courts. That the practitioner may the more clearly realize the extent of the divergence, care has been taken to state the precise extent to which the appellate tribunals have undertaken to interfere with the verdicts of juries. The Massachusetts cases are especially suggestive as to the inconsistencies in which courts are apt to be entangled when they arrogate to themselves extensive powers in deciding issues of fact.

Injuries received from contact with unguarded cog-wheels.

The dangers of contact with moving cog-wheels being obvious even to a boy of twelve years, they need not be pointed out to him when he is ordered to put in place a cylinder belonging to the same machine. Buckley v. Gutta Percha & Rubber Mfg. Co. (1889) 113 N. Y. 540 (declaring that plaintiff should have been consulted, the evidence showing that he was injured owing to an accidental slip).

On the same grounds a verdict has been held to have been rightly directed for the defendant where a servant sixteen years old was injured by coming into contact with moving cog-wheels the same day that he began work. Downey v. Sawyer (1892) 157 Mass. 418.

In Sullivan v. India Mfg. Co. (1878) 113 Mass. 306, where the defendant had a verdict, the court remarked, in discussing the correctness of the charge given by the trial judge, that, where a boy fourteen years old is injured by moving cog-wheels, it is competent for him although he obeys the order, to show that the employer was negligent in exposing him to perils which he was incapable of appreciating without proper instructions.

In Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. (1869) 102 Mass. 572, 3 Am. Rep. 506, the plaintiff had introduced evidence tending to show that at the time of the injury he was less than fourteen years old, and had been in defendant's service but a single day; that he knew nothing about machinery and had never been in a similar employment before; that his work consisted in filling cans with strands of hemp, poured out in a continuous stream from a drawing machine, which required his constant attention, in a room containing many such machines, and in which the noise was two or three times as loud as in the railroad cars; that he had to see that the strands went into the can, press them down and fill the can, and then break off the strand and remove the can to the place where it was required for the next process, and set another can under the machine for the repetition of the operation; and that he had been instructed, and, in the condition of the work at his machine at the time, it was necessary, to break off the strand by taking it in both hands and separating the fibres by drawing it apart between the hands, which would naturally occasion him to extend his arms and hands in such manner as to bring his fingers very near to the cogs of another drawing machine also in full operation, in plain view indeed, but without any guard, and by the side and somewhat in the rear of the place where the plaintiff would properly stand in tending his machine—thus producing a danger which had not existed in the place where he had worked on the single previous day of his employment in the defendant's service, and which, as he testified, no one had pointed out to him or cautioned him in regard to; and that, while standing in his proper place, tending and watching his machine, and in breaking off the strand with both hands after filling the second can, his left hand was caught in the cogs of the next machine and badly injured. This evidence it was held, warranted the jury in finding that "he was manifestly incapable of understanding and appreciating the danger to which he was exposed by the gearing, or manifestly incapable of performing the work there with safety, and that, taking the machines as they were in the places they were in, the defendants were guilty of negligence in setting a boy to work in that place without proper and reasonable precautions that he should be so informed and instructed, in regard to his work there, and the danger to which he would be exposed, as to enable him, with proper care and attention on his part, to avoid that danger." It was remarked, however, that the case was one very near the line.

In Cirlack v. Merchants' Woolen Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 182, the court held, as a matter of law, that no negligence could be predicated of the master's failure to instruct a boy twelve years of age as to the danger of contact with revolving cog-wheels in a room where he had been working for two months. (Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. (1869) 102 Mass. 572, 508, 3 Am. Rep. 506, was distinguished on the ground that the plaintiff there had only been at work one day, and that, under these circumstances, the evidence of the nature of the work, and the position in which he was to do it, warranted a finding that he was incapable of appreciating the danger).

The verdict for the plaintiff in this case being set aside, there was a second trial upon a somewhat different theory, and another verdict for the plaintiff was sustained (1890, 151 Mass. 152, 6 L. R. A. 733), on the ground that the case was for the jury, because the master was aware that the boy possessed less than average intelligence, and had sent him on an errand requiring haste, to a dimly lighted place, where the cog-wheels were likely to catch his clothes, and because the plaintiff, although he had worked in the room which contained the cog-wheels and was undoubtedly familiar with them in a general way, had never worked so near them as to have had occasion specially to consider the risk of getting his clothing caught in it.

In White v. Witteman Lithographic Co. (1890) 58 Hun. 381 (1892) 131 N. Y. 631, a verdict for the defendant directed by the trial court was affirmed in a case where an un-instructed boy thirteen years old was injured, after working three months, by placing his hand where it came into contact with moving cog-wheels.

In Rummel v. Dilworth (1890) 131 Pa. 509, the plaintiff was a lad of about seventeen years, having very little acquaintance with the business or its dangers. He went into the employ of the defendants on Tuesday, and was injured on Friday of the same week. He was employed as a "drag-down," but was hurt while performing the duties of a "roller," in opening and closing the gate between the first and second pairs of rollers. The cog-wheels by which the rollers were moved were covered along the whole length of the train, except at the point over which Rummel had to reach to open and close the gate. If they had been covered at that point the accident could not have happened. The court said: "In view of the youth and want of experience in the business on the part of Rummel, it was necessarily a question for the jury whether his employer had sufficiently warned and instructed him about the dangers of the employment, and how to avoid them, or had done all that was reasonably necessary to protect him from injury."

In Nadav v. White River Lumber Co. (1890) 76 Wis. 120, a verdict for the plaintiff was upheld, in a case where the injury was received only five days after the servant began work, on the ground that the owner of a sawmill who hires an inexperienced youth nineteen years of age to do work which requires him to keep moving along a narrow alley-way only 19 inches in width, with revolving cog-wheels behind him is bound to warn him as to the nature of the perils to which he will be exposed.

Whether a boy ten years of age, who was injured by being caught in uncovered machinery, had a sufficient understanding of the hazard of the employment to bar his recovery was held to be a question for the jury, in Hayden v. Smithville Mfg. Co. (1861) 29 Conn. 548.

The following instructions formulated in Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. (1869) 102 Mass. 572, 3 Am. Rep. 506, were expressly approved in Sullivan v. India Mfg. Co. (1873) 113 Mass. 396, as "carefully guarding the rights of employers and employees," in a case involving facts similar to the above. "Upon the new trial of the case at bar, the jury should be instructed that the defendants had the legal right to run their machinery without fencing or boxing it, unless by so doing they exposed persons in their employment, or other persons who came upon the premises by their procurement or invitation, to danger of which they gave no sufficient notice; that if, by the fact that the cogs were in sight, and the danger from them apparent, the jury should be satisfied that the plaintiff had reasonable notice of the peril to which he was exposed, and, understanding it, chose to undertake the employment which exposed him to it, he cannot recover; but that, if, on the other hand, they should be satisfied that the defendants knew or had reason to know the peril to which he would be exposed, and did not give him any sufficient or reasonable notice of it, and if he, without any negligence on his own part, from inexperience or reliance upon the directions given him, failed to perceive or appreciate the risk, and was injured in consequence, they would be responsible to him in this action."

Injuries caused by saws.

A minor sixteen years old was held to have been rightly nonsuited in an action to recover damages for injuries caused by the contact of his hand with a buzz saw, where his own testimony shows that he had operated such saws long enough to know their nature and the dangers attending their use, and was therefore in the same position as if the master had informed him of the dangerous character of the machine. Ogley v. Miles (1893) 139 N. Y. 458.

The case should be taken from the jury where a youth eighteen years old is seeking to recover on the ground that he should have been instructed as to the danger of allowing his fingers to come in contact with a buzz planer. Such a danger is obvious to a much younger boy. Mackin v. Alaska Refrigerator Co. (1894) 100 Mich. 276.

In Smith v. Irwin (1889) 51 N. J. L. 508, a verdict against the employer was allowed to stand, where he had failed to instruct as to the dangers of a circular saw a youth of seventeen years who had had no experience in the use of such a machine.

Where a youth seventeen years old, who has had an experience of several years in sawmill work, is injured a day and a half after beginning to use a circular saw in a manner which he declares to be unfamiliar, it is for the jury to say whether he knew or ought to have known of the particular danger incident to such use. Hanson v. Ludlow Mfg. Co. (1894) 162 Mass. 187.

Whether an employer is negligent in failing to instruct a boy sixteen years of age as to the dangers of removing a tub placed underneath a rapidly revolving saw to catch the scraps and sawdust which fell from it is a question for the jury. Barg v. Bousfield (1896) 65 Minn. 355.

In Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Erickson (1893) 12 U. S. App. 260, 55 Fed. Rep. 943, 5 C. C. A. 341, it was declared that, as to a boy of fifteen years, the fact that the revolving knives of a wood-working machine create a strong suction tending to draw articles into them is a latent danger, with respect to which he is entitled to instruction. (The judgment was reversed on the ground that the trial court had not asked the jury to say whether there was actually a suction).

See also the subsection relating to the cleaning of machinery, infra.

Injuries caused by machines for cutting.

The risk of injury in obeying an order to hang a hood in front of the knives of a planing machine, at a distance of 8 inches from them, is obvious to an employee nineteen years old after three weeks' work and therefore assumed, as a matter of law, by him if he obeys the order without instructions. Crown v. Orr (1893) 140 N. Y. 450.

In Palmer v. Harrison (1885) 57 Mich. 182, a case of injury to a boy of sixteen, caused by contact of his hand with revolving knives of a jointer, it was held that a verdict for the defendant had rightly been directed, inasmuch as, upon the testimony of the plaintiff himself, and the undisputed fact, no notice or warning could have helped him. The court said: "[He] the plaintiff was in his seventeenth year; had resided several years . . . [at the place where he was injured]; had known the defendant and his place of business for years. Had worked in the shop where the jointer was located for two weeks previous to receiving his injury, and had seen the machine in which the accident occurred every day during the period, both standing still and when in use; knew all about its location and use, and worked about it every day. He was not engaged in its use at the time, and was doing nothing calling or requiring him to be in any place in dangerous proximity to the jointer. The revolving knives were in plain view, and open to the observation of all persons coming near them. The plaintiff also says in his own testimony he 'knew the jointer was there;' that if he came in contact with the running knives they would be likely to hurt him; that if he had looked at the jointer he would have known whether it was running or not; that he did not look at it because he supposed it was still; that if he had not placed his hand (which had a mitten on) on the table in which the jointer worked, he would not have been caught; that he 'did not pay any attention to whether the jointer was going or not;' if he 'had known he was going to get hurt he would have looked out for it. It was an accident.'"

In Adams v. Clymer (1893) 1 Marv. (Del.) 80, it was left to the jury to say whether the manipulation of a pony-planer with knives running at the rate of 3,500 to 4,500 revolutions a minute involved dangers which were latent as respects a youth sixteen years of age after two and a half months of experience in the use of it.

In Fones v. Phillips (1882) 39 Ark. 17, 43 Am. Rep. 264, the court reasoned upon the assumption that it was for the jury to say whether recovery could be had by a boy of fourteen years who had been instructed as to the proper manner of operating a planer, but was injured through allowing his hand to come into contact with the knives while he was removing chips, a position which required him to work with his back to the machine, and which involved a danger as to which he had received no caution. The verdict for the plaintiff was, however, reversed because the trial judge had told the jury that the master owed a duty of instruction as to all dangers reasonably to be anticipated, and made no exception in regard to patent dangers.

In Connors v. Grilley (1892) 155 Mass. 575, a girl seventeen years old was set to work in the afternoon by her employer, without instructions, on a machine for skiving leather, and she undertook to run it as another operator had done. It was not unusual for the machine to be stopped by the leather catching in it, and the rule was that a workman should then be called. She called this workman the next day and he relieved the machine. A few minutes later she called him again, and, upon his relieving the machine, he swore at her in her employer's hearing, and told her, "If this machine gets stuck again, fix it yourself." She was going to ask a few questions of her employer, but he shook his head and hands, and refused to listen, saying, "No, no, no, if you do not work fast, I will send you home." This frightened her and she worked faster, and when the machine was stuck again she tried to relieve it, as she had seen the others do, and was injured. In an action against the employer for such injuries, the evidence was that she was a very dull girl, and was slow in her work as compared with the other girls; and she was cross-examined at great length before the jury. It was held that the questions whether the defendant was negligent in thus setting her to work, and whether she was in the exercise of due care, were properly submitted to the jury.

A verdict for the plaintiff has been set aside on the ground that an employer is not negligent in setting to work on a hay cutter an employee twenty years old, of ordinary intelligence, without warning and instruction, the danger of permitting one's finger to be caught in a tuft of hay about to pass between the knives being, as to a person of that age, perfectly apparent even though he has never done any work of the same description before the day when the injury is received. Stuart v. West End Street R. Co. (1895) 163 Mass. 391.

Injuries caused by revolving cylinders or wheels.

Negligence will not be imputed as a matter of law to an employee thirteen years of age, injured by having her arm caught between two cylinders of a mangle revolving toward each other, upon the ground that the danger was obvious. Kilkeary v. Thackery (1895) 165 Pa. 584.

An employee fourteen years of age and of less than ordinary intelligence, who was injured while obeying peremptory orders to assist in operating a machine with revolving cylinders at which he was not employed to work, the danger attending which was partially concealed from his view, cannot be said, as a matter of law, to have failed to exercise due care. Patnode v. Warren Cotton Mills (1892) 157 Mass. 283 (distinguishing earlier cases in which the danger was obvious and known to plaintiff).

In Kaillen v. Northwestern Bedding Co. (1891) 46 Minn. 187, the contention of the plaintiff, a boy fourteen and a half years old, was that it was negligence to put him without experience to work on the machine without cautioning him and explaining to him the danger of allowing his hand to come in contact with the revolving rollers; while the contention of defendant was that this danger was self-evident to anyone who used his senses: that, in the exercise of ordinary intelligence, even this boy ought to have known that if his hand came in contact with the rollers it would be drawn in, crushed, and otherwise injured, just as happened in this case; that no amount of instruction on part of defendant would have communicated to plaintiff any knowledge regarding these dangers which he had not, or should not have, already acquired by the use of his senses. The court said: "At first sight the position of defendant seems plausible; but, when we consider the fact that the surface of the rollers was smooth, and the space between them very small, we think it not improbable that there may be a great many boys, and even men of ordinary intelligence, without experience with machinery, and with a limited knowledge of the principles of mechanics, who, while knowing and seeing that the rollers drew in wool compressed almost to the thinness of paper, would yet, like this boy, fail to realize or appreciate that they would suddenly compress and draw in, as quickly as it came in the slightest contact with them, an object like the hand or fingers, many times thicker than the aperture between the rollers. This, in our opinion, is the controlling consideration in this case, and one which fairly distinguishes it from the case of Berger v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1888) 39 Minn. 78, and other cases cited and relied on by defendant. While the facts do not make out a very strong case for the plaintiff, yet we are not prepared to say, as matters of law, that the defendant owed this boy no duty to caution him as to the danger of allowing his hand to come in contact with these rollers, and that he ought to have understood this without being told."

A verdict for the plaintiff, a youth of twenty years, was set aside in Nugent v. Kaufman Mill Co. (1895) 131 Mo. 241, where, after working for six months near machinery with moving rollers, he allowed his hand to be drawn between them, and asked for damages on the ground that this was a danger as to which he should have been instructed. The court said: "It would be a thing of folly to say that defendant was negligent because he failed to tell the plaintiff, a young man twenty years of age, that the revolving cylinders or rollers onto which he had been feeding wheat and sweepings from the mill floor, for six months, in order that it might be pulverized to flour, would be dangerous to the hands if they came in contact with them."

A servant nineteen years old is presumed to appreciate a danger so "open to the senses" as that of putting his hand between the rollers used to flatten boiler-plates. Berger v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1888) 39 Minn. 78 (verdict for plaintiff on theory that instructions should have been given, set aside).

A verdict has been set aside, which found a master negligent in failing to instruct a minor fifteen years old, who had been working four days at the time when he was injured through allowing his shirt sleeves to rest on the rough surface of the card-cloth on the revolving cylinder of a carding-machine, the result being that the sleeve, and with it his arm, was drawn between the rollers. Truntle v. North Star Woolen-Mill Co. (1894) 57 Minn. 52.

A boy fourteen years of age and of ordinary understanding, who has for three weeks been familiar with the operation of machinery with revolving wheels, must be taken to know that his hand will be injured if allowed to come between the wheels. Patnode v. Warren Cotton Mills (1892) 157 Mass. 283.

A master is, as a matter of law, free from negligence in failing to give instructions to a youth who has worked for six months on a machine substantially the same as that which caused the injury, and nearly one month on the latter, in reference to the danger of injury from allowing his hands to be caught between a roll of cloth and one of the cylinders between which it has to be passed. Crowley v. Pacific Mills (1889) 148 Mass. 228 (verdict for defendant should have been directed).

The fact that a girl fourteen years old, who is injured by having her hand drawn between the ironing rollers in a laundry, has received no instructions as to the dangers of the work, will not entitle her to recover, where, at the time of the accident, she had been feeding the machine for a period of six weeks. Hickey v. Taaffe (1887) 105 N. Y. 26 (holding that plaintiff should have been consulted).

It is for the jury to say whether a girl of fourteen years, hired to feed paper to a mangle in a paper mill, should be instructed how to perform the work. Allen v. Jakel (1898, Mich.) 4 Det. L. N. 937, 73 N. W. 555.

A master is not bound to give an intelligent boy of fifteen years warning that his hand, if inserted too far between a belt of felting and a hot cylinder over which it runs, will be drawn in and brought into contact with the cylinder. Locock v. Franklin Paper Co. (1897) 169 Mass. 313.

In Grizzle v. Frost (1863) 3 Fost. & F. 622, a case involving facts similar to those in the cases just cited, Cockburn, Ch. J., left the determination of the employer's responsibility to the jury, charging them as follows: "I am of opinion that if the owners of dangerous machinery, by their foreman, employ a young person about it quite inexperienced in its use, either without proper directions as to its use or with directions which are improper and which are likely to lead to danger, of which the young person is not aware, and of which they are aware; as it is their duty to take reasonable care to avert such danger, they are responsible for any injury which may ensue from the use of such machinery." (This ruling was never questioned in any court of review.)

In De Souza v. Stafford Mills (1892) 155 Mass. 476, the court held that, upon the whole case, a verdict for the defendant should have been directed, where the plaintiff, who was a foreigner nineteen years old, speaking no English, and had been working only sixteen days, had his hand drawn into the roller of a beater picker and mutilated by the beater which revolved at a high rate of speed behind the rollers. The evidence was declared not to support the contention of plaintiff's counsel that his client had stopped the rollers before attempting to clear them of the cotton which was clogging them, but that, on the contrary, there was an absence of testimony that would authorize a jury in finding that the plaintiff's hands were not drawn in by the rollers. Since this danger was obvious and the plaintiff also knew that the beater revolved in close proximity to the rollers, the principle was applicable that it is not a breach of duty to omit to give instructions as to elements of danger which may be appreciated by a person of the plaintiff's age after a brief period of experience in the work.

Evidence that there was a shadow over the box of a wheel which a boy sixteen years of age was examining when his hand was drawn into the wheel is admissible as part of the res gestæ, and as a fact to be considered in determining whether the boy observed, and therefore assumed the risk, and whether the master was negligent in not guarding the wheel and in not warning the plaintiff of danger. Kucera v. Merrill Lumber Co. (1895) 91 Wis. 637.

Injuries caused by shafts and beltings.

A court will not disturb a verdict which finds an employer who fails to give an inexperienced servant seventeen years of age, special instructions as to the dangers of coming into contact with a set-screw in a revolving shaft, guilty of negligence where he orders him to perform an act connected therewith. Keller v. Gas-kill (1894) 9 Ind. App. 670; second appeal (1898) 20 Ind. App. 502.

In Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. v. Comgan (1890) 46 Ohio St. 283, the court affirmed a verdict absolving from the charge of contributory negligence a youth fourteen years of age who, without instructions, had been put to work in close proximity to a revolving shaft from which hung a loose belt, the result being that he was caught in the belt while performing one of his duties and whirled round the shaft.

It is error to give an instruction which permits the jury to find for a minor servant over fourteen years of age, and with six months' experience, provided they find that he was directed to go up a ladder and put a belt on a pulley without being notified of the danger of doing so. It cannot be assumed that a person of that age and that experience is incapable of forming a judgment as to the risks of such an act. Greenway v. Conroy (1894) 160 Pa. 185.

It is for the jury to say whether instruction should have been given, where a boy of fourteen years, who had previously been engaged in a spinning room in such general work as was suited to his capacity, was required to take his stand on an ordinary stepladder, and hold a belt away from a revolving shaft, to prevent it from crawling while it was being mended, the position thus occupied being one in which he was exposed to a considerable draught of air produced by the rapid motion of a large drum and the belt which connected it with the gearing of a water-wheel. Hayes v. Colchester Mills (1894) 69 Vt. 1.

To let a young man of seventeen years, without experience, and to whom the foreman has given erroneous instructions, undertake the work of lacing a broken belt without stopping the shaft over which it hangs, is negligence for which the employer is responsible, where in consequence thereof the employee is caught in such belt and drawn around the shaft. Archbald v. Yelle (1897) Rap. Jud. Quebec, 6 B. R. 334.

Where a minor seventeen years old was engaged to work in a foundry, and after three weeks was injured through having his leg caught by a set-screw projecting from the collar of a revolving shaft, while he was shutting off steam from an engine, it was held that an instruction was proper which left it to the jury to say whether he was aware of the danger to which he was exposed. Dowling v. Allen (1885) 88 Mo. 293.

The fact that a boy of fourteen years, who had been employed in a factory to do such general work in the spinning room "as should be within his capacity," had been so employed about two years, and had a general knowledge of the machinery in the factory, raises no presumption, as matter of law, that he had such a knowledge of the danger of a service so essentially novel as the replacing of a misplaced belt, that he was not entitled to be cautioned and instructed in regard thereto. Hayes v. Colchester Mills (1894) 69 Vt. 1. "It is evident," said the court, "that this is not a case in which it can be said as matter of law that the service the plaintiff was called upon to render was or was not such as it was his contract duty to perform. This new service had come within the line of his employment if his advancing years and experience had prepared him to undertake it. It had not come within the line of his employment if it was still beyond his capacity. It was therefore proper . . . to treat the question of the defendant's negligence in requiring the service as depending simply upon plaintiff's capacity."

Injuries received in oiling or cleaning machinery in motion.

In Flak v. Central P. R. Co. (1887) 72 Cal. 38, the court said, arguendo, that it was the duty of a master to warn a child about twelve years of age as to the dangers of such work as cleaning a drill in rapid motion.

A boy twelve years old, employed to take lumber away from a flooring machine and load it on a wagon, who is injured in attempting, under orders of the foreman of the mill, to oil dangerous machinery while in motion and without proper instructions, may recover damages from his employer. Hinckley v. Horaszowsky (1890) 133 Ill. 359, 8 L. R. A. 490, 492 (verdict upheld). The controlling feature here was the essential danger of the work, not that it was outside the scope of the plaintiff's employment).

A verdict is not improper which declares an employer to be liable for injuries received by a girl thirteen years of age who testifies that she was not instructed as to the manner in which a wheel at the end of a spinning frame might be cleaned safely by giving a peculiar motion to another part of the machinery and thereby securing a partial revolution of the wheel. Glover v. Dwight Mfg. Co. (1888) 148 Mass. 22.

A court cannot say, as a matter of law, that a boy twelve years old does not need instruction as to the danger of having his hand drawn between cog-wheels, where his only experience had been with cog-wheels arranged in a manner much less likely to lead to an accident of that kind. Chopin v. Badger Paper Co. (1892) 88 Wis. 193 (a case where the plaintiff, after working for a year in oiling a single row of cog-wheels, was set to work upon a double row).

The danger incident to wiping the cogs of a gearing is not so plain and open to a boy of fourteen years, wholly unacquainted with the working or use of machinery, that he can be held, as a matter of law, to have assumed the risks attendant thereon, where he has received no caution or warning from the master. Nelson v. Marinette & M. Paper Co. (1890) 75 Wis. 579.

A complaint is not demurrable which alleges in effect that the plaintiff, a minor sixteen years of age, was without skill and experience in handling machinery, that this fact was known to the defendant, and that the plaintiff was injured by reason of his being set to work in wiping that machinery, without any warning as to the danger of doing this while it was in motion. White v. San Antonio Waterworks Co. (1895) 9 Tex. Civ. App. 465.

A verdict has been set aside by which it was found that an employee was negligent in having failed to caution an inexperienced youth nineteen years of age, who had been injured after five days of work, as to the dangers of allowing the ends of a piece of cotton waste with which he is wiping the top of a machine to hang down so that they are liable to be caught in uncovered cog-wheels revolving underneath. Atlas Engine Works v. Randall (1886) 100 Ind. 293, 50 Am. Rep. 798.

A complaint should be dismissed which is framed on the theory that a master was negligent in failing to instruct a youth of eighteen years, who has worked for him three years, as to the danger of cleaning a revolving shaft. Smith v. Martin (1891) 89 N. Y. S. R. 126.

Whether a boy fourteen years old fully appreciated the risks involved in oiling a machine with uncovered cog-wheels after working round it for six months is a question for the jury. B. F. Avery & Son v. Meek (1898, Ky.) 45 S. W. 355, holding that the general knowledge of the danger of the work which, as the court had declared on the previous appeal (1894, 96 Ky. 192), which must be imputed to the servant, did not necessarily imply that he realized the actual danger to which he was exposed in doing the act from which the injury resulted.

The rule under which a master is required to instruct a minor of tender years who is set to work on a dangerous machine has no application where a boy seventeen years old is injured by unfenced cog-wheels which he is engaged in oiling, after he has been already doing this work for a year and ten months. Sanborn v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1886) 35 Kan. 292 (sustaining a demurrer to the evidence).

In Stewart v. Patrick (1892) 5 Ind. App. 50, it was held that a general verdict for the plaintiff would not stand where the jury had found specially, in answer to interrogatories, that the appellee was a bright, intelligent boy, sixteen years of age; that he had knowledge of the dangerous condition of the machine [a planer] he was operating, and knew that he must be careful in order to avoid injury; that he had received from the appellants some instruction and caution as to the use of the machine and its hazards, though not as much as they should have imparted to him; that he had been using the machine from five to eight weeks before the injury, and that he had no other experience in connection with such machinery; that he was hurt by the machine while wiping its platform, in front of the revolving knives, with pieces of cotton waste; that it was not necessary for the appellee to do this in the performance of his duty in operating the machine; that he knew how to stop the machine and could easily have done so; that he was not ordered or directed by the appellants to do the work in which he was so engaged when his fingers came in contact with the revolving knives."

Injuries caused by the operation of counterbalancing weights.

A jury is justified in finding that one who employs a boy between fourteen and fifteen years of age at a steam-power nunching machine is guilty of negligence in failing to notify him that, if he keeps his foot on the treadle, the press will keep coming down and going up, and to tell him how to take his work from the press after it is punched. Armstrong v. Forg (1895) 162 Mass. 544.

Whatever danger is incident to the work of removing the margins cut from calendars by a knife applied by hand, and suspended by a slowly operating counterpoise weight, is presumed to be apparent to a bright boy of fourteen years. Malsky v. Schumacher (1894) 7 Misc. 8 (dismissal of complaint held proper).

A minor fifteen years old, who, after working two and a half days, is injured while cleaning a hinged apron belonging to a cotton picker, which sprang up under the action of the weight by which it was held in a certain position except when it was pulled and kept down, cannot recover damages. Couillard v. Tecumseh Mills (1890) 151 Mass. 85. Holmes, J., said: "The plaintiff . . . knew that the iron apron which caught his fingers would spring back if pulled down and released. He knew its position relatively to the front opening, between the edge of which and the apron his fingers were caught. Knowing these facts, he knew that, if he put his hand through the opening and let the flap spring up while it was there, it would get pinched. He also knew by experience the degree of force necessary to hold the apron down. We do not see what the defendant could have told the plaintiff that he did not know before, if he possessed the ordinary intelligence of boys of fifteen." (Verdict for plaintiff set aside.)

Injuries received in the handling of lumber.

There is no presumption that a lad eighteen years old who has usually been employed as a cook in a lumber camp, but who, at the time of the accident, had been engaged for five days in "skidding logs," appreciates the danger of undertaking to stop a rolling log by a "back-cant." Wolski v. Knapp-Stout & Co. Co. (1895) 90 Wis. 178 (verdict for defendant set aside).

In Sims v. East & West R. Co. (1889) 84 Ga. 152, the court affirmed a nonsuit, where a youth seventeen years old was injured while loading a flat car with lumber of uniform length, after he had worked seven days in the railroad yard and helped to pile one car. Such work, it was said, required no special skill or antecedent training from which an obligation to instruct him could be implied.

Injuries received in the performance of a brakeman's duties.

In an action by an employee seventeen years old for personal injuries received while coupling cars, it is a question for the jury whether the service is so dangerous and its danger so obscure, or the plaintiff's information so limited or mind so immature, as to render it necessary that instructions should have been given before the injury. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Smith (1894) 94 Ga. 107. (The report does not state what experience the plaintiff had had.)

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Davis (1892) 55 Ark. 462, the court upheld a verdict holding the company liable for an omission to instruct a youth of eighteen years who had been injured, after working four months as a brakeman, through having his foot caught in an unblocked guard-rail.

In Yeager v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (1894) 93 Iowa, 1, a verdict was held to have rightly been directed for the defendant, where an uninstructed youth of nineteen years, who, to the knowledge of the company's officers, had had no previous experience, was injured on the day he began work while attempting to mount a moving car by the side-ladder.

It is error to direct a verdict for a defendant railway company where a youth who has received no instruction is injured on the day he begins work, while engaged in the performance of such a dangerous duty as the making of a "kicking switch." Williams v. South & North Ala. R. Co. (1890) 91 Ala. 635.

Injuries received in moving cars on a railway track.

A boy of nineteen employed in work which is in its nature hazardous, such as moving cars along a descending tramway from a coal mine to a place where the cars are emptied by machinery, should be warned of the cars becoming uncontrollable from the steepness of the grades. Alabama C. Coal & Coke Co. v. Pitts (1892-93) 98 Ala. 285 (complaint alleging these facts shows good cause of action).

In York v. Kansas City, C. & S. R. Co. (1893) 117 Mo. 405, the duty of going with a push-car down a grade to fetch a load of ties was pronounced to be one "of the simplest character," and the trial court was held to have rightly directed a verdict for the defendant, where a boy sixteen years of age was injured in performing that duty, although the accident occurred on the same day that he began work.

Injuries received in mining.

In Jones v. Florence Min. Co. (1886) 66 Wis. 268, 57 Am. Rep. 269, the evidence showed that the plaintiff was less than fifteen years old when he entered into the employment of the defendant, and that up to the date of his injury he had been engaged above ground at work which was apparently not hazardous. There was no evidence that he ever before worked under ground in a mine, or that he was at all familiar with the dangers of such employment. That the work under ground was not considered proper work for a boy of his age to perform was a fair inference from the fact that the defendant's captain and pit boss both testified that they had forbidden him to go down into the mine for any purpose. The other evidence showed that the mine was a dangerous place to work in, from the fact that blasting was constantly going on in it, and that the consequence of such blasting was to loosen the ore and rock in the roof and sides of the mine so that there was danger from the falling of such ore and rock. The court said: "We are very clear that, upon the evidence in the case, the question should have been submitted to the jury, whether the plaintiff was at work in the mine at the time of the injury by the direction of the pit boss or of the captain of the mine; and, if so at work by such direction, then whether he was of sufficient age and experience, or had sufficient information from the captain or pit boss, or from any other source, to comprehend the dangers incident to such employment. Had the jury found that plaintiff was sent to work in the mine by the pit boss or captain of the mine on the day the accident happened, and that, from his age, inexperience, and want of information he did not comprehend the dangers attendant upon such employment, then the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover, although the injury was the result of the negligence of the miners who were his fellow servants."

Injuries received on ships.

In Williams v. Churchill (1884) 137 Mass. 243, 50 Am. Rep. 304, it was urged that the plaintiff was under age and inexperienced, and that the behavior of a loose end of a taut rope was a hidden danger. But as the plaintiff was over nineteen years old, had lived on the sea-shore all his life, had been to sea three summers, and had been on this boat four months, the time which it took his brother to become familiar with the duties on board and to get promoted, the court held that, taking these facts in connection with the nature of the employment which he had accepted, the master had a right to assume that the plaintiff knew how to handle a line, and to order him to do so without special warning or instructions, and that a verdict for the defendant had rightly been directed.

Injuries caused by the use of improper tools for a certain work.

A complaint is not demurrable which alleges in effect that the plaintiff, a minor nineteen years old, after being engaged in a machine shop for two years, was set to work at the repairing of an engine, that he was injured through using a cold chisel in a case in which a skilled mechanic would not have used it, that he had no experience which would have given him a knowledge of the correct method of doing the work, and that the defendant had never instructed him touching the same. Whitelaw v. Memphis & C. R. Co. (1886) 16 Lea, 391.

Injuries received in removing or replacing parts of a machine which is in motion.

The danger involved in attempting to remove an inking roller from a printing press by getting within the frame of the press, while the belt through which motion is communicated to the machine is revolved on the loose pulley, and the shifter left unsecured, is open and obvious, and therefore presumed to be appreciated, without any instructions, by an employee seventeen years old, after he has been working round the machine for several months and has removed the rollers several times. Levey v. Bigelow (1893) 6 Ind. App. 677 (verdict for plaintiff set aside).

Where a boy twelve years of age, who has received no instructions as to the proper method of putting in its place a roller of a "scutching machine," is caught by a cog-wheel revolving close by, the question whether he is entitled to recover should not be taken from the jury. Vicary v. Keith (1873) 34 U. C. Q. B. 212.

Injuries received owing to the deterioration of appliances.

A nonsuit should not be granted in a case where the plaintiff, a boy fifteen years of age, without any previous experience, fell into a vat of heated liquor, owing to the fact that the end of a wooden pole had become soggy with use and slipped on the surface of a movable pipe which he was pushing. Under such circumstances the jury might properly find that he ought to have been instructed as to the proper treatment of the pole in case the end should become soft. Heavey v. Hudson River Water Power & Paper Co. (1890) 57 Hun, 339.

Injuries received through losing one's footing.

In Casey v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (1895) 90 Wis. 113, it was held that a verdict should have been directed for the defendant on the ground that there is no negligence in omitting specially to instruct a youth eighteen years of age that, if he loses his balance while running a wheelbarrow along "a narrow plank over a pit about 12 feet in depth, he may fall off and be hurt.

In Willifamson v. Sheldon Marble Co. (1893) 66 Vt. 427, a verdict was held to have been rightly directed for the defendant where a boy of sixteen years (experience not stated) had been killed through the "apparent" danger of slipping on a sheet of ice which had formed on a rock in a quarry.

An employee sixteen years old cannot be said, as a matter of law, to know of the peril to which he is exposed where he is sent up to a platform on which there are boards liable to turn over, where he had never been sent there before, and is not cautioned in regard to the danger. Mullin v. California Horseshoe Co. (1894) 105 Cal. 77.

The failure of a master to caution a boy of sixteen years who is operating a punching machine, against the danger from the slippery condition of the floor, does not render him liable for injuries to the boy's hand from its coming into contact with the lever by which the punch was released as he attempted to save himself from falling when his stool which he placed in a tilted position slipped on the floor, where the condition of the floor and the danger from slipping were perfectly apparent. Koehler v. Syracuse Specialty Mfg. Co. (1896) 12 App. Div. 50.

VI. What knowledge of scientific facts is imputed to servants (adults and minors).

a. In the case of adults.

The obligatory knowledge of the servant is not limited to facts which are ascertainable by the direct use of the senses. Everyone old enough to fill a position in which wages can be earned is presumed to be acquainted to some extent with the properties of matter and the laws to which it is subject. How far the presumption should be carried will, of course, depend, not only upon the nature of those facts, whether simple or recondite, with a knowledge of which it is sought to charge the servant, but upon his opportunities for acquiring that knowledge, and upon his capacity for utilizing that knowledge. Each case, therefore, must be decided with reference to the actual circumstance which it involves, the lines upon which the investigation should be conducted being indicated by the subjoined illustrative rulings.

On the one hand, a servant of mature age and of experience is charged with knowledge of obvious dangers, and of those things which are within common observation and are according to natural law. In such a case the knowledge of both parties is equal, and the master need not give warning of possible danger. Mississippi River Logging Co. v. Schneider (1896) 34 U. S. App. 743, 74 Fed. Rep. 195, 20 C. C. A. 390.

The rule as to the duty of instruction does "not require the employer to become responsible to the servant for any injury he might receive while in the employment of the master, 44 L. R. A.

resulting from those dangers which are the subject of common knowledge, or which can be readily seen by common observation. Such risks, and the danger therefrom, are always assumed by the servant when he engages in the service." Smith v. Peninsular Car Works (1886) 60 Mich. 501.

The effects produced upon various materials, under different conditions, by the operation of a familiar physical law like that of gravitation is presumed to lie within the knowledge of at least every adult employee. Hence a master is not under the duty of warning a servant that a clay bank will fall when undermined. Griffin v. Ohio & M. R. Co. (1890) 124 Ind. 826; Railsback v. Wayne County Turnp. Co. (1894) 10 Ind. App. 622.

Nor that the sides of a trench dug in an embankment of made ground are more likely to cave in than the sides of a trench in natural soil, the line between the fill and the natural soil being perfectly plain owing to a marked difference of color. Carlson v. Sioux Falls Water Co. (1895) 8 S. D. 47.

This rule, however, is modified to the extent of necessitating the submission of the case to the jury, where, by reason of some peculiarity of the soil which is undergoing excavation the danger is increased to an unusual degree.

"It is true," said the court in Thompson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1883) 14 Fed. Rep. 566, "that, ordinarily, every person of mature years and common intelligence is bound to take notice of the law of gravitation, and is presumed to be aware of the danger that earth in an embankment, when undermined, will cave in and fall. But the amended complaint avers that the particular embankment at which Olsen was employed was peculiar and unusually dangerous by reason of the character of the earth; and that this peculiar and extraordinary danger was known to Cavanaugh, and was not communicated to Olsen. These allegations being admitted by the demurrer, I am of the opinion that a question is presented for the consideration of a jury, and that therefore the demurrer must be overruled."

The result of imputing a knowledge of the effects of the law of gravitation is also observable in the ruling that there is no obligation to warn a laborer that a water-pipe may roll off the blocks on which it is laid when one of its ends is raised by a lever. Johnson v. Ashland Water Co. (1890) 77 Wis. 51.

So, a shoveler in a sugar refinery cannot hold his employer liable on the ground that he was not warned against such an apparent danger as that of falling through holes in sugar bins over which the sugar may have formed a crust. Bohn v. Havemeyer (1899) 114 N. Y. 296, affirming (1887) 46 Hun, 557.

The danger that a stake used for pushing a car along a track adjoining the one from which the power is applied may slip or break is so obvious that an employer cannot be held liable for failing to warn the servant of it. Watts v. Hart (1893) 7 Wash. 178.

On the other hand, when the danger to be avoided depends upon the operation of certain chemical laws which are known only to men who have received a special training, the obligation to instruct arises in all cases where the master has good reason to believe that the servant has not had such a training.

Such a danger is that which is due to the expansive force of steam generated by the fall of molten metal upon a sheet of ice. Smith v. Peninsular Car Works (1886) 60 Mich. 501. The court said: "I do not think the court can presume that the common laborer in a foundry or machine-shop, such as this was, is possessed of the scientific knowledge necessary to enable him to comprehend and avoid any such danger as overtook Mr. Smith on that icy way, resulting in his death; and I think, before he was called upon to perform the hazardous undertaking by Mr. Hoban, the foreman in charge, he should have been informed somewhat of its dangerous character. This, however, was not done, and there is no pretense that the death of Mr. Smith was not caused by the explosion which followed the contact of the molten iron with the water and ice covering the dangerous passage over which the same was required to be carried."

In Rilliston v. Mather (1891) 44 Fed. Rep. 743, it was held that this case "was rightly decided and is not in conflict with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States."

A few years previously a like conclusion had been reached by another Federal court which allowed a servant to recover on the ground that his master had not warned him as to the danger to which he would be exposed by the contact of hot clay with water. McGowan v. La Plata Min. & Smelting Co. (1882) 3 McCrary, 393, 9 Fed. Rep. 861. The following passage from the opinion is worth quoting: "It is contended that the rule cannot be applicable to the case at bar, as it relates only to facts withheld from the servant, and not to instruction in the principles of natural philosophy. The water in front of the furnace and the act of overturning the hot slag, may have come of the negligence of the plaintiff. Indeed, the evidence points to that conclusion; and the explosion which followed was the natural result of which plaintiff should have been informed: or, at all events, defendant was under no duty to inform him. This is the argument against the verdict. And certainly, within limits, the law will assume that everyone has knowledge of destructive forces in the world and the powers of the earth and air. Of such is the knowledge that comes to every man of sound mind, in the ordinary course of his life, that fire will burn; that water will drown; that one may fall off a precipice; and the like. Recently in this court it was said of one who mounted a push car on a railroad, and went down a steep grade to his hurt, that, knowing the grade, it was his own folly not to heed the law of gravitation; because it is known to all men of sound mind and of all degrees of intelligence that wheeled vehicles go down hill with increasing speed if left to themselves. And in this case the jury were told that the plaintiff could not have recovered for a burn caused by spilling the slag on himself. But the explosive power of hot slag when cast into water is not within the intelligence of ordinary men. It is doubtful whether many people of education know the force and violence of such an explosion; and, if fully informed, how many of them, when put to service at a smelting furnace, would recall their learning without a suggestion from some source."

So, also, the tendency of a "boll" of molten iron to explode when punctured is one which is latent as to an inexperienced person. Holland v. Tennessee Coal, I. & R. Co. (1890) 91 Ala. 444, 12 L. R. A. 232. The court said: "The evidence tended, in some degree, to show two distinct elements of danger incident to the work, upon which the plaintiff's intestate was engaged when the injury was suffered—one open to ordinary observation, and capable of being measured and judged of by men of no special knowledge or instruction in the premises; and the other latent in character with nothing which could be seen and understood by the unskilled and uninstructed to give warning of its presence, or suggest means of avoiding it. The 'boll' of iron, while its lower part had sunk down considerably—2½ or 3 feet, may be—into the earth, yet protruded above the surface, and was visible to those engaged in cutting the trench. It was common knowledge, appreciable by inexperienced as well as experienced persons, that, if the ditch was open entirely up to the melted mass, its bottom being below the lowest estimated point of the 'boll' the iron would immediately flow into and along the trench, thus imperiling those who should be in there at the time. This was the open and unobscured danger, which was sought to be guarded against by leaving a wall of earth between the trench and the 'boll' of from 8 to 12 inches thick, the purpose being to break down this wall by piercing it with a long crowbar after the laborers had left the trench. Of such a patent danger there was no duty on the defendant to give the employees warning. The other peril arose from the fact, supported by a tendency of the evidence here, that a 'boll' of iron upon being punctured, and having its shell broken, bursts, and throws out molten metal in all directions—'explodes,' as some of the witnesses stated as to this one, though this term was said to be inapt and inaccurate by others. Of this peril—the danger of the flying molten iron—resulting from unseen and unappreciated conditions and forces, the inexperienced man would know nothing by the exercise of his senses. It was a state of things which would not address itself to his comprehension, and of which he could only come to a knowledge by being instructed in regard to it. We are of the opinion that plaintiff's intestate and his fellow servants should have been advised of this latent danger, when they were put to work so near the 'boll' as that the lack of ordinary prudence and care on their part might not only have started the flow of iron into the trench,—this they could see, and perhaps could have escaped from,—but also have instantly enveloped them in the flying metal, which they could not anticipate, and from which there was no time to escape"; citing Smith v. Peninsular Car Works (1886) 60 Mich. 501.

Similarly, a knowledge of the dangers arising from the formation of poisonous fumes in the process of manufacturing chemicals cannot be imputed to a common laborer hired to do the mere drudgery of the establishment. Wagner v. H. W. Jayne Chemical Co. (1892) 147 Pa. 475. This case was decided on two grounds: (1) That the danger was not so obvious that the defendant could be said, as a matter of law, to have been free from negligence in exposing the plaintiff to the fumes without proper warning; (2) that the plaintiff could not be said, as a matter of law, to have been negligent because he had on a former occasion quit work, saying, "I can't stand this," there being nothing to show that he knew the fumes would do him a permanent injury,—especially where he was assured by the master's representative that the fumes were not injurious.

The court distinguished Beltenmiller v. Bergner & E. Brewing Co. (1888) 22 W. N. C. 83, a case in which the servant was injured by a jet of ammonia, on the ground that there the plaintiff knew the danger to which he was exposed, having previously tested it, and retreated; and that the superintendent merely assured him, at the time he was ordered to return to work, that the ammonia was not so bad as it had been, thereby impliedly admitting the existence of some danger. As the plaintiff must have observed that this statement was not true as soon as he entered the room, the real state of facts being apparent to the dullest apprehension he was properly deemed to have assumed the risk.

It cannot be presumed, as a matter of law, that the danger from the sudden recoil of a trolley-wire when it is cut is known to an inexperienced man in such a sense that his employer is free from negligence in failing to inform him as to the proper manner of cutting and removing the wire. Walker v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1895) 104 Mich. 808, citing Smith v. Peninsular Car Works (1886) 60 Mich. 501.

The fact that a considerable suction is produced by a cooling fan is one not readily ascertained except by a person possessed of special knowledge, and a servant who is hired merely to oil such a fan should therefore be warned of the danger to which he will be exposed if he puts his arm in a place where it will be affected by the suction. Swift v. Fue (1896) 66 Ill. App. 651.

In Mather v. Rillston (1895) 156 U. S. 391, 39 L. ed. 464, one of the grounds on which the employer was held liable was that he had not notified the plaintiff of the danger that dynamite might explode from overheating or the jarring of machinery.

In Saxton v. Hawsworth (1872) 26 L. T. N. S. 851, Willies, J., referred with approval to an unnamed case in the court of common pleas, where the master was held liable for his omission to inform the servant of the dangerous character of a carboy of nitric acid which he was employed to carry.

b. In the case of minors.

A blacksmith who fails to warn an apprentice fifteen years old of the danger arising from heaping fresh coal on the furnace without the precaution of taking measures to prevent the gases thereby generated from escaping into the bellows is liable for injuries to him from the bursting of the bellows by such gas. Reisert v. Williams (1892) 51 Mo. App. 13.

A complaint is not demurrable, which alleges that the employer, knowing that the clothing of a young and inexperienced boy had become saturated with dangerous and inflammable oils and gases in the course of his employment, ordered him to warm himself at a hot stove, not only without instructions as to the hazard arising therefrom, but with an assurance that his clothes were no more liable while in that condition to take fire than if wet with water, the result being that the boy's clothing ignited, and he was burned to death. Wallace v. Standard Oil Co. (1895) 66 Fed. Rep. 260.

In Latorre v. Central Stamping Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 145, the plaintiff's intestate had been burnt to death after working three days, by the ignition of a vat of turpentine into which it was his duty to insert heated spoons for the purpose of removing a coating of grease. The court said: "It may be that it was necessary to place them in the turpentine before they were entirely cooled, because in the latter case the grease would become hard and not to be so easily removed. But, at the same time, it seems plain that they should have been allowed to cool sufficiently to prevent any danger of igniting the turpentine. We think the jury might properly find that a mere boy of the age of the deceased [fourteen years] could not have been expected to know this danger and the means of avoiding it, and that he should have been instructed, not only to see that the spoons had sufficiently cooled before bathing them in the turpentine, but that he should have been given some practical standard for him to apply, or that there should have been some regulation or rule on the subject, and that the fire was caused by the failure to give such instruction or prescribe such regulation." 41 L. R. A.

VII. Duty to warn servant against transitory and sporadic dangers.

a. Introductory.

Questions analogous to, and yet in some respects unlike, those discussed in the case cited in the preceding subdivisions are presented, where it is sought to impose a liability upon the master for omitting to warn the servant against perils arising, not from a more or less permanent and continuous condition of the instrumentalities, but from the manner in which those instrumentalities are affected by isolated events which occur at intervals during the performance of the servant's work. The distinctive feature which is common to actions to recover for injuries caused by such perils is that the environment of the servant undergoes some temporary change. A warning appropriate to such circumstances may be given in the shape of a general instruction. It must, then, be such as to put the servant upon his guard, either by notifying him of the time and place where he may expect the change to occur, or by notifying him that within certain limits, the change may occur, at any time, and any place. Or the warning may take the form of some signal informing the servant that the change is imminent. In either case, the danger to be provided for will often be such that the servant's safety can be effectively secured only by directions in the nature of rules promulgated beforehand for the guidance of all the servants, both those who are to be protected against sporadic dangers and those whose acts may produce such dangers. This branch of our subject, therefore, must be studied with due reference to the doctrines which have been laid down in regard to a master's duty to provide a safe system for the carrying on of his business. See the note on "Rules," lately published in this series. (43 L. R. A. 305.)

It may be said, perhaps, that the essential distinction between the instruction which is contemplated by the decisions so far reviewed and the instruction which is contemplated by those about to be cited is that the former relates to the quality of the instrumentalities while the latter relates to their use. But the two classes of cases fade almost imperceptibly into each other, and the dividing line between them cannot be fixed upon this basis with any great precision.

The various doctrines invoked by the courts in determining the rights and liabilities of the parties seem to be merely different forms of the one simple principle, that the servant is entitled to warning only where the danger to which he is exposed is not one of those assumed by him, or, what is essentially the same proposition, if the circumstances are viewed more directly from the standpoint of the positive obligations of the master, the existence of a duty on his part to notify a servant of the approach of a transitory danger depends upon whether he was or was not justified in supposing that the servant possessed such information as would enable him to protect himself against that danger by the exercise of due care. Such inconsistency as may be observable in the decisions upon this point results, as in those reviewed from the diversity of opinion which prevails among judges as to the capacity of the servant for obtaining the requisite information. The rulings of the courts may be conveniently stated under three heads.

b. Cases involving customary methods of doing business and departures from such methods.

The master is not bound to warn the servant as to dangers arising from the customary way of doing business. A brakeman is bound to know that, among the cars for the storage of which a side-track may be used, may be some loaded with iron projecting over the ends. When, therefore, he is ordered to take certain cars out of a side-track, he must be on his watch for any cars of the description that may be standing there, and is not entitled to be warned as to their presence. Jackson v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1891) 104 Mo. 448.

Where the rules adopted by companies operating the largest portion of the railway mileage of the country do not provide for notifying the crews of different trains as to the whereabouts of each other's trains, the rationale of such omission being that the obligation of keeping a vigilant lookout at all times will tend to make employees more cautious and so diminish the risks of accident, a court is entitled to say, as matter of law, that it was not negligence to fail to give the engineers and conductors of an extra and a regular freight train notice as to the positions which they held relatively to each other at a certain point on the line. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Barry (1898) 56 U. S. App. 37, 84 Fed. Rep. 944, 28 C. C. A. 644.

The fact that in a few instances a railroad company has departed from its usual practice of allowing trains of the same class to run along the same section of track without notifying either of the other's movements will not justify the engineer of the following train in relying upon notice as to the position of the one in front. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Neer (1889) 31 Ill. App. 126.

So, where it is the established practice of a railway company, and such practice is known to trackmen, to run special trains without notice, they are not entitled to a special warning that a snowplow has been sent out over the division of the road on which they are at work. Olson v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1888) 38 Minn. 117.

In Perry v. Old Colony R. Co. (1895) 164 Mass. 296, where the plaintiff was injured by the "blowing down" of a locomotive underneath which he was working, it was contended that, when the foreman sent the plaintiff to do the job, he should have given notice to the engineer or fireman that he had been sent. But the court said: "Both the engineer and fireman knew that someone would be sent by the foreman to do the repair; and it hardly would seem necessary for the foreman to notify them that he had done what, in the ordinary course of things, they had every reason to expect he would do. There was nothing to show that there was anything unusual about the job, or manner or place of doing it. The place was dangerous, but the plaintiff knew that. He also knew that the engine would have to be blown down if a check was ground in, and that that was done over the asphalt as commonly as anywhere. There was no negligence on the part of the foreman in failing to notify the plaintiff of what he well understood himself. There was nothing to show that it was customary, when men were sent to grind in checks, to notify the engineer or fireman, or anybody else, of the fact, and that they must be careful about blowing down, or that it had ever been done before, or that anything was omitted in this case on which the men habitually relied or had a right to rely. There was testimony that the workmen looked out for themselves, as they needs must in many things. Some details a foreman may safely ignore, or leave to the men over whom he has charge. We discover no evidence of negligence on the part of Noyes [the foreman]."

On the other hand, where an employer has adopted a system for the purpose of notifying servants of the approach of a certain kind of recurrent peril, a departure from that system will render him liable for any injuries which a servant may receive in consequence of his having relied upon the receipt of the customary warning, and thus failed to keep as careful a watch out as he would otherwise have kept.

Hence, where employees are working in such a position that the sudden tightening of a cable is likely to injure them if they are not on their guard, the failure of the master's vice principal to warn them in accordance with a custom established by himself, that the cable is about to be tightened, is negligence for the consequence of which the master must answer. Richmond Granite Co. v. Bailey (1896) 92 Va. 554.

So, where the work of one employed in a saw-mill to remove and pile in the yard lumber as fast as it is sawed is such as to bring him upon a part of a platform frequently made dangerous by the descent of heavy timbers upon the platform from the saws above, with great velocity and at irregular intervals, it is negligence for the mill-owner, who had adopted a custom of warning the men of the coming of these timbers by means of a signal to omit the customary and cautionary signal; and it is not negligence for the employee, when engrossed in his work, to rely wholly upon the giving of such signal. Anderson v. Northern Mill Co. (1890) 42 Minn. 424.

In Anderson v. Ogden Union R. & Depot Co. (1892) 8 Utah. 128, the following charge was held correct: "If you find it was the custom and practice of the defendant, within and for a period previous thereto, to give timely warnings to the employees at such times only as earth was pushed down the bank, or when there was danger, and not at other times, and the plaintiff knew of this custom, and relied upon it, then the plaintiff would have a right to have expected such warning when danger was imminent from such cause, and he would not be expected to keep so constant a watch to detect danger, or so high a degree of care to avoid it, as he otherwise would be required to do at this time."

In Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Barber (1896) 17 Ky. L. Rep. 424, the court in commenting on the evidence which was held to justify the conclusion that the plaintiff's intestate, not being warned of a train's approach, and being near the track, if not upon it, attempted, in order to prevent a wreck, to remove certain obstructions and in this way was killed, owing to the fact that the men on the train failed to see him until it was too late to check up, said: "Warning signals had been given by this very train, prior to that time, of its approach to the place where the work was being done. This train passed there every day, and knew the necessity of giving notice of its approach, for the safety of the train and those on board, if not for the safety of the laborer. The trainmen evidently believed this to be their duty, and the deceased had the right to believe it would be performed, and, when hearing the alarm signal, in the attempt to prevent what might have resulted in a wreck of the train, as well as loss of life, lost his own life; and we think the evidence authorized a recovery, based on the alleged wilful neglect."

The same rule is applicable where the servant injured was in the employ of a person other than the defendant. Thus the employees of a contractor engaged, to the knowledge of a railroad company, in the grading of a new track alongside the main track, in such close proximity as to be liable to be struck by passing trains, are not bound to keep a constant lookout for approaching trains, where it is the uniform practice of those operating the trains to give warning of their approach. Erickson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (1889) 5 L. R. A. 786, 41 Minn. 500. The court said: "Although in the employment of a contractor and not of defendant, the plaintiff was lawfully at work along defendant's railroad, with its knowledge and by its authority. The character of his work was such that, under the facts, it owed him the duty of active vigilance to the extent of giving him signals, by way of warning of approaching trains, and he had a right to rely on its doing this, instead of keeping a constant lookout for himself, at least in view of the fact that the company had adopted and practised the custom of giving such warnings, and which he had every reason to suppose would be continued. Had plaintiff been employed by the defendant itself to work on its track, there probably would have been no question raised that defendant would have owed him this duty of active vigilance, and that he would have had the right to become engrossed in his work to such an extent as not to notice the approach of trains, and to rely upon the performance by the defendant of its duty to give him signals to warn him of the fact. But it can make no difference in principle whether a person be at work immediately upon the track or so near it as to be struck by passing trains. Neither does this duty depend, as appellant seems to claim, upon the fact that the person is a servant of the company, and the employees running the trains his fellow servants. It is a duty growing out of the fact that he is lawfully working there under the authority and with the knowledge of the company, and depends upon the general principles of law requiring the exercise of ordinary care not to injure another."

It is a breach of duty on the part of an engineer not to look out before starting his engine and give the usual signals for the purpose of warning any employee who may be working on the track. Britton v. Northern P. R. Co. (1891) 47 Minn. 340 (decision rendered in regard to an accident in Wisconsin where, under Wis. Anno. Stat. 1880, § 1816a, a railroad company was liable for the negligence of an engineer).

A usage which is itself an evidence of a want of due care cannot be utilized as a defense. Thus, a custom of moving an engine immediately upon the covers being placed over the man-hole after taking water, leaving the fireman to get down over the coal without signal to him, will not relieve the railroad company from liability to a fireman for personal injuries while getting down, occasioned by such movement, where the character, quantity, or location of the coal was such as to make his position unusually perilous, or where the engine moved more suddenly than usual. Knott v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. (1892) 84 Iowa, 462.

c. Perils due to transitory changes in the condition of the place of work.

See also VII. a, supra.

The implied engagement of an employer to make the service of the employee a reasonably safe one includes the obligation of providing "a safe place for the employee to work at or upon, and no order with respect to change of position of the subject of the work shall be executed without due warning to the employee." Stewart v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. (1889) 8 Houst. (Del.) 450. (From charge to jury in a case where the plaintiff recovered upon evidence showing that a car on which he was working was set in motion without warning, thereby causing him to be crushed between the top of the car and a girder).

with a pick to undermine a high embankment of earth does not, as matter of law, by continuing the work, assume the risk attendant upon the temporary absence of the superintendent, although he knows of his absence and that he is no longer watching the bank, since he has the right to assume that the superintendent will return in time to warn him of the danger of the bank's falling. Lynch v. Allyn (1893) 160 Mass. 248.

In McCann v. Kennedy (1896) 167 Mass. 23, "the plaintiff was at work upon a house in which the defendant was making some changes. He went up a ladder, stepped through a window, and then, in order to avoid a man who was working behind it, stepped to the left upon a joist which had been sawed nearly through for a well-hole, and fell. The plaintiff knew that the customary way to make well-holes was to lay the joists and then cut them out, and so far as appears, knew where this well-hole would be. It would be seen from the plaintiff's testimony that the joist had been cut very recently. Another witness stated, without contradiction, that he had cut it a moment before the accident, and had gone to get an axe to knock the joist out." It was held that the employer was not liable, the court saying: "The only ground on which the plaintiff could recover is that, while the joist remained it was a trap, and that he ought to have been warned. But the danger was momentary, and it would be impracticable to require employers to warn their men of every transitory risk when the only thing the men do not know is the precise time when the danger will exist."

Again, the rule as to the duty of the master to warn a servant about the hidden dangers of his employment is not applicable where the actual danger which caused the injury was due to a transitory occurrence of such a nature that the plaintiff must have known that it would probably happen from time to time. Flynn v. Campbell (1893) 160 Mass. 128, where the plaintiff, after four and a half years of experience in the work of wheeling coal from a coalshed to a fire room, was struck in the foot by a load of coal which had been dumped through a hatchway in the roof, after being discharged from a lighter, the position of which could easily have been ascertained, and whether it was ready to unload or not.

So, also, there is no duty to warn a servant as to the incidental use of appliances producing conditions which he could have ascertained merely by looking. Young v. Miller (1897) 167 Mass. 224, holding that a master owes no duty to give a servant who knows of the existence of a trap door, and that it is liable to be open at any time, notice or warning that it is open at any particular time.

This principle is especially applicable where the risk is not only transitory and obvious, but is essentially incident to the very work which the servant is ordered to do. Hence, an employer is not required in formal language to notify an employee sent into a room in which a flywheel has exploded to clear away rubbish, that no one has as yet examined the room to see that nothing is likely to fall upon him. Under such circumstances the servant has no right to assume that he is not the first to be sent into the room. Kanz v. Page (1897) 168 Mass. 217.

So, the fact that a roof will be in an insecure condition up to the time when a certain piece shall have been put in place is presumed to be known to one familiar with the construction. Campbell v. Mullen (1895) 60 Ill. App. 497.

In Burns v. Matthews (1895) 146 N. Y. 386, the court, in denying the right of a laborer to recover for injuries caused by the collapse of the walls of a trench, said: "Had the foreman known that the walls of the trench were likely to give way it doubtless would have been his duty to have warned Burns, but masters are not insurers against accidents, and they ought not to have extraordinary and unexpected burdens imposed upon them. They are required to be careful and prudent, and to exercise the care and caution over the men in their employ that careful and prudent men ordinarily exercise. A foreman, having fifty men under him, cannot be expected to keep his eye constantly upon every man and see that he does not step into a place of danger, nor can he, having the care of so many, be expected momentarily to think of every danger that may befall them. Each man is expected to have some judgment and care with reference to the preservation of himself from danger, and of necessity much has to be left to his care in this regard. Burns was not set at work upon a dangerous machine about which he had no knowledge, but instead he was directed to dig a trench for a sewer. He had done such work before, and so far as appears was a man of reasonable intelligence, and must have known something of the dangers of working in deep trenches without curbing. He was at liberty to select his own place to work in the trench, and he might have commenced where it was but a foot deep. He knew that curbing had been put in up to the manhole, and that it must have been the intention of the foreman to curb north therefrom."

d. Perils due to the recurrent movements of railway cars and other heavy bodies.

A class of cases involving features which to some extent resemble those presented by the decisions cited in the last two sections deals with injuries of a type very common in the great industrial establishments of modern times; injuries, that is to say, produced by the fact that some heavy object not under the control of some particular servant passes at intervals along certain lines through the space in which he is required to work. The special danger to be anticipated from such an event arises from the fact that the servant's coemployees whose duty it is to regulate the movement of the heavy object, be they ever so vigilant, will often find it impossible to save him from injury by a warning given immediately before the entrance of the object into the space where it was likely to come into contact with his person, and that the servant himself will often be unable, consistently with giving adequate attention to his duties, to keep a proper watch for the approach of the object. The situation, therefore, is one in which the highest degree of care on the part of the servants themselves cannot always avert a catastrophe, and in which the adoption of suitable precautions by the master is calculated to diminish very greatly the risk of such a catastrophe. Under such circumstances it is reasonable to infer the existence of an absolute duty on the master's part to make arrangements for imparting a timely warning to any servant who may be imperiled by such a cause.

Accordingly, we find it laid down that a master is bound to give a servant working in a place which may become dangerous by reason of perils arising from the doing of other work pertaining to the master's business, such warning of the additional dangers as will enable him, in the exercise of reasonable care, to avoid them or to guard against them, and such duty cannot be delegated so as to relieve the master from liability for negligence in its performance. Felice v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1897) 14 App. Div. 345, holding that a railroad company is liable for not providing a system of signals for 44 L. R. A.

warning the laborers in a tunnel of the approach of trains.

So, also, it is the duty of those operating a freight train which is being backed onto a switch to station a man on the rear car to warn employees rightfully on the track as to its approach, and it is no excuse for the failure to perform this duty that the rear car was a box-car, which did not conveniently admit of this precaution being taken. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Mahan (1896) 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1200. (See, however, the cases cited toward the end of this section.)

So, also, in a state where the doctrine of common employment has been abolished as regards railway servants, it has been held that a railroad engineer who knows that a brakeman is standing on the pilot to make a coupling is negligent in suddenly and without warning increasing the speed of the train when about 6 feet from the car to which the engine is to be coupled. Strong v. Iowa C. R. Co. (1895) 24 Iowa, 380.

The broad principle that the failure to warn in culpable where such failure may fairly be expected, in the normal course of events, to cause injury, has been relied upon as a ground for holding a conductor guilty of negligence, if, knowing that a sudden and unexpected starting of a train without notice to a brakeman engaged in coupling a car will probably endanger his safety, he orders it to be moved without giving warning to him. Purcell v. Southern R. Co. (1896) 119 N. C. 728. (It should be noted that a conductor is a vice principal in North Carolina.)

The following rulings also exemplify the principle:

Where it is essential to the safety of laborers, whose duties in the loading of a ship require them to be in the hold, that a "hatch-tender" should be stationed at the hatchway to warn them when bales of cotton are about to be thrown into the hold, it is the duty of the company to supply a person to be stationed at the hatchway for that purpose. Cheaney v. Ocean S. S. Co. (1893) 92 Ga. 726.

A jury is justified in finding a master guilty of negligence in employing a boy only thirteen years old to give the signals by which the operation of hoisting machinery is regulated, when the circumstances are such that the duty can only be performed efficiently by a person of prudence, caution, and constant watchfulness and attention to his duty. Molaske v. Ohio Coal Co. (1893) 86 Wis. 220.

In Greenwald v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. (1882) 40 Mich. 197, the liability of the defendant was denied on grounds thus stated: "The plaintiffs can fully prove that decedent knew that the locomotive was moving or about moving back, and it also shows that there was room enough for him to perform his duties without being hurt. But this is not all. The order to back up was a proper one beyond question; and as decedent was participating in the operations connected with the backing up of the locomotive and knew what was going on and what to expect, he does not seem to have stood in need of warning by bell or whistle. He already knew enough to admonish him to keep out of the way."

On the ground that a master "is not required to keep special watch over every employee, and warn him of common dangers to which he may be subjected in the performance of his ordinary duties," it was held in Ring v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1892) 112 Mo. 220, (1) that an engineer on a locomotive is not guilty of negligence in failing to stop the train, or warn of danger a section hand who stands in a safe position, several feet from the track, until after the engine passes, and (2) that a foreman of a gang of section hands is under no duty to warn each of them of the danger from each passing train, where they are so familiar with the work as to be presumably capable of looking out for themselves, and there is no unusual danger, and no rule exists imposing upon him such duty.

Compare Greenwald v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. (1882) 49 Mich. 197, referred to in X. infra. See, however, Turner v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (1895) 40 W. Va. 675, reviewed in X. infra, where another principle was applied to analogous facts with the result that the company was held liable.

This theory that it is not negligence to omit to warn a servant to take precautions which it may be presumed the servant will take without such warning has been made the basis of a ruling that the person in charge of a switch engine in a railroad yard, used for the purpose of moving cars, has a right to act on the belief that the various employees in the yard, familiar with the continuously recurring movement of the cars, will take reasonable precaution against their approach; particularly where the cars are moving so slowly that ordinary attention on their part would enable them to avoid them. Aerkfetz v. Humphreys (1892) 145 U. S. 418, 36 L. ed. 758.

This is also the principle which underlies the ruling that the starting of a freight train unexpectedly to a brakeman on the top of a car at the rear end of train, but not suddenly, violently, or negligently, gives him no cause of action for injuries caused by his being thrown from the train thereby. Johnston v. Canadian P. R. Co. (1892) 50 Fed. Rep. 886 (decided on demurrer).

As there is no duty to warn a servant against a danger which he can see and from which he can save himself, as well as the master himself, or anyone deputed by him, it has been held that a railroad company cannot be made liable for an injury to an employee, caused by backing and recoupling cars to another car which plaintiff is filling with water while standing upon a ladder leaning against it, on the theory that the company should have made a rule making it the duty of someone to warn him of the return of the cars, where plaintiff knew that they would return before the tank was filled, and by simply using his eyes could have avoided the danger. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Strycharski (1894) 6 Tex. Civ. App. 555.

So, also, as track repairing or track cleaning after a snow storm in the vicinity of moving trains is intrinsically a dangerous occupation, the fair presumption is, not only that men who engage in it take the risks of the employment, but that they are competent to keep themselves out of manifest and unnecessary danger. Hence, representatives of a railroad company have the right to assume that one of a gang of men employed to release a snow-bound train on one track will not place himself in danger of being struck by a train on another track 7 feet from the former. Nye v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1896) 178 Pa. 134.

The court in this case also relied on the consideration that it would under the circumstances have been impracticable for the division superintendent to have communicated any warning in regard to the movements of the passing train, as the men to be notified "might have moved 100 feet or a mile in ten minutes."

On the ground that, as the plaintiff had already received warning independently of signals, no other notice was required, it has been held that failure to blow the whistle of the engine attached to a construction train so that the hands thereon could prepare to protect themselves against the sudden jerk of the train in stopping is not imputable as wilful negligence, where they had been informed by the boss that the train would stop at that place, and knew where the train was before and at the time it stopped. Simmons v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1892) 13 Ky. L. Rep. 941.

The fact that a servant's failure to observe an approaching danger was due to a justifiable relaxation of his vigilance in consequence of his having relied upon receiving a warning from some other employee will under certain circumstances constitute a controlling element in cases of this kind. Thus, a section hand is not, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence, preventing recovery for injuries from being struck by a train while working upon the track in a stooping position, for the reason that he failed to keep a lookout for trains where he may have relied to some extent upon warning from the section foreman or from the engineers of approaching trains. Comstock v. Union P. R. Co. (1895) 56 Kan. 228. (Appeal was on demurrer to evidence. In Kansas a railroad company is liable for the defaults of the employees named).

VIII. What instruction and warning will be sufficient.

a. In the case of adults.

"The notice which the master gives to the servant must be such as to enable a person of his youth and inexperience to appreciate the nature of the danger." King v. Ford River Lumber Co. (1892) 93 Mich. 172.

Stated in the most general terms, the extent of the master's obligation in regard to imparting information to a servant is to give him "such instruction as will enable him to avoid injury unless both the danger and the means of avoiding it while he is performing the service required are apparent." Atlas Engine Works v. Randall (1885) 100 Ind. 293, 50 Am. Rep. 798.

Merely going through the form of giving instructions, by the employer, is not sufficient. Hickey v. Taaffe (1887) 105 N. Y. 26.

If the master relies on the fact that he admonished the servant of the danger which caused the injury, he must show that the warning was timely and explicit. Powers v. Calcasieu Sugar Co. (1896) 48 La. Ann. 483.

What particularity is demanded in the form of the instruction will, of course, depend upon the character of the risk and the presumed capacity of the servant for comprehending and acting upon the notification which he receives.

Considerable particularity would seem to be required in warning a servant as to the danger incident to handling dangerous chemical compounds. Thus, it is held not to be sufficient merely to notify a servant that Paris green is a poison. He should also be informed of the precise effects which it may produce in persons engaged in its manufacture, and also of the precautions necessary to be taken for obviating these effects. Fox v. Peninsular White Lead & Color Works (1891) 84 Mich. 676.

In some cases the test applied is whether risk was what is called patent or latent.

Thus, notice that a car received by a railroad company from another company, and directed to be returned as out of order, is out of order, is sufficient to a brakeman or switchman, unless the defects are not obvious and involve more than the usual danger to those employed in returning the car. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Meyers (1896) 46 U. S. App. 226, 76 Fed. Rep. 443, 22 C. C. A. 268.

And it is also held that a railroad company having had transient cars of other companies in its use or employment regularly inspected, condemned, and ordered to be sent to the shops for repair and had them regularly tagged so as to warn employees of that fact, has not fully discharged its obligation of due care towards one engaged in the performance of night service as a car coupler, unless the tags are of such size and character as to bring the condemnation of the cars to his attention, or he is otherwise informed of the fact. Meyers v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1897) 40 La. Ann. 21.

Provided it is understood that by the words "patent" or "hidden" or the like it is merely intended to signify that the risk is presumed or not presumed to be within the comprehension of a servant of a certain grade of intelligence, who has certain means of information within his reach, and that the question whether the servant appreciates the risk is therefore the one which is ultimately to be determined in view of all the circumstances of the case, no harm can result from the use of such vague expressions. (See III. d. supra.) But that they are likely to mislead if the essential significance is lost sight of is shown by the fact that two courts have reached diametrically opposite conclusions as to such a simple matter as to the extent of the duty to instruct a brakeman with respect to the danger of coupling foreign cars with double deadwoods.

On the one hand, it has been held that a brakeman twenty-six years of age and of average intelligence, who had never seen double deadwoods before he was injured, was insufficiently warned of the increased danger in coupling cars with such deadwoods which sometimes passed over the road by a caution that railroad-ing was dangerous, and that coupling cars is specially so, requiring very great care, where he was further notified that cars with different coupling apparatus are hauled over the line. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Boland (1892-93) 96 Ala. 626, 18 L. R. A. 260. The court said: "As to latent risks, the duty of the master is not discharged when he simply instructs the servant in a general way that the service engaged in is dangerous, and especially is this true where the servant is a person who from inexperience or want of education would not likely have knowledge of such latent risks. In such cases he should not only be instructed that the service is dangerous; but, where extraordinary risks are to be encountered, he should be warned by the master, as far as possible, of their character and extent, if known to the master, or should be known to him. But, as we have said, this duty is required only as to latent dangers or risks, and we know of no rule or principle of law that requires the master to give any express or particular instructions to guard against such dangers as are manifestly obvious."

On the other hand, we find it laid down in a case involving similar facts that a railroad company which merely warns a brakeman who is just entering on his duties that the business is highly dangerous, does not fully discharge its duty as to instructing him. He should be told in what the hidden dangers consisted, and how to avoid them. Reynolds v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1891), 64 Vt. 66.

The true doctrine, it is submitted, is that the master's obligation to instruct is or is not deemed to have been adequately discharged, according as the instruction given is such as will enable the servant to comprehend the proper steps which he should take in order to guard himself against the perils of his environment. This doctrine seems to be a necessary corollary 44 L. R. A.

from the fact that the object of imparting information to the servant is to put him on the same footing as a servant who, in consequence of his possessing certain knowledge, is held to have undertaken the responsibility of protecting himself against the risks to which such knowledge relates.

The master is only bound to give such instructions as are reasonably necessary in order to enable the servant to understand the perils to which he is exposed by reason of his employment. A servant is held to take the risk of such dangers as are known and understood. Cirlack v. Merchants' Woolen Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 182.

The master's duty to provide a suitable place for work may be modified by a sufficient warning of danger, so that, after it, an employee will be held to assume the risks of which he knows, and to which his attention has been directed. Houlihan v. New American File Co. (1890) 17 R. I. 141.

The notice which the defendants were bound to give the plaintiff of the nature of the risks incident to the service which he undertook must be such as to enable a person of his youth and inexperience in the business intelligently to appreciate the nature of the danger attending its performance. The question indeed on this branch of the case is not of due care on the part of the plaintiff, but whether the cause of the injury was one of which he knowingly assumed the risk, or one of which, by reason of his incapacity to understand and appreciate its dangerous character, or the neglect of the defendants to take due precautions to effectually inform him thereof, the defendants were bound to indemnify him against the consequences. Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. (1869) 102 Mass. 572, 3 Am. Rep. 506.

To what extent the master should enter into details in giving the instruction will therefore depend upon the presumed capacity of the servant to utilize the information which he receives intelligently and effectively for the purpose of securing his own safety. On the one hand, the obligation of the defendant is not discharged "by informing the servant generally that the service engaged in is dangerous; especially where the servant is a person who neither by experience nor education has, or would be likely to have, any knowledge of the perils of the business, either latent or patent, but that in such case the servant should be informed, not only that the service is dangerous, and of the perils of a particular place, but, where extraordinary risks are or may be encountered, if known to the master, or should be known by him, the servant should be warned of these, their character and extent, so far as possible." Smith v. Peninsular Car Works (1886) 60 Mich. 501.

Compare Chicago, Anderson Pressed Brick Co., v. Reinelger (1892) 140 Ill. 334, holding that a trial court had properly added to a charge a clause implying that the instruction must be so full that the servant actually understands and appreciates the danger.

The duty of instruction is not adequately performed unless the information respecting the dangerous qualities of the appliances is imparted in words devoid of ambiguity. Hence, it has been held that warning that a horse is vicious is not conveyed by the statement that it is "high-lived," since that expression is frequently applied to horses of the very opposite character. Wilson v. Sioux Consol. Min. Co. (1898) 16 Utah, 292.

On the other hand, it is not necessary that a servant should be warned of every possible manner in which injury may occur. He must examine his surroundings and take notice of obvious dangers and operations of familiar laws. Mississippi River Logging Co. v. Schneider (1896) 34 U. S. App. 743, 74 Fed. Rep. 195, 20 C. C. A. 390.

An employer is "not required to exercise the highest possible diligence to instruct the plaintiff in every conceivable particular of the circumstances in which he might be placed, or in every possible detail of his conduct in the performance of his duties. The requirement in this respect is only that the master exercise ordinary and reasonable care to see that the servant possesses a competent knowledge of the peculiar dangers to which he is exposed in doing his work, and of the precautions necessary to be taken to guard himself against those dangers; and in the exercise of that care the master has the right to assume that the servant brings to the work ordinary intelligence and powers of observation, and the capacity to learn something from observation and experience. . . .

Moreover, the duty to instruct against dangers incident to the work extends only to such dangers as are known to the master himself, or which are reasonably to be apprehended from the nature of the employment." Benfield v. Vacuum Oil Co. (1894) 75 Hun. 209.

An employer who "gives such general instructions and cautions as will enable the employee by the use of his intelligence to comprehend the dangers which threaten him in his work must be held to have discharged his duty," although he does not anticipate in advance every possible risk or accident. Thompson v. Edward P. Allis Co. (1895) 89 Wis. 523.

In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Clark (1883) 108 Ill. 113, the trial judge gave an instruction to the effect that it was the duty of the master to inform his servants of all danger in and about the premises where they are required, by his authority, to perform labor. The court said: "This was manifestly wrong. Railroad employees, as all the books lay down the doctrine, assume the ordinary risks and hazards of the employment. The presumption is that the employee understands the nature and dangers of the employment when he engages in the service, and if not, that he will inform himself. It would be wholly impracticable for railroads and manufacturers to employ men of experience to inform each of the hands that any particular act he is required to perform is dangerous. It would be ruinous to such bodies to hire a person to accompany every brakeman and other employees, to inform them of danger in the performance of every act of duty, or of the danger in the manner of its performance. It is impossible that the law can ever impose such requirements,—and that is what this instruction in substance asserts as a legal requirement."

In Flaher v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1893) 153 Pa. 379, the following instructions of the trial judge were affirmed: "There is another duty which the employer owes to a child or infant, and that is to inform him of the dangers connected with the services in which he is employed. If that information, taken in connection with what the employee must know from his personal and constant observation, is sufficient to enable him to understand clearly the dangers to which he is exposed, then that duty is discharged on the part of the employer."

In American Strawboard Co. v. Foust (1895) 12 Ind. App. 421, the contention of the defendant was that a general verdict for the plaintiff was inconsistent with the special findings to the following effect: "That appellee was over twenty-one years old, a person of ordinary intelligence, and in full possession of his senses, at the time he received the injury; that he had been warned, just prior to the injury, to be careful, to look out for his hand, and that he had been frequently warned of the dangers of passing the paper up between the dryers; that the dangers and perils of appellee's general employment, and of the particular task in which he was engaged when hurt, were apparent and obvious to a man of experience; that by reason of the peculiar condition of the machinery, and the appellee's inexperience in connection with the employment, the appellee could not have avoided the injury if he had paid closer attention to his work." The court, however, said: "Granting that the findings show that the appellee had been sufficiently warned of the perils and dangers attending the performance of his duties, it still remains true, as found by the general verdict, that he was ignorant of the nature of his work, and of the manner of the proper performance of the same. There is nothing in the answers returned by the jury to indicate that appellee had received such instructions as he should have been given in order to understand fully the character of the work he was to perform, and the proper manner of performing the same. It may have been true, therefore, that just prior to the injury the appellee was warned 'to be careful' and 'look out for his hand'; and yet, with the reasonable exercise of his faculties, he might still have been unable to so perform his duties as to avoid the danger. Simply warning the appellee of danger generally by the appellant did not excuse the latter from pointing out the particular danger of this employment, and to so instruct the appellee as to enable him to avoid such danger. Nor is the finding that the appellee was so warned in conflict with the implied finding in the general verdict that appellee did not receive any instructions from the appellant or its servants concerning the duties he had to perform and the dangers and hazards attending his employment, at the time of the injury. A warning to an ignorant and inexperienced man, under such circumstances, would be of little avail."

Sometimes a general instruction which will put the servant on inquiry and observation represents the standard of the master's duty. On the one hand, therefore, a person employed as a brakeman on a section of 4 miles of railroad, and notified that there were stone piles beside the road, and so near to it that a person on the side of a car passing them would be struck, is to be deemed to have assumed the risk from that cause, although the precise location of the danger was not stated to him. Smith v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. (1889) 42 Minn. 87.

On the other hand, a brakeman placed on a freight train on a road with which he is not familiar must be given sufficient notice of the danger of low highway bridges over the road to enable him, by proper attention and diligence, to learn where the points of danger are. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hall (1888) 87 Ala. 708, 4 L. R. A. 710.

Bulletin boards and placards, printed or posted, are proper methods of giving notice of such a danger to railroad employees, but not the only methods; and where a party has been expressly notified, he cannot complain that no placard or bulletin board was posted. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hall (1890) 91 Ala. 112.

A railroad company owes no duty to a brakeman in its employ to build a fence from a cattle guard to the line fence in order to give him notice of its existence. Fences are not supposed to be built in such places for this purpose, and a brakeman has no right to expect to receive information in such a manner. Fuller v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1896) 108 Mich. 690.

Whether a railroad company is under the duty of providing means for warning trainmen as to the proximity of low overhead bridges, such as "whipping straps" or cautionary lights, is a question to be determined by utility and the custom of well-regulated railroads. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hall (1888) 87 Ala. 708, 4 L. R. A. 710.

Whether the servant has been adequately instructed is a question for the jury. Reynolds v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1891) 64 Vt. 68.

At all events, when the testimony offered by the defendant is of an inconclusive character. Wolski v. Knapp-Stout & Co. Co. (1895) 90 Wis. 178.

It is merely necessary that notice of an unassumed danger should be given before the service involving it is required, not that it should be given at the time of the contract of employment, but where no notice was given at any time, a charge declaring that instruction fixing it shall be given at the time of employment is not prejudicial. Salem Stone & Lime Co. v. Griffin (1894) 139 Ind. 141.

Liability may, of course, be predicated from the giving of erroneous instructions, as from the entire omission to give any instruction. Owens v. Ernst (1892) 1 Misc. 388.

Where the issue is whether the plaintiff has been sufficiently instructed as to the dangers of a machine, evidence that the machine might at a slight expense have been set up so as to be less dangerous is irrelevant. Rock v. Indian Orchard Mills (1886) 142 Mass. 522.

b. In the case of infants.

To the case of infants the principles stated in the foregoing section are equally applicable in all essential respects, the sole distinction of importance being that, owing to the more restricted capacity of young persons for understanding the perils of their employment, the law implies an obligation to give them detailed and special instructions in many instances in which a general notification would have been an adequate warning to an adult.

It is impossible to lay down any inflexible rule applicable alike to all cases where minors are employed, as to what warning will be requisite; and, without doubt, in some cases even minors are not necessarily entitled to any warning at all as to the character of the machinery about which they are at work, or as to the proper method of operating it and avoiding obvious dangers. Much depends upon the nature of the machinery, the age, capacity, intelligence, and experience of the employee, as well as all the surrounding facts and circumstances. Davis v. Augusta Factory (1893) 92 Ga. 712.

A youthful employee must be instructed so fully, that, as a matter of fact, he actually understands and appreciates the danger. Chicago, Anderson Pressed Brick Co., v. Rehnneiger (1892) 140 Ill. 334, holding that the last clause was properly added to a charge.

Notice of danger is not enough. The child must have sufficient instruction to enable him to avoid danger. Wharton, Neg. § 216, quoted in Brazh Block & Coal Co. v. Young (1889) 117 Ind. 520.

In putting a person of immature years at work at machinery which in some respects may be termed dangerous, an employer is bound to give the employee such instructions as will cause him to fully understand the difficulties and dangers of his position and the necessity of the exercise of care and caution; and in such case mere formal instructions are not sufficient, but the person employed must be brought to an actual understanding of the dangers, and be made to appreciate them and the consequence of want 44 L. R. A.

of care. Ogley v. Miles (1889) 28 N. Y. S. R. 893.

The notice and instruction should be graduated to the age, intelligence, and experience of the servant. They should be such as a master of ordinary prudence and sagacity would give under like circumstances, for the purpose of enabling the minor, not only to know the dangerous nature of his work, but also to understand and appreciate its risks and to avoid its dangers. They should be governed, after all, more by the experience and capacity of the servant than by his age, because the intelligence and experience of men measure their knowledge and appreciation of the dangers about them far more accurately than their years. Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Erickson (1893) 12 U. S. App. 260, 55 Fed. Rep. 943, 5 C. C. A. 341.

The notice which the defendants were bound to give the plaintiff of the nature of the risks incident to the service which he undertook must be such as to enable a person of his youth and inexperience in the business intelligently to appreciate the nature of the danger attending its performance. The question, indeed, on this branch of the case is not of due care on the part of the plaintiff, but whether the cause of the injury was one of which he knowingly assumed the risk, or one of which, by reason of his incapacity to understand and appreciate its dangerous character, or the neglect of the defendants to take due precautions to effectually inform him thereof, the defendants were bound to indemnify him against the consequences. But in determining this question, it is proper and necessary to take into consideration, not only the plaintiff's youth and inexperience, but also the nature of the service which he was to perform, and the degree to which his attention, while at work, would need to be devoted to its performance. The obligation of the defendants would not necessarily be discharged by merely informing the boy that the employment itself, or a particular piece or machine in the building or room in which he was set to work, was dangerous. Mere information in advance that the service generally, or a particular thing connected with it, was dangerous, might give him no adequate notice or understanding of the kind and degree of the danger which would necessarily attend the actual performance of his work. Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. (1869) 102 Mass. 572, 3 Am. Rep. 506.

In Honahan v. New American File Co. (1890) 17 R. I. 141, the defendant requested the trial judge to instruct the jury that, if the boss told the plaintiff to put his files on a steam pipe to be dried at another place, and not to get on the tank into which he fell, and the boy disobeyed the order, by reason of which the accident happened, the jury should find a verdict for the defendant. The judge allowed this request, with the qualification that the warning or direction must have been such as to give notice of the danger. The defendant excepted to the qualification. The supreme court said: "We think the instruction as given was correct. The master's duty to provide a suitable place for work may be modified by a sufficient warning of danger, so that, after it, an employee will be held to assume the risks of which he knows, and to which his attention has been directed. It may also be modified, in some cases, by a disobedience of orders on the part of a workman. But this duty, in the case of children, is always to be considered with reference to their years and understanding. It is not to be expected that a child of eleven years will bear in mind and always follow a mere direction to put his work in one place, when he knows no reason why he may not put it in another place, near by, as well. Common experience teaches us not to look for such implicit obedience to orders from him as may be required from adults. The direction to a child, therefore, must be accompanied with such explanation of danger as to enable him to understand it."

In Taylor v. Wootan (1891) 1 Ind. App. 188, where the proof was that the servant was but twelve years of age at the time he was injured by coming in contact with a planer in connection with which he had been hired to work, and that he had worked but two days and a half for the appellant, and was wholly inexperienced in the operation and running of the machinery, the court held that, under these circumstances, it could not be declared, as a matter of law, that the employers absolved themselves from responsibility by simply telling the employee of the dangerous character of the machinery and warning him to keep away from it while it was in motion.

In Costello v. Judson (1880) 21 Hun, 396, where a boy of fourteen years possessing the average amount of intelligence was injured through allowing his foot to project beyond the platform of an ascending elevator, it was held that it was for the jury to say whether an instruction by the defendant's foreman to the effect that, if the plaintiff went on the elevator, "he must be careful and not fool with it," was sufficiently explicit.

Whether an employer had reasonable cause to believe that a boy fifteen years old needed more than ordinary instruction, and whether he had been misled in this respect by the boy's father, are questions for the jury. Laplante v. Warren Cotton Mills (1896) 165 Mass. 487.

In Bibb Mfg. Co. v. Taylor (1894) 95 Ga. 615, there was evidence of the fact that the plaintiff, a boy eight years of age, had been repeatedly advised that the machinery on which he was at work, consisting in part of rapidly-revolving cog-wheels, was dangerous, and that he himself knew it; and, under this state of facts, the jury was charged, in effect, that the mere notifying him through another employee that the machine was dangerous would not be sufficient to relieve the defendant, unless that employee pointed out to him in what the danger consisted. The court, in ordering a new trial, said: "The vice of this instruction consists in the expression by the court to the jury of an opinion upon the weight of the evidence. The question of negligence is one for the jury exclusively, and the law does not undertake to point out how, nor in what manner, a master shall instruct a minor servant in the handling of dangerous machinery. If, as in this case, the danger be manifest and obvious, the jury might have found, had they been free so to do, under the charge of the court, that no instruction at all was necessary, and if necessary, that the precautionary words of a coemployee were sufficient to apprise the boy of the danger to which he was then exposing himself, and in consequence of which he ultimately suffered injury. Whether such instruction would suffice, would depend to a very great degree upon the character of the machinery. If it were exceedingly intricate, invested with many latent dangers, a jury would probably find that a more detailed instruction was necessary than was given by the master to the servant in this case. But if it were a simple contrivance, easily understood, more general instructions might suffice to satisfy them. At all events, whenever the jury find that the master, with reference to this particular matter, has exercised ordinary and reasonable care, he is entitled to an acquittal."

A master is not bound to give a special caution to a boy every time he is sent on an errand which requires him to pass moving machinery the peril of which is obvious to a person of his intelligence. Cirrack v. Merchants' Woolen Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 182. The court said: "It seems to us that it must fairly be assumed that the plaintiff had all such knowledge as it was the duty of the defendant to impart to him. There was no peculiar or secret source of danger. Anybody seeing the machine in motion must soon become aware of the danger which would arise from coming in contact with it. The duty of the defendant would be sufficiently discharged by pointing out to the plaintiff the situation of the machine, and the rapid revolution of the wheels when in operation, and explaining the probable effect of touching them under these circumstances."

In Tinkham v. Sawyer (1891) 153 Mass. 485, the court was "unable to discover in this case any ground on which it can be held that the defendants are liable," under the following state of evidence. The plaintiff at the time of the accident was somewhat over sixteen years of age, and of at least ordinary intelligence, and had been in the employ of the defendants about a month. Up to the forenoon of the day before the accident, he had been attending to cards in the carding room of the defendant's mill. He was then set to work to help tend the machine on which he was injured, the accident occurring about the middle of the forenoon of the next day. He was told by the man who set him to work on it that the machine was a dangerous one, and not to touch it when in motion. This was repeated to him by the man who was running the machine. He himself testified that he knew the machine was dangerous when it was going, and that it was going at the time of the accident. During the day and more that he worked on the machine, he helped to clean it a number of times, and had therefore the knowledge thus acquired in addition to the warning and instruction which he had received. He had to sprinkle the wool with oil before it was put into the machine, and this made the floor very slippery, so that, as he testified, he had to walk carefully. It was a part of his duty to gather up the wool from the floor as it was blown out of the machine, and put it back, so that it would go through the machine again. The opening out of which the wool came was about 2 feet from the floor, and was 4 feet horizontally by 1 foot in height. Two or 3 inches inside of it was a large revolving cylinder with teeth in it. At the time of the accident he was gathering up wool from the floor so near to the machine, as he testified, that if he slipped he would go into it. He did slip, and his arm went into the opening and the injury complained of resulted.

In Pratt v. Prouty (1891) 153 Mass. 838, the danger to be guarded against was that the plaintiff's fingers while serving pieces of leather to the cylinders of a "skiving-machine" would be caught between them and drawn through against the knife. The court said: "This was an open and apparent, and not a hidden, danger. Not only were the cylinders and their movements plain to see, but their operation and effect, in drawing in against the knife whatever came between them were obvious, and were constantly demonstrated in their use. That the plaintiff was a boy of at least ordinary intelligence is manifest, and is not denied; and if he could fail to see and appreciate the danger, all the information and caution that was needed was given to him by the defendants, and his own evidence shows that he knew and understood the danger. He says that the defendants told him that, if he got his fingers in, he would get hurt, that he must look out about his fingers, and, what testimony was not needed to prove, that he knew that, if he put his fingers where the leather went, they would get caught as soon as the leather would. He said, indeed, that he did not realize the danger that it would draw his whole hand in. He may not have realized all the possible consequences of the danger, but that he knew and appreciated the danger of being hurt by having his fingers caught between the cylinders is obvious. That he was inattentive to his work, and careless, was not evidence that he did not know the danger. He was told, and knew, that if he was inattentive and careless he was liable to be hurt, and there was no evidence that the injury was not the result of his own want of care. There is no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants, and no evidence that the plaintiff did not know and appreciate the danger."

Partial instruction as to the danger of an environment will be sufficient to charge a minor with a sufficient knowledge and appreciation of the perils incidental to his employment, provided the perils as to which he received no instruction are such that a person of his age and intelligence ought to have understood them.

A boy nineteen years old, of ordinary intelligence, must be presumed to understand the danger of keeping hold of the shipper rod outside an elevator well, by which the elevator is set in motion, until the cross beam of the elevator catches his hand between it and the edge of the floor through which the elevator is descending, and cannot recover for an injury due to this cause, although he was not informed how near the cross beam passed to the edge of the floor in descending through it. Rood v. Lawrence Mfg. Co. (1892) 155 Mass. 590.

So, a youth of seventeen years who is injured because he attempts to adjust a piece of rubber in a vise without moving it back from a saw, where the danger is perfectly obvious and he has been warned to look out for his fingers, is guilty of such contributory negligence as to prevent recovery, even though he has not been fully warned of the danger. Burke v. Thomson Meter Co. (1892) 45 N. Y. S. R. 272.

c. As to sporadic and transitory dangers.

The danger of striking a person coming up from the hold of a vessel in swinging barrels into the hatchway requires, so long as shipwrights are at work in that part of the hold and their work makes it necessary for them to come on deck through the hatch into which the loading is going on, that means should be taken by those in charge of the loading to ascertain when some one is coming up the ladder, or that some one should be stationed at such a place near the hatch that those coming up may be properly and seasonably warned, and a general warning at the commencement of work is insufficient,—especially as to one who does not go to work until after it is given. The Pioneer (1897) 78 Fed. Rep. 600.

A railroad employee who cannot reasonably protect himself by watching out for the return of a switch engine with cars attached to be coupled to a car at which he is employed, while standing on a ladder resting upon it, is entitled to some warning other than a mere general instruction that he must look out for himself when the cars are switched against it,—especially when there is a change in the method of making up the train of which he is ignorant, whereby the cars come from a different direction. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Strycharski (1896, Tex. Civ. App.) 35 S. W. 851.

An employer who undertakes to give his employee warning of the approach of an engine and cars into a shed where the latter is at work is bound to give such warning as may be heard by a person of ordinary hearing, considering the distance between the person giving the warning and the employee. Mississippi Cotton Oil Co. v. Ellis (1894) 72 Miss. 191.

A railway company which knows that a large number of its employees are engaged in work requiring them to cross its tracks, and that there is a blinding snow storm at the point where they are working, and that trains pass such point at frequent intervals, is required to give such men something more than the usual warning given by an approaching engine. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Gilbert (1894) 51 Ill. App. 404.

The blowing of a whistle by the engineer of a railroad train 50 yards or more before reaching the place where the track is obscured by dense smoke for 250 or 300 yards is not, as matter of law, a sufficient exercise of care toward other employees who may be coming on the track from the opposite direction. Woodward Iron Co. v. Herndon (1896) 114 Ala. 191. (Action under Code, § 2590, subs. 5.)

A railroad company, having had transient cars of another company in its use regularly inspected, condemned, and ordered to be sent to its shops for repairs, and had them properly tagged so as to warn them of that fact, has not fully discharged its obligation of due care towards one engaged in the performance of night service as a car-coupler unless the tags are of such a size and character as to bring the condemnation of the car to his attention or he is otherwise informed of the fact. Meyers v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1896) 49 La. Ann. 21.

In Watson v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. (1883) 58 Tex. 434, the court, in discussing the sufficiency of the notice given to the servant under analogous circumstances, said: "If the usage of the company, in giving notice of such defect, consisted in chalking upon the car the words 'Out of order,' and placing them upon a side track for removal, then it will be held that appellant engaged in the service subject to such usage or custom, and if the notice in this case was given in the usual and customary manner, then it was sufficient. His incapacity to read the notice would not affect the result. He could only secure exemption from such usage or custom by contracting against it; for his incapacity to understand the nature and extent of the business he engages to perform is not chargeable to the fault of the company. It is immaterial whether such incapacity arises from a want of sufficient education to read and understand the purport of the usual 'Out of order,' or from want of skill in the performance of other duties pertaining to the employment."

When a minor thirteen years of age, employed to pick out the slate from coal cars after they have been run down an incline from the place of loading, has been told to be on his guard when cars are being run down, and also to be on his guard against the jerking of the cars when the train was being started, and is subsequently injured by being thrown off a car by the sudden impact of another car which has thus been run down against the one on which he is working, it is for the jury to say whether the master's duty of instruction has been sufficiently discharged. Fisher v. Delaware & E. Canal Co. (1893) 153 Pa. 379.

IX. No recovery by servant unless failure to instruct was efficient cause of injury.

The subjoined rulings illustrative of the principle which extends through the whole law of negligence, that an action cannot be maintained unless the defendant's want of care appears to have been the proximate or efficient cause of the injury complained of, are self-explanatory.

The master is not in fault in failing to communicate a fact which is immaterial to the servant's safety, and which, if he had known it, would not have affected his action. Henderson v. Williams (1891) 66 N. H. 405, where the court held that a verdict for the plaintiff based on the theory that the defendant's superintendent was negligent in not informing him that an unexploded charge which he was ordered to drill out had a wet fuse could not be sustained, as there was no evidence going to show either that it was more dangerous to extract a charge which had failed to ignite on account of the wetness of the fuse than one which had failed to ignite owing to one of the several causes from which such an occurrence may result, or that the method of extracting the charge would have been at all different if the nonexplosion had been due to some other cause than the wetness of the fuse.

A minor servant cannot recover on the ground that he was not instructed as to the dangers of his employment, where the injury resulted from a mere accident, from which no amount of cautioning would have saved him. Buckley v. Gutta Percha & Rubber Mfg. Co. (1889) 113 N. Y. 540. (Plaintiff slipped, and in making an instinctive movement to recover himself put his hand between revolving cog-wheels. Compare as to the facts, the case of Tinkham v. Sawyer (1891) 153 Mass. 485, cited in VIII. b. supra.)

A jury is justified in finding that the omission of a conductor to inform a brakeman of the fact that a draw-bar was broken was the proximate cause of an injury received by such brakeman, while making a coupling with it, although the conductor was no longer on the train when the accident occurred. Donahoe v. Old Colony R. Co. (1891) 153 Mass. 356. The argument by which the defendant undertook to support the theory, viz.: It was not to be expected that the plaintiff would attempt to uncouple the car without a specific order from the conductor,—was thus disposed of by the court: "The jury were not bound to assume that the conductor expected the whole work to stop because he had temporarily left the train for the purpose stated. The jury might well find that what was done by the plaintiff and the other men upon the train was done in the ordinary course under the circumstances, and that the injury to the plaintiff was a natural and proximate result of the omission to inform him of the broken draw-bar. It was admitted at the trial that the plaintiff 'was injured in attempting to uncouple the car from the engine, so that the engine might go and do something else.'"

The negligence of a master in putting a common laborer at work about a machine, without instructing him as to its operation, does not render him liable for an injury to the latter which does not result from his unskillfulness. Arizona Lumber & T. Co. v. Mooney (1895, Ariz.) 42 Pac. 952.

A master is not bound to give warning and instructions to a young and inexperienced servant concerning dangers of the employment, where they are of such a nature as to render injury very improbable, and only come from negligence which the master has no reason to expect. Siddall v. Pacific Mills (1894) 162 Mass. 378.

Negligence in failing to instruct a boy seventeen years of age as to the danger of his work cannot be predicated of a case where he falls off a hand-car in running it back to a switch to get out of the way of an approaching train, from which, as it has been properly flagged, the men on the hand-car are in no danger. If his fall was caused through his head being affected by his position, that is a result which the employer was not bound to anticipate. Briggs v. Newport News & M. V. Co. (1894) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 618.

Failure of a railroad company to give an employee at work on its tracks notice of the approach of a train, and the running of the train at a prohibited rate of speed, does not render the company liable for the death of such employee, where he at first got out of the way, and afterwards got in front of the engine when it was only a few feet distant. East St. Louis Connecting R. Co. v. Eggman (1895) 58 Ill. App. 69.

A boy about fourteen years old, who was injured by coming into contact with uncovered cog-wheels revolving alongside a narrow passage, through which his duties took him, is not entitled to have the jury charged as follows: "If no instruction was given the plaintiff as to the route in going to and from the machine at which he was injured, except 'to do as the other boy before him did,' and he did so and was injured, there was negligence on the defendant's part." It might have been that, though thus injured, he was injured by no negligence on the part of the defendant, but by negligence on his own part. Sullivan v. India Mfg. Co. (1873) 113 Mass. 396.

In Fordyce v. Yarrowborough (1892) 1 Tex. Civ. App. 260, a charge was disapproved which failed to indicate that the liability of a railway company for its negligent omission to inform its servants of extra hazards to arise from the use of a car of an unusual and more than ordinarily dangerous construction depended on whether such omission proximately caused the injury sued for.

A finding of the jury that the efficient cause of the injury was the plaintiff's own negligence will, of course, prevent him from recovery on the theory of the employer's breach of his duty to instruct. Adams v. Clymer, 1 Marv. (Del.) 80.

The same principle is assumed in many of the cases already cited, in which the defense raised was contributory negligence.

X. Duty of instruction considered with reference to the doctrine of common employment.

It is well settled that the duty of instruction, wherever it exists, is to be classed among the positive, absolute, or non-assignable duties of the master.

The master cannot escape the responsibility, if there was one upon him, of notifying the servant of the risks of the work by merely delegating it to one of the other servants, but if the duty thus delegated was performed the plaintiff had all the notice requisite for his safety. Sullivan v. India Mfg. Co. (1873) 113 Mass. 396; Verdell v. Gray's Harbor Commercial Co. (1897) 115 Cal. 517; Lebbering v. Struthers (1893) 157 Pa. 312; Felice v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1897) 14 App. Div. 345; Emma Cotton Seed Oil Co. v. Hale (1892) 56 Ark. 232; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Laack (1892) 143 Ill. 242, 18 L. R. A. 215; Atlas Engine Works v. Randall (1885) 100 Ind. 293, 50 Am. Rep. 798; Keller v. Gaskill (1898) 20 Ind. App. 502; Olson v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1888) 38 Minn. 117; Consolidated Coal Co. v. Wombacher (1890) 134 Ill. 57.

In Wheeler v. Wason Mfg. Co. (1883) 135 Mass. 297, the defendant presented the question whether a master's duty of giving notice to his servant of risks and perils to which the latter will be exposed in the course of his employment, when such duty exists, is an absolute one, or whether it is merely the duty of taking reasonable and proper pains to inform the servant of them. This question arose in three forms: (1) In the refusal to instruct the jury that, if the defendant's foreman directed a coservant of the plaintiff to give proper instruction and caution to the plaintiff, the latter could recover by reason of such coservant's failure to do so, if he was a competent person for that purpose; (2) In the instruction, that, if there were dangers in the business known to the defendant, which by reason of the plaintiff's inexperience were unknown to him, and which by the exercise of ordinary care he could not have known, the defendant is bound at its peril to give him reasonable warning of them; and (3) in the exclusion of the evidence of what the foreman told the coservant to do, in instructing the plaintiff. The court said: "That question was somewhat considered in Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. (1899) 102 Mass. 572, 596 [3 Am. Rep. 506]. But the question here is the more general one, whether it is an affirmative, positive duty resting upon the master, for the nonperformance of which he will be liable, or whether it can be delegated to a proper substitute, and he be thereby relieved from responsibility. We are of opinion that the duty resting upon the master is not merely one of reasonable care and diligence to give a proper notice; but that he is responsible in case the servant suffers through a want of receiving a proper notice of the risks to which he is exposed. The servant does not assume, and is not to bear the risk of, unknown and undisclosed perils; but he is held to take those risks which he knows, or which, by the exercise of ordinary care, he ought to know, to be incident to the nature of the business in the place where and the manner in which it is carried on. The master's duty is to provide machinery which is reasonably safe and proper; and if the use of it is attended with special peril, such as his servants ought to know, and if there is, accordingly, under the circumstances of the particular case, a duty resting upon him in respect to giving notice to the servants of such special peril, that duty is not discharged by delegating the performance of it to a third person. The servants should not be held to assume and undertake to bear the risk of latent and concealed perils, merely because the master takes reasonable care and pains to give notice of them. It is more reasonable to hold that, where the danger is known to the master and unknown to the servant, the master should be held to see to it that the servant, when put upon work which exposes him to danger, should be informed of it. The master must not expose his servant to an unreasonable risk. Where the servant is as well acquainted as the master with the dangerous nature of the machinery or instrument used, or of the service in which he is engaged, he cannot recover. But where the master employs a servant in the use of machinery which he knows, but the servant does not know, to be attended with peculiar danger, we are all of opinion that he must be held responsible for an injury which occurs in consequence of his failure to see to it that a proper notice is given."

The fact that a track-walker has failed to do his duty in giving notice of a possible danger to trains from the falling of a rock near the track will not excuse the company, if it does actually fall. The company being bound to remove such a danger, a breach of its duty in this respect is not to be condoned because the servant deputed to look out for the danger has also failed in his duty. Bean v. Western N. C. R. Co. (1890) 107 N. C. 731.

In Brennan v. Gordon (1890) 118 N. Y. 489, 8 L. R. A. 818, it was held that there was error 44 L. R. A.

in a charge given at the request of defendant that "if the jury find, as matter of fact, that the plaintiff was put under instruction of a competent instructor, and that the instructor, was as well acquainted as defendants with the nature and character of the service which he undertook to perform, he cannot recover." The court said: "The jury could not otherwise understand this instruction than to mean that the defendants' whole duty to the plaintiff was performed when they assigned as competent an instructor to plaintiff as the defendants were. This was erroneous in two respects. The degree of the instructor's competency was gauged by the competency of the defendants. The plaintiff was entitled to have, and the defendants were bound to provide him with, an instructor competent to teach the art of managing an elevator, regardless of the competency of the defendants in that respect, and of which there was no proof whatever in the case. But the defendants were not only bound to furnish plaintiff with an instructor absolutely competent to manage an elevator, but the defendants were also bound to provide such an instructor for a reasonable length of time to teach the plaintiff how to manage the elevator, and that the instructor should be guilty of no negligence to the injury of the plaintiff while he was being instructed. These relations spring from the fact that during this period the instructor is doing the work and standing in the place of the defendants, the masters."

Evidence that an employer referred a servant to an experienced fellow employee for information as to the proper manner of dealing with a mispent charge of dynamite, and that, in consequence of following the instruction given, the servant was killed, is insufficient to support a charge of negligence on the employer's part. Welch v. Grace (1897) 167 Mass. 590.

Some superior employees are treated as representatives of the master in respect to this particular duty, though in other respects they may be mere servants.

Thus, it is held that one who has power to employ and discharge laborers, and is the foreman in his department, has the duty of the master devolved on him to instruct employees as to the danger of the employment. Fort Smith Oil Co. v. Slover (1893) 58 Ark. 168.

In another state where the courts apply the same doctrine as to the effect of vesting a superior servant with the power of employing and discharging his subordinates, it has been held that the superior servant is none the less a vice principal in respect to the duty of instruction because the employing and discharging are subject to the consent and approval of the superintendent. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Hinzle (1891) 82 Tex. 623, where the plaintiff was ordered to paint cars without being instructed as to a rule requiring men working on side-tracks to set out signal flags.

Compare Olson v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1888) 38 Minn. 117 (foreman of gang shoveling snow,—vice principal in regard to the duty of notifying his subordinates of rules); Consolidated Coal Co. v. Wombacher (1890) 134 Ill. 57 (night pit-boss in a mine—a vice principal in regard to warning miners of the dangers from a loose overhanging rock); Bjbjian v. Woonsocket Rubber Co. (1890) 164 Mass. 214 (man in charge of machine like that which plaintiff was handling—vice principal when deputed by the foreman to instruct the plaintiff).

Similar rulings have been made as to the obligation to warn in regard to sporadic, transitory dangers affecting the safety of the place of work.

The duty of keeping the employees on a section of a railroad informed as to the movement of trains over that section either under a general or temporary time table is positive and non-assignable. Northern P. R. Co. v. Charles (1892) 7 U. S. App. 359, 51 Fed. Rep. 562, 2 C. C. A. 380; Frost v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (1895) 60 Fed. Rep. 936; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Camp (1895) 31 U. S. App. 213, 65 Fed. Rep. 952, 13 C. C. A. 238.

Compare subd. X. of the note in 43 L. R. A. 305.

So, also, though in some respects the engineer and fireman of a special engine are fellow servants of a section hand, yet, in giving him warning of the use of the track by a special train, they discharge a nonassignable personal or positive duty of the railroad company in its corporate capacity. Turner v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (1895) 40 W. Va. 675. The court said: "It has been well said that it would be a monstrous doctrine to hold that a railroad company could frame such schedules as would inevitably, or even probably, result in collisions or loss of life. Lewis v. Selfert (1887) 116 Pa. 647. Having prepared and promulgated its schedule, it must adhere to it, and if it makes a change or violates such schedule, it is its positive duty to notify all who may be affected thereby of such change. When, in contravention of its schedule, it sends a 'wild engine' over its track unexpectedly, it is in duty bound to warn all its employees who are rightfully on and using the track about its business, whether in charge of engine, train, or hand-car, of the change in the schedule, and, if it intrusts this duty to others, by bell, whistle, or otherwise, it makes such others its vice principals to that extent, and if they fail to discharge this duty the company must answer for their negligence unless it be shown that the injured person contributed thereto. For instance, if the company had failed to notify Foreman Alley, by bell, whistle, or otherwise, of the presence of a special train or obstruction on the track, and he had been injured thereby, he could recover, unless the defendant showed that he was under express instructions to be on the lookout for such special trains, and, as a matter of precaution, to flag around curves and through cuts. In such case he would fail, not because of being a fellow servant with the engineer, but from contributing to his negligence. The company must protect its employees from all dangers created by itself or its authorized agents or agencies which such employees cannot themselves foresee, or, by the use of ordinary prudence, avoid. For it must furnish them a safe place to work. To send 'wild engines' and trains without any manner of warning or precaution over tracks already rightfully occupied by other employees is negligence in the highest degree criminal, in utter disregard of human life or limb, and worthy of the severest penalties the law can possibly inflict; and it is made less criminal by the degree of precaution taken to give the necessary warning, and only becomes excusable when the measures adopted are sufficient to protect such employees from threatened danger, provided they are free from fault themselves."

(See, however, cases cited in X. c. supra.)

The same principle is applicable where the duty of warning is voluntarily undertaken by a person not in the master's employ. Here, the fact that another person performs a duty incumbent on a railroad company to warn a servant of another employer while working upon it that trains are approaching will not absolve the company from liability if the warning was not heard, and the servant is consequently injured. Speed v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. (1879) 71 Mo. 303. The court pointed out that, under the circumstances, the relation between the railway company and the contractor stood several of the usual tests which are applied in determining whether one person is the servant of another. The company's superintendent had the right to direct the manner in which the work should be done. The contractor's services were due to the company alone. The subordinate employees of the contractor were selected by the company and were liable to discharge by the company. Moreover, the defendant being a railway company, the case was controlled by another principle also. The contractor "was transacting a part of the business of the company, a common carrier, not as a lessee of the road and rolling stock, or either, but simply in loading and unloading freight which the company transported as a common carrier." As a common carrier, it was observed "the law imposes certain obligations and liabilities upon the defendant, of which it is extremely doubtful whether it can relieve itself while it continues to be a common carrier, by any agreement with a third person. The doctrine might well apply that, where the law imposes a liability upon a company, in which it vests a franchise with exclusive privileges, it cannot escape responsibility by delegating to others the power to transact a portion of the business in which it is engaged, if the business to be transacted by the employee be but a part of the general business in which the company is engaged. If the company should lease the entire road, or an entire portion of the road, to another company, it would cease to be liable as a common carrier, as to the whole or such portion; but it cannot parcel out its business to agents, and be a common carrier, without the liabilities of a common carrier."

A corollary of the doctrine that the duty of instruction is absolute is that, in cases where the injured employee is an infant or inexperienced, the rule as to fellow servants "only holds good when it appears that such employee has been properly instructed by his employer as to the dangers of his employment, or has acquired knowledge of such dangers from other sources." Jones v. Florence Min. Co. (1886) 66 Wis. 268, 57 Am. Rep. 269.

Hence, the mere fact that a defect in a machine is due to the fault of a coemployee will not absolve a master from the duty of instructing a servant, where the danger resulting from the defect is one which is not within his comprehension. Bjbjjan v. Woonsocket Rubber Co. (1895) 164 Mass. 214.

The practical operation of the doctrine that the duty of instruction and warning is non-assignable is considerably modified by the principle that the master is not bound to supervise personally the details of his business. It would be out of place to discuss at any length in this connection the results which follow from the application of this principle, and we shall content ourselves with citing the few cases in which it touches upon the subject of the present note.

A master is not liable for the negligence of a fellow servant of the injured servant in failing to give a warning signal as it was his duty to do. Hermann v. Port Blakely Mill Co. (1896) 71 Fed. Rep. 853.

A railroad company is not liable for injuries caused by the negligence of a fireman in omitting to sound a bell or whistle for the purpose of notifying an employee of the approach of a moving engine. Greenwald v. Marquette, N. & O. R. Co. (1892) 49 Mich. 197.

Contrast Turner v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (1895) 40 W. Va. 675, supra.

Where a servant undertakes the work of putting damaged cars on a certain track in a yard, the receipt of insufficient notice as to the precise defect in some particular car which he has to handle is to be treated as the neglect of a fellow servant, and the risk must fall within the ordinary rule, inasmuch as it is an incident of the service which was entered upon, that broken cars might be put in the wrong place in the yard, and insufficient notice of the defects in them might be given. Such an omission of notice relates to matters of detail, and is one which cannot be given in advance. It is therefore not like an omission to give instructions to an inexperienced hand as to the general danger to which his work will expose him. Yeaton v. Boston & L. R. Corp. (1883) 135 Mass. 418.

An employer owning a coal dock, the structures and machinery upon which are undergoing repairs and rebuilding made necessary by a storm, is not guilty of negligence in failing to warn a new and inexperienced employee at work upon a chute, of the presence in such chute of the slack of a cable attached to the machinery of the dock, and of the danger of its suddenly lifting by the starting of the machinery, where the machinery is not in regular operation, and such lifting of the cable is not one of the incidents of such operation, regularly or occasionally occurring, but arises from the engineer's adjusting the cable upon the drums and leaving it for a time lying in the chute, and plaintiff's position is safe until the starting of the engine, and the employer has no notice of the presence of the cable in the chute, and could not reasonably anticipate it,—especially where such employee is not ordered to take a position over the chute. Porter v. Silver Creek & M. Coal Co. (1893) 84 Wis. 418. (Two judges dissented on the ground that the master was bound to know that the machinery might start at any moment and imperil plaintiff.)

Where a servant is injured in obeying a mere foreman not having the station of a vice principal, who, without sufficient instruction, had ordered him to perform a specially dangerous service, not within the scope of his employment, the fault is that of a fellow servant, not of the master. Crown v. Orr (1893) 140 N. Y. 450.

City of NEW ORLEANS et al., Appts.

(.....La. Ann.....)

*The city of New Orleans has the power to assign the limits beyond which houses of prostitution shall not be permitted. An ordinance of that character merely asserts the municipal functions to secure public order, decency, and morals, and violates none of the guaranties of the rights of person and property contained in the Federal and state Constitutions. City Charter, Act No. 45 of 1896, § 15; the similar provision in previous charters; Black, Const. Law, p. 301; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 310.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Civil District Court for the Parish of Orleans enjoining the enforcement of an ordinance changing the limits within which houses of prostitution are permitted. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James J. McLoughlin and Samuel L. Gilmore for appellants.

Messrs. E. Howard McCaleb, E. Howard McCaleb, Jr., and Rene C. Metoyer for appellee and intervener.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants appeal from the judgment maintaining the injunction restraining the enforcement of the ordinance of the common council changing the limits beyond which lewd women are prohibited from residing. From an early period it has been the policy of the councils of the city to assign limits for houses of prostitution, by prohibiting, under prescribed penalties, the location of such houses beyond the designated limits. The ordinance earliest in date on this subject to which our attention has been directed was passed in 1857. There were changes in the limits in subsequent years, and the last ordinance which gave rise to the present controversy prescribed the south side of Custom House street, to the North side of St. Louis, and from Basin to the lower side of Robertson street, as the limits beyond which houses of prostitution were prohibited. This, as we understand it, extended the permitted limits of previous ordinances so as to include St. Louis street, from which such houses had been excluded by the ordinance passed shortly preceding that the city is now seeking to enforce. This last ordinance restricts the limit assigned to these houses by the previous ordinances by substituting "between Basin and Robertson streets" for the more enlarged space comprised between the river in front and the rear of the city, designated by earlier ordinances, although St. Louis street is embraced in the last ordinance, not in the ordinance immediately preceding the last enactment. It is claimed that St. Louis street never was within the space assigned for these houses. We derive a different impression but whether or not included in the earlier ordinances can exert no appreciable influence on our decision.

The plaintiff, a property owner, and a resident on Tremé street, intersecting St. Louis street, and half a square from St. Louis street, alleges, in his petition for the injunction, the close proximity of his dwelling to that portion of St. Louis street brought within the area in which houses of prostitution are to be allowed by the ordinance he proposes to enjoin; that his locality has been, and is, free from such houses; that their introduction is calculated to render his property unfit for his family dwelling, and greatly depreciates its value; that the ordinance excludes a large portion of the area in which houses of prostitution were previously permitted, at the same time enlarging the limits so as to embrace St. Louis street; that the city, by the previous ordinances designating the limits and excluding St. Louis street, had exhausted the legislative power in respect to the subject; and the petition charges that the ordinance is oppressive, unjust, and violative of the protection to persons and property accorded by the Constitution of the United States and of the state. There is an intervention by a religious corporation owning and maintaining a church near to St. Louis street, between Robertson street; and another intervention, by another property owner in the same neighborhood. The allegations in the petitions of intervention present the subject in a different phase, and allege the injury to property within the designated area, arising from confining houses of prostitution as proposed by the ordinance. Thus, the theory of the plaintiff's petition is that the city has no power to change the limits of houses of prostitution; the position of the interveners is, there should be no limits for such houses. The city and the officials sought to be restrained by the injunction except to the jurisdiction of the civil district court, on the ground that the injunction sought is directed against the enforcement of a penal statute, that the petition discloses no cause of action, and on other grounds unnecessary to notice. The judgment maintained the injunction, and this appeal followed.

It is clear that the civil district court has no jurisdiction to restrain prosecutions for crime confided by the law to the criminal courts. No prevention of such prosecutions is attempted. The plaintiff seeks the injunction for the protection of his rights of property, menaced, as he conceives, by an illegal ordinance. The right of the citizen to that protection is too clear to permit dispute, and, in our view, the petition contains all that is essential to secure relief at our hands, if the allegations in the petition are supported. 1 High, Inj. § 68. The regulation of houses of prostitution would seem to be so closely connected with public order and decency, the policy announced by the ordinance has been so long exerted in all large cities of our country, and the power has had such frequent recognition in the charters of this city, that it would seem the power itself cannot be successfully controverted. City Charter 1870, § 12; Id. 1892, § 8; Id. 1896, § 15. We have, however, given careful attention to the argument that urges objection to all such legislation, and which directs attention to the grounds of opposition deemed specially applicable to the ordinance, the execution of which is sought to be arrested. That there are limitations to the power asserted by this ordinance may be conceded. It does not, however, readily occur to the mind that confining houses of this character within certain limits, by the appropriate ordinance, is violative of any of the constitutional guaranties invoked in this discussion before us. The ordinance neither sanctions nor undertakes to punish vice. The power to punish vice, not in the form of an offense, denied by the argument and enforced by the authorities we find in the briefs, is, in our view, entirely distinct from the function the ordinance asserts as belonging to municipal government, by the express terms of the city charter. It is urged, too, the ordinance is a license for vice, and hence illegal. Tiedeman, Pol. Power, p. 291. Undoubtedly, the court should refuse its aid to any ordinance if of the character asserted by the argument. The vice, the subject of this ordinance, beyond the reach of penal statutes, is simply subjected by this ordinance to that restraint demanded by the public interest. The unfortunate class dealt with by the ordinance must live. They are not denied shelter, but assigned that portion of the city beyond which they are not permitted to establish their houses. Thus viewed, the ordinance cannot be deemed open to the objections that it either punishes or grants a license to vice beyond the competency of the council.

Again, it is urged that the ordinance is oppressive, unreasonable, and hence not to be enforced, because it seeks to confine the depraved women in too narrow limits. We find the testimony of this tendency in the record. If the ordinance is lawful, this question of space is, in our opinion, confided to the council, and not for the courts. At any rate, we find no basis in the record to authorize the conclusion that the judgment of the council on this question is erroneous. There is the general proposition asserted by the argument that the correct policy is to diffuse the houses throughout the city, although the anticipated presence of the houses within half a square of the plaintiff's residence, and though on a different street, prompted this suit and vigorous opposition of the plaintiff. We cannot accept the view of public policy announced by the argument for the plaintiff, and, on that ground, set aside the action of the council.

The argument is advanced that houses once used for immoral uses, the subject of the ordinance, can never regain a reputable character; that the primary ordinance of this character gave the neighborhood it designated, and to the property within its limits, an ineffaceable stigma, depreciating for all time the value of the property; and hence it is argued that this first concession of private right for the public good is enough,—that is, the first exercise of power by the council is exhaustive of its power over the subject. The character of the houses within the limits first assigned is fixed forever. It is hence contended the limits cannot be changed, least of all extended, involving, as it would, a fresh and unnecessary sacrifice of private right. The effect of the argument, while conceding the function of municipal government to assign limits for such houses, is to affirm that this important municipal function, once exerted, can never be again exercised. The limits, we are told, must remain as originally fixed, irrespective of all those changes and public needs apt to arise, and to demand modifications of limits assigned years previously, for uses admitting of no suppression, but which can be restricted as to locality. It seems to us, if the functions asserted by the ordinance can be once exerted as the argument concedes, the more reasonable conclusion is that the function may again be called into exercise, to meet the changed conditions time has called into existence, and which appeal for appropriate action to the municipal authorities. We cannot therefore assent to the proposition that, because limits for these houses were assigned perhaps more than three quarters of a century ago, therefore the council cannot furnish in 1896 the legislation demanded by the public interest.

There remains the argument addressed to us, varied in form, but maintaining the general proposition that the ordinance operates to deprive the citizen of his property; that is, to depreciate its value,—the same as deprivation in legal effect. We can readily appreciate there might be an arbitrary exercise of this power that would warrant an appeal to the courts. Thus, to extend these limits so as to embrace, without any apparent reason, if reason could exist, portions of the city always devoted to private residences, schools, churches, and other lawful uses, might well be deemed oppressive and an abuse of the power of municipal government; but, as we understand this ordinance, in its main features it is restrictive,—that is, confines these houses within narrower bounds. True, it takes in St. Louis street, or, as we believe, one side of the street excluded by the ordinance immediately preceding that now sought to be enforced. If it be true that St. Louis street—that is, both sides of it—was always without the area in which these houses were permitted, it is none the less true that St. Louis street has always been in close proximity to the space allotted to houses of prostitution. An extension of these limits, so as to take in that street, or rather that portion of it always alongside of the area for these houses, and at the same time greatly diminishing that area as previously delineated, does not strike us as arbitrary, or as calling for any substantial sacrifice of private rights beyond that required by antecedent ordinances. To whatever extent, however, the right of private property may be deemed affected by this last ordinance, it must be borne in mind that it is their great power of government given to preserve the morals, health, and lives of the community that requires the surrender of right by the citizen supposed to be exacted by this ordinance. To that police power all must yield obedience. As put in the textbooks, and enforced by all decisions: Every citizen holds his property subject to the proper exercise of the police power, exerted either by the legislature or by the subordinate political corporations. It is settled that police laws and regulations, though they may disturb the enjoyment of individual rights, are not unconstitutional. They do not expropriate property for public use. If the individual sustains injury, it is deemed damnum absque injuria; or in the theory of the law, the injury to the owner is deemed compensated by the public benefit the regulation is designed to subserve. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 93. It is our conclusion, on every aspect of the case, that the ordinance is the exercise of lawful power, and no ground exists to enjoin the execution of that the ordinance proposes. Id. § 310; Black, Const. Law, p. 301; Dvarris, Stat. p. 455.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment of the lower court in favor of plaintiff be reversed, and the injunction obtained by plaintiff issued be dissolved, his suit be dismissed, and that the judgment of the lower court dismissing the interventions, and dissolving the injunction granted on the prayer of one of them, be affirmed, and that plaintiff pay costs.

Nicholls, Ch. J., concurs in the judgment, but declines to sign it, for reasons orally assigned from the bench. Blanchard, J., concurs in the judgment, also, for reasons also assigned from the bench.

MARION OIL COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(.....W. Va.....)

*1. A person or corporation engaged in furnishing natural gas to stoves, heaters, pipes, etc., for purposes of domestic light, heat, and fuel in a dwelling house, is bound to exercise such care, skill, and diligence in all its operations as is called for by

*Headnotes by MCWHORTER, J.

NOTE.—The above case seems to be a novel one as respects the liability for fire caused by illy regulated pressure of gas used for fuel.

As to the general subject of negligence in the escape and explosion of gas, see Ohio Gas Fuel Co. v. Andrews (Ohio) 29 L. R. A. 337, and 44 L. R. A.

the delicacy, difficulty, and dangerousness of the nature of the business, that injury to others may not be caused thereby; that is to say, if the delicacy, difficulty, and danger are extraordinarily great, extraordinary skill and diligence are required.

2. If the defendant, so furnishing such gas, negligently and carelessly suffer and permit a greater amount of pressure of said gas to be furnished than is reasonably proper for said purpose, by reason whereof the house or building being so furnished is consumed or injured by fire, resulting from such negligence, the defendant is liable in damages for such loss.

2. If such defendant suffer and permit its regulators or other appliances to be and remain for an unreasonable time in such condition that they do not control the amount and pressure of gas so furnished, so that more than a safe and proper amount of gas is so furnished, the defendant is guilty of negligence, and liable in damages for injuries proximately caused by such negligence.
4. If such injury is the natural consequence of such negligence, and such as might have been foreseen and reasonably anticipated as the result of such negligence, then such negligence must be regarded as the proximate or direct cause of the injury, in the absence of intervening negligence.
5. The mere fact that a building so furnished with gas was set on fire from the gas is not sufficient to justify the inference that an increased pressure of gas caused the fire.
6. In the trial of an action against a corporation so furnishing natural gas to a dwelling house, for damages causing the destruction of such house by fire by negligently permitting too great a pressure of gas, it is not competent to prove by a witness the bare fact of what pressure the gauge of another gas company usually indicated.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Monongalia County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the loss of a house alleged to have been burned through defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. B. Fleming and U. N. Arnett, Jr., for plaintiff in error:

The person who uses natural gas, and seeks to recover damages by reason of the explosion thereof, "must show that he is free from fault."

Lebanon Light, Heat & P. Co. v. Leap (Ind.) 29 L. R. A. 342, note, which refers to Bartlett v. Boston Gaslight Co. 122 Mass. 209.

The negligence of the tenant is imputed to the owner.

Simpson v. Hand, 6 Whart. 311, 36 Am. Dec. 231.

The tenant having control of the property, it is his duty to take care of it and prevent damage from such causes.

McGahan v. Indianapolis Natural Gas Co. (Ind.) 29 L. R. A. 357; Bartlett v. Boston Gaslight Co. 117 Mass. 533, 19 Am. Rep. 421.

If the appellant was negligent in the care of its line and in not controlling the flow of gas, still the tenant's leaving the house unoccupied all day with the gas burning, knowing that the pressure of the gas varied, was negligence on his part, and such negligence being the intervening cause should have prevented a recovery.

Testimony as to the condition of the gas and the gas pressure in other houses was not 44 L. R. A.

only irrelevant, but it was calculated to prejudice the jury.

It does not appear that at any other time the pressure of gas was so great as upon that occasion, according to the testimony of said witnesses. If this be the case no rule of diligence or care would make appellant liable.

Hutchinson v. Boston Gaslight Co. 122 Mass. 219.

The demurrer was properly overruled.

Contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, which of itself defeats his recovery, must be the proximate cause of the injury, and the burden of proof of contributory negligence rests with the defendant.

McWhorter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Franklin Barrickman brought his action of trespass on the case in the circuit court of Monongalia county against the Marion Oil Company, claiming damages for the destruction of a dwelling house, owned by him, by fire, occasioned by the negligence of the defendant in furnishing natural gas at said house for domestic purposes. On the 18th of February, 1896, defendant appeared, and demurred to the declaration, and to each count, in which plaintiff joined and of which the court took time to consider. On the 24th of the same month the court overruled the demurrer, and the defendant pleaded to the general issue. Plaintiff filed an amended declaration, when defendant again demurred to plaintiff's whole declaration, and to each count, which demurrers were overruled by the court, and defendant entered its plea of not guilty to both the declaration and the amended declaration. A jury was duly impaneled, the case tried, and on the 20th of February, 1897, the jury rendered a verdict for plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $1,000. Defendant moved the court to set aside the verdict, and grant it a new trial, because the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, for permitting improper evidence to go to the jury, for rejecting proper and material evidence offered by defendant, because the court gave several improper instructions on behalf of the plaintiff, and rejected and refused to give proper instructions offered by defendant, and in not giving instructions asked for by defendant in the form as prepared by defendant, and in modifying and making changes therein and additions thereto, and in giving them in such changed and modified form; which motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial was overruled and denied, and defendant excepted, and the court entered a judgment on said verdict against the defendant. Defendant took nine several bills of exception, which were severally signed, sealed, and made a part of the record. The defendant applied for and obtained a writ of error, assigning as error the overruling of the demurrers to the declaration and the amended declaration, and to each count; the permitting of improper evidence on behalf of plaintiff to go to the jury, as set out in bills of exception 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9; in giving plaintiff's instructions, and each of them, and in refusing defendant's instructions 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13, and each of them; and in refusing to give defendant's instruction No. 8 in the form prepared and requested by defendant, and in amending the same by making addition thereto by the court, and in giving same to the jury in the form as shown by bill of exception No. 4. It is claimed that the demurrer to the declaration and to each count should have been sustained. There are three counts, two in the original and one in the amended declaration; and it is claimed by appellant that these counts are inconsistent (especially the one in the amended declaration) with those contained in the original declaration. In the latter (the original) it is averred that the dwelling house destroyed was the property of the plaintiff, and makes no mention of the fact that it was occupied, or in possession of a tenant or agent. In the amended declaration it is averred to be the property of and owned by plaintiff, while it is in the possession of one Milton Rinehart, as is the lessee thereof, and from the plaintiff. It is no less the property of plaintiff, being in the possession of plaintiff by his tenant, than if the possession was held by him in person, and the third count, or amended declaration, is simply to show the manner of the possession of the owner of the property, and is an eminently proper count. It is insisted that because it is averred, in substance, in all the counts, that it was the duty of defendant to control and regulate the quantity and pressure of gas in such manner that only such quantity and pressure as was necessary for fuel and domestic heat for said dwelling house should be furnished, the demurrers should have been sustained that the degree of diligence set forth in each count is greater than is required by law. Appellant says that, "if it can be claimed that because natural gas is a very dangerous substance, etc., and that, under certain circumstances, more than ordinary care can be required of a person or company furnishing it, such a rule would not apply in this case, as it is shown the appellant only had what is known as a 'high-pressure line' for its own use, and that the appellee and a few other householders in a small village were allowed to connect therewith for their own accommodation by means of their own gas line, called a 'service line,' and which was as much a 'gas line' as was the appellant's main." This may all be well said in the course of the trial on the merits of the case, but not on demurrer. It nowhere appears in the declaration that defendant had only what is known as a "high-pressure line" for its own use, and a few householders connected with it for their own accommodation. The theory of the declaration is that defendant was in possession of certain wells producing natural gas, and was engaged in the business of furnishing gas through its pipe lines to consumers for fuel and domestic heating purposes for consideration, and it is averred that it was so furnishing such gas to the said dwelling house, the property of said plaintiff, under contract, for valuable consideration, and, being so engaged, it was the duty of defendant to properly control and regulate the quantity and pressure of the said natural gas so far as same was necessary for fuel and domestic heat, which should be so furnished by it to and for said dwelling house; and then it is averred that on the day, etc., and at the county of Monongalia, the defendant wrongfully, negligently, and unlawfully caused, suffered, and permitted the said natural gas to run, flow, and pass out of and from the said wells producing natural gas, and out of and from the said lines of pipe, machinery, and apparatus of which the defendant was possessed, in and into and through the said burners, heaters, stoves, grates, pipes, lines of pipe of plaintiff (which were averred to be in good repair, and fit for the purposes for which they were used), in so great and large quantities, and with so great a pressure, that the said burners, heaters, etc., of plaintiff were then and there forced open, broken, thrown apart, and burst, and by reason thereof the said great and large quantities of gas did escape and pass out of said pipes, burners, etc., in and into the said dwelling house, and was ignited, burned, and exploded by the fires then and there lawfully kept, and being in the burners, heaters, etc., by which means the said house was burned and destroyed. "The object of the declaration is to set forth the facts which constitute the cause of action so that they may be understood by the party who is to answer them, by the jury who are to ascertain the truth of the allegations, and the court, who is to pronounce judgment." Hogg Pleading & Forms, § 140; Berns v. Gaston Gas Coal Co. 27 W. Va. 285; Snyder v. Wheeling Electrical Co. 43 W. Va. 661, 59 L. R. A. 499. The declaration in the case at bar is sufficient, and the court did not err in overruling the demurrers.

The second assignment is that the court erred in permitting the evidence mentioned in appellant's bills of exception numbered 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9, and in each of them, to go to the jury. That contained in bill No. 5 relates to certain questions asked witness Mrs. Berry, who lived some 300 or 400 yards from the house that was destroyed, and that was furnished with gas from the same pipe line. Witness was asked what the gas pressure was that day, at her home, about the time of the fire, and shortly before. She stated that it was very high; that she burned it in the cooking stove in the kitchen. "How high was it, and what did you do at your house, Mrs. Berry?" Answer: "Well, when I went out, the stove was red hot, and the wall was burning behind the stove." She was asked to describe to the jury how the gas was acting in the kitchen stove, and what it was doing. Answer: "Why the gas—The stove was red hot, and it was burnt behind the stove when I went out." She also said: "I first throwed water on the fire, I guess." Also certain testimony of E. O. Wiedman, who was supplied with gas at his blacksmith shop, from the same line, and 200 or 250 yards from the Barrickman house that was burned, where he was asked: "How was the pressure at your house that day at the time, or shortly before, the fire?" Answer: "The gas, I think, was stronger than usual. Also the same bill sets forth certain questions asked of witness Mrs. Rosa Sutton, who lived about 100 yards from the Barrickman house, and was furnished gas from the same main, who was asked to state what the condition of the gas pressure was about the time, or shortly before, the house was burned. Answer: "It was very high. Was over the stove at work, and it was so high that it shook the stove-lids, and I got out of the way of it. I turned it off, and then went to the other fires, and could not get it regulated, and I turned it off from the house. When I heard of the fire, I turned it off from the house." Plaintiff's counsel also propounded the four following questions to the same witness, and received the following answers, as set out in said bill No. 5:

Q. Where did you go from the dwelling?

A. To the store.

Q. How was it there?

A. Just the same as in the house.

Q. What was the condition of the gaslights in the store?

A. Well, so high they blowed out.

Q. When you went to the stove in the kitchen, how was the gas acting?

A. I said that I was trying to regulate it in the stove, and went to the sitting room, and could not regulate it there, and came back to the stove, and turned it off from the grate.

Also witness Charles Hall, minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, who lived about 100 yards from the house that burned,—two houses between them. Witness's house was supplied with natural gas from the same main which furnished the Barrickman house, and he was asked: "What was the condition of the gas, and where were you?" Answer: "I was sick that morning, lying on a cot in the room where one of my fires was. I kept two fires, one in the stove and sitting room. My brother was with me. He was reading by the fire. Noticed the fire come on. I thought he didn't notice it, as he was reading, and I spoke to him, and directed the fire to be turned lower. The pressure seemed higher than usual."

Also, in the same bill, witness Jacob Barrickman, who lived 125 or 150 yards from the house that burned, and was supplied with gas from the same main line, and got home about half past 11 o'clock, day of fire, was asked:

Now, Mr. Barrickman, when you came home, what was the pressure in your house?

A. Well, I guess, when I came home, it seemed to be higher than usual.

Q. I will get you to state to the jury what the pressure and condition of the gas was about the time the fire broke out in the Barrickman house, and shortly before.

A. Well, I guess about 11, or between 11 and 12 o'clock, it came on very strong, high pressure, stronger than it usually came on in the store building there.

This testimony so excepted to refers to the condition of the gas as to the force and pressure at the time of the fire; no regulator on the main pipe intervening between the house burned and houses occupied or referred to by the witnesses. Appellant cites the case of Emerson v. Lowell Gaslight Co. 3 Allen, 410, to sustain its position. That case is not applicable. It was for damages sustained by sickness introduced and suffered in a certain building by inhaling the gas that escaped into the house, but evidence that the inmates of another house were made sick in consequence of inhaling the gas that escaped into their house from the same defect in defendant's pipes was held inadmissible. "The evidence should be limited to the effect of the gas upon those who have in common, and under similar circumstances, inhaled it." Hunt v. Lowell Gaslight Co. 8 Allen, 169, 85 Am. Dec. 697. The condition and pressure of the gas in the neighboring houses at the time of the fire, there being no intervening regulator or hindrance to the force of the gas between the burned house and the other houses mentioned, would clearly indicate what it was at the house of plaintiff, and I see no valid objection to the answering of the questions.

Bill of exceptions No. 6 relates to the testimony of plaintiff, which refers to what took place between plaintiff and Charles J. Meeks, an employee of defendant, who had been asked by plaintiff to go to the house, and see if the fixtures were safe; complaint having been made about a leak of gas. Witness was asked and answered questions as follows:

Q. What was done in reference to the leak?

A. He called my attention to the leak, and says, "It is not safe,"—the way Charlie spoke to me; and, says I, "Charlie, if it is not safe, I want you to take the gas out of the house until you know it is safe." I told him to shut the gas out of our house until he knowed it was safe.

Q. State whether or not it was repaired after that.

A. It was repaired after that.

Q. State whether or not Meeks approved of it after it was repaired.

A. He did.

Appellant insists that it owed no duty to appellee in reference to service line and gas fittings in the house and about the store, and that anything that Meeks did towards repairing them was done for and as the employee of appellee, or for his accommodation, and neither his acts nor declarations would bind appellant. Meeks testified that he was not the agent of defendant; that he was an employee, a laborer. It is true, he did so much of skilled work for defendant as to connect the service pipes with the main line, which was his only duty connected therewith; but, as alleged in the declaration, plaintiff was the owner of and put in the pipes, burners, etc., in his house, by himself, or his tenant, and it was his duty to keep the same in good order and repair. Meeks was only the agent of defendant in the line of his duties in its employ, and could not be called to the service of another without the consent of defendant, and it was improper to admit as testimony before the jury what Meeks told plaintiff in relation to the condition and repairs of the fixtures of plaintiff in his house and on his premises.

Bill of exceptions No. 7 relates to the evidence of E. O. Wiedman, who was asked what the gauge at the regulator showed the pressure to be at the time of the fire, the house still burning, but nearly burned down, answered, "The hand was on the other side of the pin," and witness was asked "whether that gauge registered more than 180 pounds, or whether that was all it could register." He answered, "There was only 180 pounds marked on it." Witness had stated that once in a while for probably six months back he had gone to the register, and generally looked at what it stood at, and the best that he could remember, outside of the one time he had mentioned, he had seen it as low as 15 pounds and as high as 40 or 50; and was asked and answered the following questions:

Q. From that time on up to the fire, when you examined the gauge, about what would the pressure stand at?

A. Well, I have saw it as low, I guess.

Q. Usually about what, ordinarily? You have seen it as low as that and as high as that. About what was it usually?

A. I suppose midway between, I reckon.

To which exceptions were taken. Also the following questions and answers propounded to and given by witness Reuben Laytan (included in same bill of exceptions):

Q. Whether or not you examined it on that day, and what it registered?

A. I went over and looked at it, after the fire was all over.

Q. How shortly afterwards?

A. It might have been two hours.

Q. Mr. Laytan, was part of the house still burning?

A. Yes, sir; there was fire there yet when I went there.

Q. Mr. Laytan, how did that gauge register?

A. 80 pounds, when I went there.

This examination of witnesses was on the matter of the flow of the gas, and referred to the register of defendant at its regulator; and, while it was a little after the fire,—an hour or two,—it was corroboration of witnesses who had testified to the fact of an extraordinary flow of gas at and immediately before the time of the fire; and I think the testimony was competent, as well as that tending to show what the flow had been for some time before.

Bill of exceptions No. 8 relates to testimony of witnesses J. M. Gregg and Samuel McGara. Gregg, an employee of the Union Improvement Company, engaged in furnishing natural gas for fuel, light, and heating in the vicinity of Morgantown, had been employed in the office about four years, and was asked, "I will get you to state to the jury what that pressure is customarily," and, by the court, "What pressure is usually contained in gas lines that furnish gas for domestic use?" Answer: "I can only speak from the gauge in one office. All the examinations there I made of that gauge show from a half to a pound; sometimes a little lower than a half a pound, in cold weather." Witness McGara was asked and answered the following questions, to which exceptions were taken, as shown in said bill No. 8:

Q. I will get you to state to the jury what pressure is used by you, or is necessary to operate an oil well,—what pressure without fire and without steam.

A. Well, 30 pounds pressure is enough to pump a well.

Q. Mr. McGara, from your experience in the gas business, I will get you to state whether or not, in your judgment, 30, or 40, or 50, or 60, or 80, or 180 pounds of gas on the service line to dwelling house—say $\frac{3}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ inch pipes—is dangerous.

A. I would not let that go into a house.

These two witnesses were examined as experts. Gregg had been employed as bookkeeper in a gas office, and as stated by himself, could only speak from the gauge in this office. Said he was not an expert; did not claim to know what pressure would be dangerous. It is not competent to prove, in this case, the bare fact of what the gauge of some other gas company might show, unless accompanied by scientific explanations or expert testimony showing its relevancy; hence the evidence of Gregg should not have been admitted. Witness Samuel McGara had large experience, and could be considered an expert in the use of gas, as well as the handling and controlling of it, and his testimony, excepted to, taken in connection with the rest of his testimony, is not exceptionable, and it was properly admitted.

The ninth bill of exceptions relates to the introduction by plaintiff of a receipted gas bill made by defendant against E. O. Wiedman, dated January 1, 1896, for "the use of gas as per contract to February 1st, 1896, $3." This, I presume, was introduced to prove the fact that defendant was furnishing gas for consideration. This bill was made quite nine months after the injury complained of, and I fail to see the relevancy of it, even if it were a transaction between defendant and plaintiff, instead of a stranger. Its admission was an error; yet, I think, harmless.

At the request of appellee the court gave to the jury the following instructions, numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14: "(1) The jury is instructed that a corporation or person furnishing natural gas to the stoves, heaters, burners, pipes, lines of pipe, machinery, or apparatus of another, to be used for the purpose of domestic heat and fuel in a dwelling house, is bound to exercise such care, skill, and diligence in all its operations as is called for by the delicacy, difficulty, and dangerousness of the nature of its business, in order that injury may not be occasioned to others; that is to say, if the danger, delicacy, and difficulty is extraordinarily great, extraordinary skill and diligence is required. (2) The jury is instructed that it was the duty of the defendant, as it is of all incorporated companies which are invested for their own profit and advantage with the great and important privilege of supplying a community with natural gas for private habitations, to be used as fuel and domestic heating, to exercise such care, diligence, and skill in the conduct of its business as is proportioned to the danger or risk to the property of others. (3) The jury is instructed that if they believe from the evidence that at the time of the alleged injury and burning of the plaintiff's dwelling, mentioned in the declaration, the defendant, for a valuable consideration, was furnishing natural gas to the stoves, grates, burners, heaters, pipes, lines of pipe, machinery, or apparatus used for the purpose of fuel and domestic heat in and about said dwelling, and that the defendant negligently and carelessly suffered and permitted a greater amount of pressure of said gas to be furnished than is proper for said purpose, and that by reason thereof the plaintiff's said dwelling house was consumed by fire, then the jury must find for the plaintiff, and assess his damages occasioned by such burning. (4) The jury is instructed that if they believe from the evidence that natural gas is a very dangerous, volatile, and explosive substance, then the person or corporation who furnishes it for valuable consideration to the stoves, heaters, burners, pipes, lines of pipe, machinery or apparatus of another, for the purpose of fuel for domestic heat, must use such care, skill, attention, and diligence in order that no greater amount or pressure thereof shall be so furnished than is proper to be furnished, and in order to prevent injury to the person or property of others, as is proportioned to the danger of such substance." "(6) If the jury believe from the evidence that natural gas is an extremely dangerous substance, and that the defendant, at the time of the burning alleged in the declaration, was furnishing, for a valuable consideration, such gas to the heaters, burners, stoves, grates, pipes, lines of pipe, machinery, or apparatus of the plaintiff, for the purpose of using such gas as fuel for domestic heat in and about the dwelling house mentioned in the declaration at the time of such burning, then it was the duty of the defendant under the law to use such care, diligence, and skill, both in providing proper machinery, regulators, and apparatus, work, labor, and attention, in order to control such gas, and the amount of pressure furnished to such dwelling house, as is in due proportion to the nature of the substance used. (7) If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant, at the time of the alleged burning of the dwelling house of the plaintiff, mentioned in the declaration, was, for a valuable consideration, furnishing natural gas to said dwelling house or to the machinery and apparatus used in and about said dwelling house, for the purpose of burning natural gas for domestic heat and fuel, as mentioned in the declaration, and that the said defendant at the time of such burning negligently failed to provide all such appliances, regulators, and machinery as were reasonably necessary to control the amount and pressure of the gas so furnished, then such failure is negligence on the part of the defendant, and it is liable for such damage to the property of another as was the direct result of such negligence. (8) The jury is instructed that if it believes from the evidence that at the time of the burning of the dwelling house of the plaintiff, alleged in the declaration, the defendant, for a valuable consideration, was furnishing to and for the machinery and apparatus in and about said dwelling house, for the purpose of domestic heat and fuel, a substance known as 'natural gas,' and that at the time of such burning the defendant permitted and suffered its regulator or regulators to be in such condition that it or they did not control the amount and pressure of the gas so furnished, and that it had permitted and suffered its regulators to remain in such condition for at least three or four months prior to the time of said burning, and that more than a safe and proper amount of gas was so furnished, then the defendant is guilty of negligence, and it is liable to the plaintiff for any damages occasioned to him directly caused by such negligence. . . .

(10) The jury is instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant was guilty of the negligence or carelessness, charged in the declaration, and that the injury complained of was the natural consequence of such negligence or carelessness, and such as might have been foreseen and reasonably anticipated as the result of such negligence or carelessness, then such carelessness or negligence should be regarded by the jury as the proximate or direct cause of the injury. (11) The jury is instructed that the burden of proving contributory negligence rests with the defendant, but the jury may look to all the evidence offered by both parties to determine the question of contributory negligence. (12) The jury is instructed that remote negligence on the part of the plaintiff or those occupying the house in the declaration mentioned at the time of the alleged burning will not prevent the plaintiff from recovering for an injury for the destruction of his property immediately caused by the negligence of the defendant. (13) The jury is instructed that the negligence on the part of the plaintiff, in order to defeat of itself his recovery, must be a proximate cause of the injury. (14) The jury is instructed that the negligence of the plaintiff, Barrickman, or his tenant, Rinehart, in this case, which precludes a recovery, is where, in the presence of a seen danger, he omits to do what prudence requires to be done under the circumstances for the protection of his property, or does some act inconsistent with its preservation. Where the danger is not seen, but merely anticipated, or dependent upon future events, such as the future continuance of the defendant's negligence, plaintiff is not bound to guard against it by refraining from his usual course, being otherwise a prudent one, in the management of his property and business." To which appellant excepted by bill of exceptions No. 2. The argument against the giving of most of these instructions is the same as that used on the demurrer. Appellant insists that under the averments of the declaration, as well as the instructions, too high a degree of care and diligence is required of appellant in the handling of the gas; that there is a proper rule for each case as it arises; and it is insisted that in this case it is that of ordinary care and diligence.

In Berns v. Gaston Gas Coal Co. 27 W. Va. 285 (Syl. point 7), it is held that "negligence" and "ordinary care" are correlative terms. What constitutes ordinary care depends on the circumstances of each particular case. It is such care as a person of ordinary prudence would exercise under the circumstances." What are the circumstances of this particular case? Appellant was engaged in the business of transporting and furnishing to consumers an article of trade and traffic of the most delicate, explosive, and inflammable nature, and very dangerous, and the care and diligence of appellant must be commensurate with the danger incident to the handling of the commodity. Appellant cites Bartlett v. 44 L. R. A.

Boston Gaslight Co. 122 Mass. 209, to show that appellee's instructions 12, 13, and 14 especially were bad, where it was said: "The jury, in the main part of the charge, had been told that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show affirmatively 'that the injury was occasioned by the negligence of the servants of the defendant company; and that in no material degree did the negligence of the tenant of the plaintiff contribute to that injury.' 'The question is, Was either of these parties negligent or not? If either, which?'"

The plaintiff must satisfy you upon the whole evidence, by a fair preponderance of the evidence, that he was in the exercise of such care as a prudent man might reasonably be expected to exercise under the circumstances, and that the explosion was caused by the negligence of the defendant." The company is liable in damages "if the plaintiff's tenant was in the exercise of due care." Instruction 12 was not proper to be given, because it was not applicable. In the very nature of the case at bar, as disclosed by the record, plaintiff's negligence, if guilty of any, was not remote, but proximate; and the instruction was misleading. No. 13 is the law in that case, as laid down by this court in Snyder v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 11 W. Va. 14 (Syl. point 7), discussed by the court on page 37. The nature of that case differs very materially in many respects from the case at bar, and I can scarcely see how it can be made to apply here, unless there should be added to it, "unless the danger was such as no prudent man ought to risk." With these qualifying words it might have been given. Appellee's instructions Nos. 3, 7, and 8 should not have been given because they "present a certain hypothesis [the negligence of defendant], and make the case turn wholly on it, disregarding another hypothesis [contributory negligence] fairly arising on the evidence." Parkersburg Industrial Co. v. Schults, 43 W. Va. 470 (Syl. point 9); McKelvey v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 35 W. Va. 500 (Syl. point 3). Instruction No. 10 is subject to very much the same criticism, and should not have been given without adding to it, "in the absence of intervening negligence," or something to the same effect. The other instructions of appellee were properly given.

Appellant asked the instructions Nos. 1 to 13, inclusive, which (leaving out No. 8) are referred to in bill of exceptions No. 3, and are as follows: "(1) The plaintiff, in order to recover in this suit, must satisfy the jury by a preponderance of testimony that the defendant was guilty of negligence, and that such negligence caused the injury. (2) The mere fact that the house of the plaintiff was set on fire is not sufficient to justify the inference that an increased pressure of gas caused the fire. (3) If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff and his tenant Milton Rinehart, or either of them, had knowledge some time prior to the burning of the plaintiff's house that the pressure of gas in the defendant's lines was uneven and variable,—greater at some times than at others,—and if, by reason of such uneven and variable pressure, it was dangerous to use the gas from said line for lighting and heating the dwelling house owned by the plaintiff and occupied by Milton Rinehart, then the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in permitting the same to be used therein; and if the jury believe that the fire which destroyed said house was caused by an uneven and variable pressure of gas, he cannot recover damages against the defendant for the injuries sustained. (4) If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff and his tenant, Milton Rinehart, or either of them, had knowledge, prior to the burning of said house, that the pressure of gas in defendant's lines was variable and uneven, and that the tenant left the gas burning in said house during his absence and the absence of his family therefrom, on the day and at the time of the so leaving of the gas burning during his and his family's absence from the house, this was negligence on the part of the tenant, which negligence of the tenant is to be imputed to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff cannot recover in this action. (5) If the jury believe from the evidence that at the time of the fire which destroyed plaintiff's house there was an unusual pressure of gas, as described in the declaration, and that said gas, with unusual force, came into the pipe and appliances and to the burners, valves, and fittings on the plaintiff's premises and thus increased the quantity of gas where the same was to be consumed, yet the plaintiff cannot recover if the jury further believe from the evidence that the pipe, valves, fittings, and appliances placed on the plaintiff's premises, for the purpose of conducting said gas from the defendant's line to said house were not in good order and repair, and were at the time of the fire unsafe for the use and consumption of said gas, and that by reason thereof the said gas escaped, or the quantity thereof being burned was increased, and caused the destruction of said house. (6) If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's tenant, Milton Rinehart, was guilty of negligence in the placing or maintaining on said leased premises the pipe, valves, fittings, and appliances which made the connection to conduct said gas from defendant's main into the house on said leased premises in an unsafe condition, and in not keeping and maintaining said pipe, valves, fittings, and appliances in good order and repair, and in proper and safe condition for the use and consumption of the gas, and that by reason of which unsafe condition of said pipe, valves, fittings, and appliances said house was set on fire, and destroyed, by means of an explosion of said gas, or by means of increased heat or the escape of gas, occasioned, in whole or in part, by such unsafe and defective pipe, valves, fittings, and appliances, the negligence of the tenant, Milton Rinehart, should prevent the plaintiff from recovering in this action, and the jury should find for the defendant. (7) If the jury believes from the evidence that, at the time of the fire which destroyed the plaintiff's house, Milton Rinehart, the plaintiff's tenant, was guilty of negligence in not keeping and maintaining pipes, valves, fixtures, and appliances placed on the premises of the said plaintiff for the purpose of conducting the said gas from the defendant's main into the said dwelling house on said premises in good order and repair, and if the said negligence of the said tenant, in whole or in part, caused or occasioned the injury complained of and described in the declaration in this cause, the plaintiff cannot recover, and the jury should find for the defendant. . . . (9) If the jury believe from the evidence that the house of the plaintiff, described in the declaration, was by the defendant furnished and supplied with gas on the application of Milton Rinehart, the plaintiff's tenant, and that such gas was conducted from the defendant's main or gas line to said house by means of pipe, valves, fittings, and appliances laid and furnished by said tenant, with the consent of the plaintiff, and that pursuant to a promise made by said tenant that he, said tenant, would keep and maintain said pipe, valves, fittings, and appliances necessary and proper for the safe use and consumption of said gas in good order and repair, and that the fire which consumed the plaintiff's house was caused by an explosion of the gas in said house, or by any other means resulting from the escape or leakage of said gas, or the negligent manner of taking care of or using the same after leaving the defendant's main, the plaintiff cannot recover, and the jury should find for the defendant. (10) If the jury believes from the evidence that the injury complained of by the plaintiff in his declaration resulted from a cause which neither the plaintiff nor defendant knew of, and of which the defendant could not, by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence, have foreseen or known, the injury would be the result of accident, and for which the defendant would not be responsible, and the jury should find for the defendant. (11) Only ordinary care and prudence were required of the defendant in the conduct of its business and in the management of the gas line described in the declaration, and, if the jury believes from the evidence that the defendant exercised ordinary care and prudence in the delivering of its gas through the pipe line into the service line of the plaintiff or his tenant leading to the house which was destroyed, then the plaintiff cannot recover for the injury complained of. (12) If the jury believes from the evidence that the defendant had upon its gas line from which it delivered gas to the plaintiff for use in his house, gas regulators in good order and sufficient to control the pressure and quantity of gas, and that the plaintiff used ordinary care in having its gas line and said regulators inspected and kept in good working order and safe condition, and that said regulators were so inspected within an hour or less of the time of the accident complained of in the declaration, and found to be in good order, and working properly, and the gas properly regulated and controlled thereby, and that from some unknown cause said regulators, or one of them, after said inspection, and before said fire, became temporarily and suddenly obstructed in some unknown way, which caused them, or either of them, to cease to work, or regulate said gas, and by reason of which the quantity and pressure of gas was enormously and suddenly increased to a high pressure, which occasioned the injury complained of in the declaration, the defendant is not responsible for such accident, and the plaintiff cannot recover in this action. (13) The jury is instructed that in this case negligence is the ground of the plaintiff's action, and that it therefore rests upon the plaintiff to trace the fault of his injury to the defendant, by proving negligence upon the part of the defendant, and for this purpose he must show the circumstances under which the injury occurred; and if from these circumstances so proved by the plaintiff, and from all the evidence, including the evidence of the defendant, it appears that the fault of the injury was mutual, or, in other words, that the negligence is fairly imputable to the plaintiff or his tenant, the plaintiff cannot recover."

Appellant's instructions Nos. 1 and 2 were given. As to Nos. 3 and 4, in my view of the case they are too sweeping. It is a fact known to all who have any knowledge of natural gas that the pressure is uneven and variable, greater at some times than at others, which facts are also abundantly shown in the evidence in this case; and by reason of such variable pressure it is more or less dangerous to use it; and, if instruction No. 3 is proper to be given, contributory negligence would have to be presumed in every case of this character. I think it simply tends to confuse and mislead the jury; and, if No. 4 is proper, then in no instance could a consumer leave his house with the gas turned on to any extent without being guilty of contributory negligence in case of destruction of his property from the gas. However, a majority of the court holds No. 3 to be good, and that the same should have been given, and that No. 4 was properly rejected. As to instructions Nos. 5, 6, 7, and 9, there was evidence tending to prove that the fixtures of plaintiff, especially those connecting the gas with the stove where the fire originated, were not well put in, as shown by the evidence of Robert and Charles Barlickman, who did the work; that it was probably not a good job, or well done, and that Dr. Rinehart, the tenant, had notice thereof; and also tending to show that such fixtures were not in good order and repair, and were not safe. In view of the evidence in the case, said last-named instructions were improperly rejected. Appellant's instructions 10, 11, and 12 are drawn upon appellant's theory of "ordinary care" only being incumbent upon it, and were properly rejected as presented, and should not have been given unless "ordinary care" was so qualified in said instructions to be "such care as is required by the dangerous character of natural gas." Instruction No. 13 is the law as laid down by Cooley on Torts (p. 803,* 873). He says: "The plaintiff must show the circumstances under which the injury occurred, and if, from these circumstances, it appears 44 L. R. A.

that the fault was mutual, or, in other words, that contributory negligence is fairly imputable to him, he has, by showing them, disproved his right to recover;" and adds: "There is a legal presumption against negligence, upon which he is at liberty to rely, thus casting the burden of showing contributory negligence upon the defendant." The instruction is in consonance with plaintiff's instruction No. 11 "that the burden of proving contributory negligence rests with the defendant, but the jury may look to all the evidence offered by both parties to determine the question of contributory negligence"; and should have been given. Gerity v. Haley, 29 W. Va. 98, and Carrioco v. West Virginia O. & P. R. Co. 39 W. Va. 86, 24 L. R. A. 50 (Syl. point 7).

Instruction No. 8, which is made the subject of bill of exceptions No. 4, is as follows: "(8) If the jury believe from the evidence that the house of the plaintiff described in the declaration was by the defendant furnished and supplied with gas upon the application of the plaintiff's tenant, Milton Rinehart, and that such gas was conducted from the defendant's main or gas line to the said house by means of pipe, valves, fittings, and appliances laid and furnished by the said tenant with the consent of the plaintiff, and that such gas was furnished upon the promise of the said tenant that he would keep and maintain said pipe, valves, fittings, and appliances in good order and repair, the jury is instructed that it was the duty of the plaintiff, or his tenant, Milton Rinehart, to see that the pipe, valves, fittings, and appliances and fixtures on the premises of the plaintiff, described in the declaration, and which conducted the gas from the defendant's gas line to the premises of the plaintiff, were kept in good order and repair, and in proper and safe condition for the use and consumption of gas on the premises and in the house of the plaintiff; and if the jury believes from the evidence that such pipes, valves, fittings, and appliances which made the connections necessary to conduct said gas from the defendant's gas line to said premises were not, at the time of the burning of the plaintiff's house, in good order and repair and safe condition for the consumption of such gas, and that the fire which destroyed the plaintiff's house was caused from gas, and that such fire was caused by escape or leakage of such gas, or the negligent manner of taking care of or using the same after leaving the defendant's main or gas line, the plaintiff cannot recover, even if the defendant was negligent as claimed by the plaintiff in his declaration." For the same reasons given above for granting instructions 5, 6, 7, and 9, this No. 8 should have been given as presented, and without the modification by the court as given.

For the reasons herein given, there is error in the judgment complained of, and the same is reversed and annulled, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded to the circuit court for a new trial to be had therein

v.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY of London, Plff. in Err.

(..... W. Va.)

*1. While the judgment of a competent court of any state that has jurisdiction over the person or subject-matter is conclusive upon the merits of the controversy in every state, a court of another state has not the power, without service of process or voluntary appearance, to render a judgment on a contract that is absolutely void, under the statutes of the state where it is made.

2. If such a void contract is sued on by a foreign attachment in a foreign jurisdiction, the garnishee must make defense to the action, or notify, if practicable, his absent creditor of the pendency of the attachment proceedings, that such creditor may make such defense; otherwise, a judgment rendered by default will not protect the garnishee when sued by his creditor.

(Brannon, P., dissents.)

(December 17, 1898.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hancock County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Erskine & Allison, for plaintiff in error:

A judgment in an attachment proceeding, if the defendant has appeared to the merits, or has been served with process, will be in personam as well as in rem.

1 Barton, Law Pr. 971.

Where there is a seizure of the defendant's property at the commencement of the action, or in garnishment, what is equivalent to seizure at that time, namely service of process on the garnishee, accompanied in both cases by publication or other form of substituted service against the nonresident defendant, such process is due process of law in attachment suits, and a judgment so rendered will divest the defendant of his title to such property, and will protect the garnishee from the danger of double payment.

The judgment of a justice comes within the term "judicial proceeding."

Black, Judgm. §§ 935, 936.

The invalidity of the contract between Mrs. Stewart and Porter & Company did not deprive the Ohio justice of jurisdiction to pass on any question that was before him in that case. Both the proceeding and the judgment were in rem.

The fact that Mary A. Stewart was a married woman residing and contracting in a state where the laws at the time held her personal contract void would, if it had been pleaded in the Ohio court, have been a complete defense to the action of Porter & Company.

There is no evidence that the garnishee knew that she was a married woman, and the law did not require it to be concerned with any fact not affecting the jurisdiction of the court.

Black, Judgm. § 595; Earl v. Matheney, 60 Ind. 202; Drake, Attachment, 7th ed. §§ 876, 87c, 88a, 89, 89a, 89b.

The Northern Assurance Company is entitled to protection because the judgment was by a court which had jurisdiction over it, and over its indebtedness, which both parties admit was valid.

Black, Judgm. § 888.

Had this been a personal judgment rendered in Ohio against a married woman on a contract made in Ohio and while she was by the law of that state incompetent to make it, the judgment would not be declared a nullity merely on account of such incapacity to make the contract.

The claim that the fact that a debt has its situs where it was contracted, and where the debtor resides, will bar a jurisdiction by attachment in another state where a debtor of that creditor may be found, will not be sustained in West Virginia.

Assuming that Justice Hauser's court had jurisdiction of the person of Mrs. Stewart, and of the res attached, had it jurisdiction to render the judgment it did? Drake, Attachm. § 691.

McWhorter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mary A. Stewart, a married woman, was the owner of an hotel and furniture in New Cumberland, Hancock county, which was insured by the Northern Assurance Company of London, England, which had its central or principal office in the United States, at Cincinnati, Ohio. A loss occurred by fire, which was duly adjusted at $1,700; and before the money was paid to the assured, Porter & Company, a corporation doing business at New Cumberland, brought an action before Louis Hauser, a justice of the peace, at Cincinnati, Ohio, on a store account against Mary A. Stewart, and sued out an attachment against the property of said Stewart, and cited the said assurance company to answer as garnishee, as the debtor of said Stewart. In obedience to the summons duly served on it, the company appeared and answered, admitting its indebtedness to Stewart, when the justice heard the case, rendered judgment against the defendant, and issued an order against the garnishee, requiring it to pay $251.07, the amount of Porter & Company's judgment, which it did on the 16th of June, 1892. On the 27th of July, 1892, Mary A. Stewart brought her action against said assurance company in the circuit court of Hancock county, upon her policy of insurance, to recover the said sum of $1,700. The defendant appeared, and filed a special plea in writing, setting up the payment made by it under the said proceedings in Cincinnati of $251.07, and paid into court the residue of the $1,700, with its interest; to the filing of which special plea plaintiff, by counsel, objected, which objection was by the court overruled, and the plea allowed to be filed, and leave was granted to plaintiff to file a special replication thereto by the 1st of April, 1893. To the special plea of defendant plaintiff tendered her special replication, in writing, averring that at the time the contract mentioned in said special plea, and upon which the alleged judgment of Porter & Company was recovered, was made, plaintiff was, and still is, a married woman, under coverture, domiciled and resident in the state of West Virginia, and then and ever since and there living with and not separate from her husband, William Stewart, and the said contract was made in the state of West Virginia, while she was so under coverture, domiciled, resident, and living with her husband as aforesaid, and this she was ready to verify, wherefore she prayed judgment, etc., to the filing of which special replication the defendant objected, which objection the court overruled, and permitted the same to be filed, to which ruling of the court defendant excepted. On the 15th day of May, 1897, the case being called, and neither party requiring a jury, by consent the matters arising on the issue were submitted to the court in lieu of a jury; and the court, having considered the evidence adduced and the arguments of counsel, rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the said sum of $251.07 and costs of the action. The defendant moved to set aside the finding and judgment, and grant it a new trial, on the ground that the same is contrary to the law and evidence, which motion the court overruled, and the defendant excepted. The bill of exceptions shows that the proceedings before Justice Hauser were regular and the transcript thereof properly attested, certified, and proved, and it was agreed by the parties that the transcript should not be copied into the record, and that, as proved, it established and proved every allegation of fact contained in defendant's special plea as to the proceedings in said action and the judgment by Justice Hauser against defendant as garnishee, and the payment by it, in obedience to the order of said justice, on June 16, 1892, of $251.07. It was also agreed that it was proved that defendant, at the time it was proceeded against as garnishee, had complied with the laws of the state of Ohio with respect to foreign insurance companies doing business in that state, and was subject to be proceeded against in the courts of said state as provided by the laws thereof applicable to foreign insurance companies doing business therein, and which evidence was by the court not copied into the record. It was also agreed that the plaintiff proved by witnesses all the matters of fact alleged in her special replication. The facts and allegations both of the special plea of defendant and plaintiff's special replication thereto were admitted by both parties to be proved at the trial, all of which is set forth in the bill of exceptions. Defendant applied for, and obtained, a writ of error, making the following assignments: First, because the circuit court should have rejected the special replication of the plaintiff to the defendant's special plea, or should have sustained the demurrer to said replication; second, because the court erred in giving effect to said replication, and in treating the facts therein set up as affecting the jurisdiction of Justice Hauser to render the judgment pleaded in the defendant's special plea; third, the court erred in overruling defendant's motion for a new trial.

Appellant's counsel, in their brief, say: "The fact that Mary A. Stewart was a married woman, residing and contracting in a state where the laws at the time held her personal contract void, would, if it had been pleaded in the Ohio court, have been a complete defense to the action of Porter & Company, because the courts everywhere, in the exercise of their undoubted jurisdiction, give force and effect to the lex loci contractus." They further say: "There is no evidence that the garnishee knew that she was a married woman, and the law did not require it to be concerned with any fact not affecting the jurisdiction of the court,"—and cite Black, Judgm. § 595, in support of their proposition. Their position is correct to the extent said section goes, but, by their proposition that the law does not require the gar-nishee to be concerned with any fact not affecting the jurisdiction of the court, they assert that the garnishee owes no duty to its own creditor in the premises, which is untenable. In Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 727, 24 L. ed. 565, 570, Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Substituted service by publication, or in any other authorized form, may be sufficient to inform parties of the object of proceedings taken when property is once brought under the control of the court by seizure or some equivalent act. The law assumes that property is always in the possession of its owner, in person or by agent; and it proceeds upon the theory that its seizure will inform him, not only that it is taken into the custody of the court, but that he must look to any proceedings authorized by law upon such seizure for its condemnation and sale." It is presumed that, when property in the possession of an agent is seized on legal process, the fact is known to the agent; and in case of garnishment of funds in the hands of a debtor of the defendant who is a nonresident, and not served with process, it is clearly the duty of such garnishee, if practicable, to notify his creditor of the proceedings, that he may make such defense therein as his rights and interests may require. Appellant's special plea alleges that the process was served on it on May 2, 1892, requiring it to make answer on the 5th day of the same month, which answer it filed on said last-mentioned day, when, "it appearing that the summons has not and cannot be duly served on the defendant in this county, this cause is continued to June 15, 1892, at nine o'clock A. M., for publication of notice," which is the entry made by the justice as alleged in the special plea; that notice was duly published, and, at the time mentioned, Porter & Co. appeared, and proved their claim, and judgment was rendered against the defendant, who failed to appear, and also an order was issued on the garnishee to pay the said judgment and costs, which order was delivered to the constable; and that in obedience thereto on the 16th of June, 1892, the garnishee paid same. In its special plea, defendant wholly failed to allege that it had notified, or attempted in any way to notify, the plaintiff, its creditor, of such proceeding. For want of such allegation, the plea was not sufficient in law, and the objection thereto should have been sustained. In Morgan v. Neville, 74 Pa. 52 (Syl. point 3), it is held that "a garnishee in foreign attachment, to protect himself, must give notice to his own creditor," and this is manifestly right. Pierce v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 283 (Syl. point 1); also 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1234, and cases there cited; Martin v. Central Vermont R. Co. 59 Hun, 347.

It is admitted by appellant that if plaintiff had appeared and pleaded the statute of her state as it then existed, in the action before Justice Hauser, the claim of Porter & Company must have been defeated; and yet with the full knowledge of the proceedings against her, and that she had no notice thereof, and could not be served with process, it stood by, and meekly paid out her money, in obedience to the justice's order, without even attempting, so far as the record shows, to notify her of the jeopardy of her property in its hands, all of which "smacks" strongly of collusion. Appellant cites Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. v. New York Carousal Mfg. Co. 95 Va. 515, 40 L. R. A. 237, in support of its special plea, the court there holding that "it is a settled rule, founded upon obvious principles of natural justice, that a garnishee cannot be lawfully compelled to pay the same indebtedness twice. Nothing can be more clearly just than that a person who has been compelled by a court of competent jurisdiction to pay a debt should not be compelled to pay it over again. Consequently, where he is in such a situation that, if charged as garnishee, this would be the result, he will not be charged, unless his situation is due to his own fault or neglect." In that case it is shown that the garnishee was guiltless of any fraud or collusion. It took all the necessary steps to prevent a recovery in a suit pending in a North Carolina court for the same debt, pleading the garnishment in the Virginia court, but to no avail. The North Carolina court refused the plea, and rendered judgment, and issued execution, and collected the money. When it pleaded the North Carolina judgment, execution, and payment in answer to the garnishment in the Virginia court, that court rejected the plea, and rendered judgment, which was properly reversed by the supreme court.

Appellee insists that Justice Hauser was without jurisdiction in the case, because of the facts set up in her special replication, and that the judgment rendered by said justice is void, and not entitled to the "full faith and credit" provision contained in § 1, art. 4, U. S. Const. The appellee cites the case of Bowler v. Huston, 30 Gratt. 266, 32 Am. Rep. 673, where it is claimed the question is thoroughly discussed; but it cannot be said to cover the question raised in the case at bar. That was an action to enforce a personal judgment rendered by a New York court against Bowler, wherein there had been neither service of process nor appearance in person or by attorney. So, there was nothing upon which to found a judgment, and the record was an absolute nullity, and no question was raised of a judgment in rem, or involving a garnishee or substituted service in the case; and yet, under the statutes of New York, the judgment was a valid personal judgment as far as Bowler's interest was concerned in the firm with which he was surety. In Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 308, 19 L. ed. 931, in discussing the question of jurisdiction, Justice Miller says: "By jurisdiction over the subject-matter is meant the nature of the cause of action and of the relief sought; and this is conferred by the sovereign authority which organizes the court, and is to be sought for in the general nature of its powers or in authority specially conferred. . . . While the general rule in regard to jurisdiction in rem requires the actual seizure and possession of the res by the officer of the court, such jurisdiction may be acquired by acts which are of equivalent import, and which stand for and represent the dominion of the court over the thing, and in effect subject it to the control of the court. . . . So the writ of garnishment or attachment, or other form of service, on a party holding a fund which becomes the subject of litigation, brings that fund under the jurisdiction of the court, though the money may remain in the actual custody of one not an officer of the court." Under the statutes of the state of Ohio, Justice Hauser had general jurisdiction, within the limitations and restrictions contained in such statutes, in all cases of the nature of this proceeding before him based on legal and valid contracts and transactions.

While a judgment of a competent court of any state that has jurisdiction over the person and subject-matter is conclusive upon the merits of the controversy in every state, I question the power of the court of another state, without service of process or voluntary appearance, to render a judgment on a contract that is absolutely void under the laws of the state where it is made, and upon which contract a judgment rendered by a court of such last-mentioned state is void, even upon process duly served. In D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How. 165, 13 L. ed. 648, it was held that "Congress did not intend by the act of 1790 to declare that a judgment rendered in one state against the person of a citizen of another, who had not been served with process or voluntarily made defense, should have such faith and credit in every other state as it had in the courts of the state in which it was rendered." That case was based on the statute of New York which provided that when joint debtors were sued, and one was brought into court on process, if judgment should pass for plaintiff he should have judgment and execution, not only against the party brought into court, but also against other joint debtors named in the original process, in the same manner as if they had all been taken and brought into court by virtue of such process; but it should not be lawful to issue or execute any such execution against the body or against the sole property of any person not brought into court.

It could never have been contemplated by the framers of the Constitution of the United States to include among judgments entitled to "full faith and credit," under § 1, art. 4, a judgment obtained upon a contract absolutely void under the laws of the state where it was made, and upon substituted process. It may be said, then: Where is the protection afforded the garnishee in such case? On the other hand, what protection has the defendant, the creditor of the garnishee, in such a proceeding? The garnishee has better facilities for protecting his interests than the defendant. He is served with process. He knows of the proceeding. He can readily advise the defendant, his creditor, thereof, and make his defense sure, if any there be; while without such notification the defendant remains in profound ignorance of the proceeding until his property is taken from him, may be on a valid, just claim or demand, possibly by the connivance of the plaintiff and the garnishee, on a void or illegal claim.

In White v. Foote Lumber & Mfg. Co. 29 W. Va. 385 (Syl.), it is held that "a judgment rendered by a court of common law against a married woman, either in her own name or in the name of a company under which she does business, upon a contract made during her coverture, is absolutely void; and an execution or suggestion sued out upon such judgment is invalid and ineffectual for any purpose," and "such judgment may be assailed collaterally in proceedings upon a suggestion thereon."

I fail to see any error in the judgment, and the same is affirmed.

Note by McWhorter, J.:

Since the foregoing opinion was handed down, I find the case of Louistville & N. R. Co. v. Nash (Ala.) 23 So. 825 [41 L. R. A. 381], decided in June, 1898, the syllabus of which is as follows:

"(1) The courts of one state have no jurisdiction to attach and condemn a debt, due to and payable to a nonresident where he resides, by service of process on his debtor as garnishee, in the absence of personal service on the creditor within the state of the forum, or his voluntary appearance.

"(2) The payment by the garnishee of a judgment rendered for a debt against a nonresident without personal service within the state of the forum, or voluntary appearance, constitutes no defense to a subsequent suit by the judgment debtor against the garnishee.

"(3) The constitutional provision that 'full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state' does not apply to a judgment against a nonresident debtor, in the absence of personal service upon him within the state of the forum, or a voluntary appearance."

Brannon, P., dissenting:

This case is important in principle, and, regarding the decision in it as plainly erroneous and contrary to the right of the defendant under the Constitution of the United States, I must dissent.

My position is: The justice in Ohio had jurisdiction and authority under the law of Ohio to render the judgment against the garnishee. This is not denied. This judgment had the effect there to protect the defendant against a suit by Mrs. Stewart to make him pay the money again. Having this force in Ohio, it must have the same force in every state, under the United States Constitution, providing that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state," and the act of Congress under it that judgments in a court of one state "shall have such faith and credit given them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the state from which they are taken." We do not go behind the Ohio judgment to see on what contract in favor of the creditor it was rendered, whether good or bad, void or not, because the only question is: Had the court jurisdiction, and did it give judgment protecting the garnishee there? 1 Greenl. Ev. § 548. "It is a question of constitutional obligation, not of state policy, whether our courts will enforce a judgment of another state court of competent jurisdiction, having 44 L. R. A.

jurisdiction in the case. When a judgment or decree of the court of another state is sought to be enforced in a court in this state, the court in this state may inquire into the jurisdiction of the court which rendered the judgment or decree; and if it appears that such court had no jurisdiction the judgment or decree is void, but if it had jurisdiction, the judgment or decree is valid and binding in this state." Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 167. "The first question to be determined in regard to a judgment of another state, after jurisdictional inquiries have been satisfactorily answered, is, What is its effect in the state whence it was taken? The effect which it has there is precisely the effect which must be accorded to it in every other state. It must not be given any greater effect than it had in the state wherein it was rendered. If the judgment appear on its face to be harsh and erroneous, it must be received and enforced, irrespective of its harshness. The pleas which might be made to it at home, and those only, can be made to it in any other part of the Union." 2 Freeman, Judgm. § 575. The law is that it is not the domicile of the owner of the debt garnished that tests the place of jurisdiction for garnishment, but the question whether the court had control over the garnished debtor within its territory. Mooney v. Buford & G. Mfg. Co. 34 U. S. App. 582, 72 Fed. Rep. 32, 18 C. A. 421; Douglass v. Phenix Ins. Co. 138 N. Y. 209, 20 L. R. A. 118.

Mrs. Stewart could sue the company in Ohio, and therefore it could be garnished there. "Foreign corporations are subject to the process of garnishment in all cases in which an original action may be commenced against them in the courts of this state to recover the debt in respect to which the garnishment process is served. . . . A foreign corporation doing business within the state may generally be made a garnishee in that state when by the laws of the state, service of process may be properly made upon it therein; when, according to the jurisdictional rule, the debt is payable within the state, or the corporation has within its control property belonging to the principal defendant." 2 Shinn, Attachm. § 493. "When, however, there is seizure of the defendant's property at the commencement of the action, or, in garnishment, what is equivalent to seizure at that time, namely, service of process upon the garnishee, accompanied in both cases by publication or other form of substituted service against the nonresident defendant, it is well settled that such process is due process of law in attachment suits, and that a judgment so rendered will divest the defendant of his title to such property, and will protect the garnishee from the danger of double payment." Reno, Nonresidents, § 241. See Molynous v. Seymour, 30 Ga. 440, 76 Am. Dec. 671. 2 Black, Judgm. § 852, says: "The judgment of a foreign court of competent jurisdiction, in a proceeding in the nature of a garnishment, is binding and conclusive, and affords a complete protection to the garnishee, and the money paid under it cannot be recovered back by the original owner of the debt in any action in another country." Garnishment is a proceeding in rem, binding everywhere (2 Shinn, Attachm. § 486; 30 Ga. 440, 76 Am. Dec. 671; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 543); at least so far as the property garnished and its owner are concerned. "The liability of property belonging to nonresidents to be attached and sold under legal process is determined by the law of the state in which the property is actually situated, and from whose courts the process issues, and is not determined by the law of the state in which the owner resides. Hence, in case of conflict between the laws of these two states, the law of the former governs." Reno, Nonresidents, § 148. "Where, however, the garnishee is a resident of the state, the fact that the principal debtor is a nonresident will not affect the validity of the garnishment proceedings, because attachments are permitted against nonresident debtors. And the fact that the principal defendant is served by publication only has no effect upon the jurisdiction of the court, when the property or debt is within the power of the court; that is to say, where the property is within the jurisdiction of the court or the debt is payable therein." 2 Shinn, Attachm. p. 861. But the opinion by Judge McWhorter says that the contract of a married woman was void in West Virginia when this one was made. That is no matter. The question is the force of the Ohio judgment in Ohio. Ohio Rev. Stat. §§ 4996, 5319, authorize judgments on married women's contracts. Thus, the judgment is not void there. The position of Judge McWhorter is answered by many authorities. Our own court, in Black v. Smith, 13 W. Va. 780, held: "When a court of law in the state of Maryland, having jurisdiction of the subject and person of the citizen, renders judgment in a cause therein pending, against such citizen for money, the validity of such judgment rendered by such court cannot be questioned in the courts of this state: nor will the courts of this state look into the transaction upon which the Maryland judgment is founded in order to ascertain if that judgment ought not to have been rendered by the court." Johnson, P., in Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 173, said: "But it is not on the ground that such suits have been maintained in many states that we would enforce a decree for such cause in our own courts, nor would we sustain it because it agreed with our policy, nor refuse to enforce it here because it is hostile to our policy. The reason why we would enforce a decree, rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction in another state is the fact that the Constitution of the United States requires us to do so. For the wisest purposes, the states, when they formed and adopted the Constitution of the United States, provided, in § 1 of article 4: 'Full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state.' If this clause had not been inserted in the Constitution and rigidly enforced by the judiciary in all the states, our relations as states to each other would have been anything but harmonious. Citizens, by passing 44 L. R. A.

from one state to another, could escape the effect of their contracts and obligations. It is not a question of state policy whether we will or will not give effect to the judgments of courts of competent jurisdiction of other states. It is a question whether we will in good faith live up to the constitutional obligations which we have assumed. In Gilchrist v. West Virginia Oil & Oil Land Co. 21 W. Va. 115, 45 Am. Rep. 555, we decided that where a judgment rendered in another state is sought to be enforced in a court in this state, our courts may inquire into the jurisdiction of the court which rendered it, and if it appear that the court which rendered the judgment had no jurisdiction, the judgment or decree is void; but, if it had jurisdiction, it is valid and binding in this state; that, in deciding what effect a judgment rendered in another state is to have in this, it must be regarded as well settled that it must have the same effect here as it had in the state where it was rendered. It is not an open question whether we will enforce the judgments and decrees of another state rendered by courts of competent jurisdiction having jurisdiction to render such judgment or decree. The general rule is as we have stated it. If there are any exceptions, I have not been able to find them. I do not say there can be none. If the court of common pleas of Columbiana county had jurisdiction to pronounce the decree rendered there, and sought to be enforced here, we must give full faith and credit to it, and enforce it here." 2 Black, Judgm. § 888, reads: "As to whether the personal disability of the defendant at the time the judgment was rendered against him is a good defense to an action on such judgment in another state, the question depends upon the status of the judgment in the state of its rendition. Its validity must be tested by the laws of that state. If the coverture, infancy, or insanity is regarded, in the state where the judgment is rendered, as making the judgment absolutely void, that invalidity may undoubtedly be shown against it in any other jurisdiction. If, on the other hand, the rendition of a judgment against such a person is regarded, in the state where it is given, as a mere irregularity or error in fact, having no greater effect than to make the judgment voidable on a proper direct proceeding for that purpose, then it will not be a good defense to an action on the judgment in another state. This rule is illustrated by a case ruled in Iowa. . . . The defendant answered that the judgment was void because rendered while he was a minor. . . . The chief justice said: 'If there was an error in fact in permitting defendant to appear by attorney when a minor, it was an irregularity, and as such no more affected the validity of the judgment than if it had been an error in law. In either case the error, whether of law or fact, does not render a judgment void; but a party may have his remedy in the state where the judgment was rendered, either in the same or in an appellate tribunal. The defense cannot prevail here; for, until set aside, the judgment would have full force and effect in Ohio, and is entitled to the same here. The error does not go to the jurisdiction of the court." And the theory that the debt of the married woman is void will not sustain this decision. It is void, it is true, in West Virginia, in a court of law, and only there; for it is a valid debt in equity, binding her separate estate. The money garnished for it was separate estate, and bound for this debt under our own law. A court of equity would, in this state, make it liable therefor. A justice in Ohio exercises law and equity jurisdiction, and his judgment binds that estate for this debt as a decree, in equity would here. Do not think that I assert that the personal judgment against Mrs. Stewart in Ohio binds her. I mean that it binds her as to the debt, so as to protect the garnishee from second payment. I do not mean that it would further bind her.

I would much prefer that the court should give, as the reason for its decision, the reason given in Pierce v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 288, and Morgan v. Neville, 74 Pa. 52,—that garnishee, to be protected, must notify his creditor,—than to place the decision on the untenable ground it does; though, with Thompson, Homesteads & Exemptions, § 864, I do not think notice necessary, as I have not found it suggested in other cases. Publication, as dictated by the law of Ohio, is legal warning. Nor did the company have to plead that by the law of West Virginia the contract was void. No evidence shows that it knew she was a married woman. In its widespread business, why require it to inquire? If the state seize the debt in its hands, shall it go further? Shall not Mrs. Stewart bow to the majesty of the republic, which makes that seizure valid? Shall she assume to question the power of the republic, though she suffer from it, if she could suffer in paying a just debt for groceries, making her life and the lives of those dear to her to subsist? Id. §§ 864, 866, shows this to be an unreasonable requirement. Nebraska and Wisconsin require that a garnishee shall plead that the debtor has a right to the garnished debt as an exemption, but other authorities deny it. Moore v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 43 Iowa, 385; Jones v. Tracy, 75 Pa. 417; Conley v. Chilcote, 25 Ohio St. 320; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. May, 25 Ohio St. 347. I hold that this state, through this court, should give to the defendant the protection which the Constitution of the republic designed to give to all citizens alike. No mere sympathy should defeat this high behest of the highest municipal law.

NOTE BY DENT, J.: The assurance company doing business in the state of West Virginia must be presumed to know the laws thereof, and, having insured the separate property of Mary A. Stewart, a married woman, must be presumed, after the custom of insurance companies, to know that she was a married woman, and what were all her rights and liabilities with regard to said property under the laws of said state, and therefore must be presumed to have known that her separate property was not subject to her husband's control, nor liable for the payment of his debts: and, being under his coverture, she was entitled to be supported by him, and that any simple contract debt made in relation to such support was void as to her, and binding on her husband alone, and could not in any wise affect her separate property, as the laws of West Virginia then stood. Porter & Company being residents of the state of West Virginia, must also be presumed to be fully cognizant of these matters, and that their alleged claim was no debt against Mrs. Stewart, but binding on her husband alone. Knowing this they seek a remote foreign tribunal, and upon a false and fraudulent affidavit, for they knew they had no debt which was enforceable against the separate estate of Mrs. Stewart; they invoke its aid to secretly seize and wrongfully appropriate her property, without her knowledge. She is given no notice of these proceedings, as such would be fatal to them, but publication is made in a local paper, which she has no chance of seeing; and thus her separate property is fraudulently seized and appropriated without her knowledge, and her debtor, the garnishee, presumably with full knowledge of her rights and the fraudulent purpose of the plaintiffs, Porter & Company, and with its agencies in the state of West Virginia, makes no effort to defend the action, as it had the right to do, or to notify her thereof, that she might interpose her defense. Why did the garnishee thus remain silent? There can be but one answer, and that is that it was colluding with Porter & Company to unlawfully apply Mrs. Stewart's separate estate on a debt for which it was not liable, and thus perpetrate a fraud upon her without her knowledge. The justice was not to blame in the matter, for he was imposed upon by the fraudulent conduct of the plaintiff, aided and abetted by the silence of the garnishee. The "Constitution and majesty of the great republic" was never intended to be a cover for such fraudulent practices, and permit persons, by collusion, to wrongfully appropriate the property of another by deceit and stealth. This judgment against the garnishee, under the circumstances, should be regarded as though procured by itself. Smith v. Dickson, 58 Iowa, 444. The suppression of the truth oftentimes operates to perpetrate a fraud as completely as the utterance of a falsehood, and no one should be permitted to take advantage of a wrong in which he participates. The garnishee had the plaintiff's separate property, and it was in duty bound to defend it from the wrongful appropriation of others to debts to which it was exempt, or notify her of such wrongful attempt. Having failed to do either, it is no more than right that it should bear a loss incurred, to say the least, by its own indifference. Of two innocent parties, the one whose negligence occasioned the loss should bear the burden thereof. I concur in Judge McWhorter's opinion, for the foregoing reasons.

James GARTLAN.

(.....W. Va.....)

*1. A lease for the purpose of operating for oil and gas for the period of five years, and so much longer as oil or gas

*Headnotes by DENT, J.

NOTE.—As to forfeiture of oil and gas lease, see also Evans v. Consumers' Gas Trust Co. (Ind.) 31 L. R. A. 673, and note.

is found in paying quantities, on no other consideration than prospective oil royalty and gas rental, vests no present title in the lessee except the mere right of exploration; but the title thereto, both as to the period of five years and the time thereafter, remains inchoate and contingent on the finding, under the explorations provided for in such lease, oil and gas in paying quantities.

2. The completion of a nonproductive well, though at great expense, vests no title in the lessee.

3. Such lease must be construed as a whole, and, if there is no provision therein contained requiring the boring of another well after the first unsuccessful attempt is completed and abandoned, the lease becomes invalid and of no binding force as to any of its provisions.

(April 16, 1898.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Ritchie County in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to cancel a certain lease as a cloud on plaintiff's title under a lease of oil land. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. V. B. Archer, for appellant:

Gartlan under the terms of his lease of February 11, 1895, only took the privilege of exploring for oil on the 122 acres of land. He had no interest in either the surface or minerals.

Messrs. Van Winkle & Ambler, for appellee:

Gartlan's lease was valid. It was dated February 11, 1895, and ran for five years and as long as oil and gas were found in paying quantities. It was liable to forfeiture, if a well was not completed in one month, or rental paid. The rental was paid until a well was completed on April 15.

Thus, everything named in the lease was fully complied with; and on the face of the deed he had a term of five years for further drilling.

Guffy v. Hukill, 34 W. Va. 49, 8 L. R. A. 759.

As the lessee makes the expenditure, he has the right to determine and control operations.

It is an implied condition of every lease of land for the production of oil therefrom, that, when the existence of oil in paying quantities is made apparent, the lessee shall put down as many wells as may be reasonably necessary to secure the oil for the common advantage of both lessor and lessee. In determining when and where such wells shall be located, regard must be had to the operations on adjoining lands, and to the well-known fact that a well will drain territory of much larger extent when the sand rock in which the oil or gas is found is of coarse and loose texture, than when it is of fine grain and compact together.

Whatever ordinary knowledge and care would dictate as the proper thing to be done for the interests of both lessor and lessee under any given circumstances is that which the law requires to be done as an implied stipulation of the contract.

Kleppner v. Lemon, 176 Pa. 502.

It is not unusual in undeveloped territory to require a well to be commenced in one year and completed in eighteen months, and the court is not very strict as to the time, even then.

In a field where oil is being taken so close to the leased tract as to drain it, the lessee must be prompt to protect his lines; but in a new territory after the lessee has sunk one well, he is not bound to go forward with other wells, not knowing where to locate them. Dent, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 30th day of August, 1889, Knotts and Garber obtained a lease for oil purposes covering the land in controversy in this suit, without other consideration than one eighth of the oil produced and $200 per annum for each paying gas well, with the stipulation that the lessees should complete a well within one year from the date of the lease; and the failure to do so rendered the lease null and void unless the lessees should pay 25 cents per acre from and after the time above specified for the completion of said well, when such payment should operate to extend the time for five years. This lease David McGregor considered forfeited, and refused to accept the rent therefor, or continue the same in force. If the conditions had been performed by payment of rent accepted by the lessor, it would have expired the 30th of August, 1895, no well having been drilled by Knotts and Garber. On the 10th day of February, 1895, Matilda McGregor, as devisee and executor of David McGregor, then deceased, executed the following lease to James Garltan, to wit:

An agreement, made the 11th day of February, A. D. 1895, between Matilda McGregor, of the district of Grant, county of Ritchie, and state of West Virginia, lessor, and James Garltan, of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, lessee, witnesseth: That the lessor, in consideration of \$1, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and of other valuable considerations, do hereby demise and grant unto the lessee, his heirs or assigns, all the oil and gas in and under the following described tract of land, and also the said tract of land, for the purpose and with the exclusive right of operating thereof for said gas and oil, together with the right of way, the right to lay pipes over and use water from said premises, and also the right to remove at any time all property placed thereon by the lessee, which tract of land is situated in the district of Grant, county of Ritchie, and state of West Virginia, and is bounded and described as follows, to wit: North by lands of Andrew Douglass and B. & O. Railroad, east by lands of Andrew Douglass and Jacob Hatfield, south by lands of A. M. Douglass and others, west by lands of Andy Hall and others, containing 122 acres, more or less; to have and to hold the same unto the lessee, his heirs and assigns, for the term and period of five years from the date hereof, and so much longer as oil or gas is found in paying quantities thereon, yielding and paying to the lessor the one-eighth ($\frac{1}{8}$) part of all the oil produced and saved from the premises, delivered free of expense into tanks or pipe lines to the lessor's credit; and, should any well produce gas in sufficient quantities to justify marketing, the lessor shall be paid at the rate of \$200 per year for such well so long as the gas therefrom is sold, lessor to have gas for domestic use on the premises free, she making her own connections. Second party covenants and agrees to locate all wells so as to interfere as little as possible with the cultivated portion of the farm, and to pay all damages to growing crops by reason of operations. No well to be drilled on this lease within 500 feet of the buildings as now located, without the consent of both parties. In case no well shall be completed on the above-described premises within one month from the date hereof, this lease shall become null and void, and without any further effect whatever, unless the lessee shall pay for further delay at the rate of \$50 per month in advance thereafter until a well shall be completed. Such payment may be made in hand or by deposit to the lessor's credit in Second National Bank of Parkersburg. If above-mentioned well produces 20 barrels of oil per day for the first thirty days after completion, the lessee agrees to drill two more wells on the above-mentioned premises within a year from the completion of the above-mentioned well, provided that the second well drilled produces 20 barrels of oil per day for the first thirty days after completion. If second well does not produce 20 barrels per day for first thirty days after completion, then it shall be optional with the lessee to drill the third well. All wells shall be served with the best known means to produce the greatest quantity of oil. A failure to comply with any of the conditions of this lease shall render the same null and void, and of no effect. It is agreed further that second party shall have the right at any time to surrender this lease to first party for cancellation, after which all payments and liabilities to accrue under and by virtue of its terms shall cease and determine, and the lease become absolutely null and void. It is understood that all the terms and conditions between the parties hereto shall extend and apply to their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns. In witness whereof, the said parties have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

Sealed and delivered in presence of _____ Gartlan, with the assistance of others, put down a test hole about 1,800 feet by April following, but, finding neither gas nor oil in paying quantities, removed the derrick and tools, pulled the casing, and plugged the hole, and left the premises. At the same time he surrendered a number of other leases.

but through his agent, Parks, asked permission of Mrs. McGregor to retain the lease under consideration for a short time. During the time the test was made the lessee paid Mrs. McGregor three monthly payments of $50 each, as stipulated, because of delay in completion of the first well. He then discontinued such payments, and entirely abandoned and ceased further operations for oil and gas on the premises. Mrs. McGregor, according to her testimony, before he stopped operations insisted that he should go deeper, and make a more thorough test, even being willing to part with a further portion of her interest in the result, if successful, if he would consent to do so. But, claiming that he had made a full test, he refused her request. Gartlan had taken a man by the name of Hays in with him. On the 17th of September, 1896, Mrs. McGregor wrote them the following letter:

Cairo, W. Va., Sept. 17, 1896.

Mess. Hays and Gartlan—Gentlemen:

As you have abandoned the lease given you by me on our farm, and shown by your actions that you did not intend to operate it any further, I would ask you kindly to send it to me with a release deed, as I am now ready to lease again. Please give this your earliest attention, and oblige,

M. McGregor.

Getting no reply from this she wrote another letter to a Mr. Parks, who had acted as agent for Gartlan, to wit:

Cairo, W. Va., Sept. 28, 1896.

Mr. Parks—Sir:

I wrote a letter some time ago to Mr. Gartlan and your uncle, asking them kindly to send me the lease that they have been holding on my place. You know you only asked me to hold it for a short time, and now I think I have waited a sufficient time for them to make up their minds on what they intended to do; and they have shown, by abandoning the lease, that they did not intend to operate it, so I think they ought to send me the lease at once, so I could be making something out of it, as life is too short for me to let that amount of land lie idle, and not be making even the taxes off it. Now, please take this in consideration, and act on this at once, as you know I mean business. And I understand you have Mr. Gartlan's place in the Co. now. I don't know what position Gartlan holds in the Co. at this time. Now, do please give this your attention at once, as I am going to lease. I am going to get something out of it or nothing, as the case may be. That remains to be seen. I may get a 19 $\frac{1}{2}$ barrel well next time and may be another dry hole. I can't tell. Now, you understand me. I am going to lease at once if I don't hear from you by return mail.

Yours, in haste, your friend,

M. McGregor.

To this she also received no reply, when she wrote a third letter, as follows, to wit:

Cairo, W. Va., Oct. 3, 1896.

Mr. Parks—Sir:

I wrote you on the 28th Sept., asking for the lease that your Co. holds on my farm; asked you to answer me by return mail, and I think you have had sufficient time to write, and now I am going to write you again, and now I want an answer by wire, as I have no time to wait for mails. Well Mr. Gartlan was here since, and left again without doing anything. He still wants me to wait and see the Wilson and Church wells come in before he does anything, so that will develop the other two sides of the lease. I told him I was not willing to wait any longer; if he was going to do anything, now was the time to do it, while the excitement is up. I can lease now, and to a good advantage; but, if either of those wells should come in dry, it will give another black eye, and I could not lease it at all. So I think he is injuring me in holding this lease from me, and not going to work on it at once, and protecting the lines. If he is not willing to take a risk on it, I am not either. I told him if they wanted to hold it any longer they would have to pay me the back rental. I could have leased it long ago, and been getting more from it than the back rental is worth; but I feel conscientious in the matter, and did not feel disposed to give them any trouble over it, as you know I could by putting a lease on top of theirs. It might cause a lawsuit, at least, and that would cost them more than the rental, so you see I want to treat them fairly, and do what is right by them, if they will let me do so; but, if they will not, then the only thing left for me to do is to look out for myself and the interest of this estate which I represent. Mr. Gartlan promised me he would see your uncle just as soon as he reached Pittsburgh, and wire me what he was willing to do in the matter. Now, I will wait a sufficient time for his telegram, and also for yours, and, if I fail to get one, then I am going to lease at once. I have a good offer, and I am going to take it now while the excitement is up. I am offered more bonus than all the back rental comes to and the one-fourth of the oil if there is any, and, if there is none, I will have the bonus anyway. Now you see my offer is a good one, and they can't blame me for taking it. And now for your lease, or the rental at once, as there is no time to wait, and you know I mean just what I say. So please let me hear from you at once by wire, as the parties are waiting, and are willing to take it at their own risk. Please see your uncle at once, and wire me his conclusion. We have a telegram office here at Cairo.

Yours, in haste,
M. McGregor.

Then, getting no satisfaction from the parties, either in the way of rentals or a new lease, on the 22d of October, 1896, she executed a new lease to Amos Steelsmith, the plaintiff and appellant in this case. In the 44 L. R. A.

meantime the parties claiming under the Gartlan lease moved some timbers on the land, as though in preparation for again boring, which Mrs. McGregor had cast off. Steelsmith, under his lease, proceeded forthwith to put down two wells, both coming in producers, when, before going to further expense, he filed his bill to cancel the Gartlan lease as a cloud on his title. The Gartlan lessees filed an answer in the nature of a cross bill, claiming the cancellation of Steelsmith's lease and the oil wells and their production, which was sustained by the court and the relief sought granted. Knotts and Garber, also, to a supplemental and amended bill filed by Steelsmith, filed an answer in the nature of a cross bill, praying for affirmative relief, which was denied, and the bills were dismissed. Steelsmith appeals.

The question of importance presented to the court is as to whether the Gartlan lease was at an end at the time the Steelsmith lease was executed. The Gartlan lease is, with slight variance, in the usual form of such leases, and amounts to nothing more than the privilege of searching for oil and gas, and, if they be found in paying quantities, then vests an oil and gas tenancy in the lessee for the period of five years, or until exhaustion. Mrs. McGregor entered into the lease for the sole consideration of the prospective rents and royalties she would enjoy if the lessee, in diligent search therefor, should find oil and gas in paying quantities. If such lease failed to bind the lessee to diligent search for oil and gas, it was without consideration, binding on neither party, and voidable, if not void, at the pleasure of either. Cowan v. Radford Iron Co. 93 Va. 547; Petroleum Co. v. Coul, Coke & Mfg. Co. 89 Tenn. 381. The only provision in the lease binding the lessee to prosecute operation thereunder with diligence is as follows: "In case no well shall be completed . . . within one month from the date hereof, this lease shall become null and void, and without any further effect whatever, unless the lessee shall pay for further delay at the rate of $50 per month in advance thereafter until a well shall be completed. . . . If above-mentioned well produces twenty barrels of oil per day for the first thirty days after completion, the lessee agrees to drill two more wells on the above-mentioned premises within a year from the completion of the above-mentioned well, provided that the second well drilled produces twenty barrels of oil per day for the first thirty days after completion." There is no provision made for any further operations or payment of rent in case the first well, when completed, is nonproductive. But the contract is at an end as to both parties as soon as such first well is abandoned as unsuccessful. "A vested title cannot ordinarily be lost by abandonment in a less time than that fixed by the statute of limitations, unless there is satisfactory proof of an intention to abandon. An oil lease stands on quite different ground. The title is inchoate and for purposes of exploration only, until oil is found. If it is not found no estate vests in the lessee, and his title, whatever it is, ends when the unsuccessful search is abandoned." Venture Oil Co. v. Fretts, 152 Pa. 451; Plummer v. Hillside Coal & Iron Co. 160 Pa. 483; Crawford v. Ritchey, 43 W. Va. 252. This unsuccessful search and abandonment in this case applies to the first well, the only one the lessee stipulated to put down unless gas and oil were found in paying quantities. He could not, as he himself maintains, be compelled to put down another well; and, he not being bound, the lessor was not bound either, for the only consideration left to her was the prospective oil royalties and gas rentals, which the lessee was in position to entirely defeat. Contracts unperformed optional as to one of the parties are optional as to both. Nor can there be a different conclusion if it is held that the lease, being for the purpose of operating for oil and gas, is subject to the implied precedent condition, according to the decisions of some of the states, notably North Carolina, that the lessee shall diligently prosecute the search and operation, for in such case the forfeiture would follow in a much less time than eighteen months under the general clause, to wit: "A failure to comply with any of the conditions of this lease shall render the same null and void and of no effect," which necessarily applies to implied as well as express conditions. Conrad v. Morehead, 59 N. C. 31; Maxwell v. Todd, 112 N. C. 677; Hawkins v. Pepper, 117 N. C. 407. In the case of Munroe v. Armstrong, 96 Pa. 307, it was held that a cessation of active operations for thirty days forfeited a lease for oil purposes. The court says, on page 310: "An oil lease yields nothing to the landowner when not worked, and is an encumbrance on his land, tying his hands against selling or leasing to others; but when idle, it costs the lessee nothing, and is valuable, or may prove valuable, if he can hold it awaiting developments in its vicinity. If a well be productive, it is the interest of both lessor and lessee that it be continuously operated till its exhaustion, but, if dry, it is of no value. Holding on to a lease after ceasing search is often for purposes of speculation, the thing which a prudent landowner guards against. Forfeiture for nondevelopment or delay is essential to private and public interests in relation to the use and alienation of property." In this case the condition was express, but the same rule applies with equal force to implied conditions. However, as before shown, the lessee having abandoned the only obligatory search provided for in his lease, it died on his hands without surrender, forfeiture, or intentional abandonment on his part, for he was without authority to make further explorations without the consent of and arrangement as to conditions with the lessor; in other words, without a new lease or extension of the old. Such leases are construed most strictly against the lessee and favorable to the lessor. Beltman v. Harness, 42 W. Va. 433, 36 L. R. A. 566. When a lease provides the mode, manner, and character of search to be made, implications in regard thereto are excluded 44 L. R. A.

thereby as repugnant. And the demise for the purpose of operating for oil and gas for the period of five years is dependent on the discovery of oil and gas in the search provided for, and, if such search is unsuccessful, the demise fails therewith, as such discovery is a condition precedent to the continuance or vesting of the demise. The lessee's title being inchoate and contingent, both as to the five-years' limit and time thereafter, on the finding of oil and gas in paying quantities, did not become vested by reason of his putting down a nonproductive well. This gave him no new or more extensive rights than he enjoyed before, but in fact destroyed all his rights under the lease. As is said in Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 38 L. R. A. 694. "As an abortive well neither enhances the value, nor yields anything to the true owner, he ought not to be charged with its costs thereof." The lessee would charge the expense of this abortive well as though it were a part of the consideration for this lease, when it was plainly evident that no such thing was ever had in contemplation by the parties, but this is a mere desperate afterthought to furnish a nonexistent money consideration for the continuance of the lease. A dry hole, plugged up and abandoned, while expensive to the lessee, is no advantage, but an encumbrance, to the lessor. Then why should she pay for it by a nonoperating and indefinite extension of the lease, to await the will and pleasure of the lessee, who claims the option to operate, abandon, surrender, or forfeit at his pleasure, while numerous others are clamoring for the privilege of diligent operation, and offering a large bonus therefor? Such a holding would be unconscionable, and contrary to both right and justice. Mrs. McGregor's letters are given at length, to show how fully she understood her rights, and yet how willing, out of tender womanly sympathy, she was, in consideration of her lessee's fruitless expenditures, for which she was in no wise responsible, to give her lessee the first option of a new lease. This she was not required to do, and it was wholly gratuitous on her part, but she did not surrender or lose any of her rights thereby. The reason that the lessee gives for the abandonment of the well and the removal and sale of his tools and machinery, being that he was endeavoring to escape the process of the courts of this state to avoid unjust litigation, is not a legal or justifiable excuse. In the case of Cryan v. Ridelberger, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 473, an excuse that the lessee was unable to put down a well on account of the extremely cold weather was held insufficient to prevent a forfeiture, and yet it was much more reasonable than the one given by the lessee in the present case. No excuse, though ever so good, could relieve from the operation of a contract which was at an end by virtue of its own terms. The time the Garber and Knotts lease had to run, in any event, expired before the Steelsmith lease was executed, and hence they have no rights against the latter lease and cannot attack it in any manner for any reason.

For the foregoing reasons the decree complained of is reversed, the lease known as the "Garltan lease," bearing date the 11th day of February, 1895, is canceled, and annulled, and the injunction originally awarded in this case is made perpetual.

Rehearing denied.

v.

BOARD OF POLICE PENSION FUND
COMMISSIONERS of the City and County of San Francisco, Appt.

(.....Cal.....)

Death caused by accident is not from natural causes, within the meaning of act March 4, 1889, § 7, providing an insurance fund for families of policemen who die from natural causes.

(December 22, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco in favor of plaintiff in a mandamus proceeding to compel defendant to audit and allow a claim of plaintiff as widow of a member of the police force upon the police insurance fund. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Harry T. Creswell and William I. Brobeck, for appellant:

Slevin not being a member of the police department at the time of his death, his widow is not entitled to any insurance under the provisions of the act.

This act of 1889 repealed by implication those provisions of the act of 1878 relating to the relief fund, and had the effect of merging the fund created by the act of 1878, with the fund created by the act of 1889.

Pennie v. Reis, 80 Cal. 267, 132 U. S. 471, 33 L. ed. 429.

Slevin did not die from natural causes.

Walther v. Mutual L. Ins. Co. 65 Cal. 417; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 247.

The appellants are not subject to the control of the courts through the writ of mandamus.

Jacobs v. San Francisco City & County Suprs. 100 Cal. 123.

Mr. W. W. Foote for respondent.

Temple, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The superior court, by its judgment, awarded to plaintiff a writ of mandate to compel the defendant to audit and allow the claim of respondent, as the widow of Patrick Slevin, for $1,000, as insurance upon the life of said Patrick Slevin. It is contended that the findings do not support the judgment. By the findings it is shown that Slevin became a member of the police department April 1, 1868, and served until September 23, 1889, when, at his own request, he was retired upon a pension under an act of the legislature passed March 4, 1889. The act provides that a member of the department, after twenty years' service, and he has reached the age of sixty years, and his services in the police department shall have ceased, may be retired on a pension. It is found that Patrick Slevin died on the sixth day of March, 1895, and "that said death was the result of injuries received in a railroad accident two days previous thereto." Section 7 of the act under which the claim is made reads as follows: "Whenever any member of the police department of such county, city and county, city or town shall, after ten years of service, die from natural causes, then his widow or children, or, if there be no widow or children, then his mother or unmarried sisters, shall be entitled to the sum of $1,000 from such fund."

It is contended that Slevin did not die from natural causes, and therefore, under the terms of the act, his widow is not entitled to the insurance. What is meant by the phrase "shall die from natural causes"? It is not an uncommon colloquial expression, and I think uniformly means that the person who died from natural causes was not killed. To say that one died from natural causes is to say that he was not killed; that is, he did not die through external violence or through human agency. I do not think any persons who are proficient in the use of the English language would understand the expression differently. If, in response to the question, "Was he killed?" the reply was, "He died from natural causes," we would be at no loss for the meaning of the reply. So, if the statement were made in a military report that a certain number died from natural causes, the meaning would be clear. Nor are we without authority. In Bouvier's Dictionary (Rawles's Revision, verb. Death) it is said: "Natural death is the cessation of life. It is also used to denote a death which occurs by the unassisted operation of natural causes, as distinguished from a violent death, or one caused or accelerated by the interference of human agency." Black's Law Dictionary (phrase Natural death); "Death resulting from disease, or from natural forces, without the concurrence of man's agency, as distinguished from 'violent' death." See also, Webster's Dictionary, verb. Natural. But it is said that the usual and ordinary meaning of the words leads to absurd results, and the limitation is unreasonable. I confess it is difficult to understand why this particular limitation was imposed; but to give the language its ordinary meaning does not lead to absurd results, and I do not see how, without doing violence to the language, any other meaning than that well established by usage can be given it.

An attempt might be made to make this provision in § 7 the complement of § 6, which provides for a pension to the widow of the officer who loses his life while in the performance of his duty as an officer. This is undoubtedly a provision provided for the case of a violent death. But one provision cannot be the complement of the other, for there is an additional requirement in § 7,—the officer must have served ten years.

Nor can it be held to provide against the case of suicide. There is nothing in the law to indicate such intention, and it is absurd to say that one who dies from wounds inflicted by an assassin dies from natural causes, while, if the same fatal injuries had been inflicted by himself, his death would not have resulted from natural causes. Although unable to understand the reasons which induced the legislature to dispose of the funds in this mode, I see no way to avoid the conclusion that such is the law.

The judgment is reversed.

DELAWARE COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

NATIONAL BANK OF WILMINGTON AND BRANDYWINE

v.

Irving FURTICK,
Liverpool & London & Globe Insurance Company, Garnishee.

(.....Del.....)

1. The service on a foreign insurance company as garnishee is governed by 18 Laws, chap. 681, providing for garnishment of a corporation by service upon the president, treasurer, cashier, or paying clerk, and not by 16 Laws, chap. 140, providing for the appointment by a foreign insurance company of a person or agent upon whom service of process may be made.
2. A demand against a foreign insurance company has no situs for the purpose of garnishment in a state where it has an agency, when the demand is due to a nonresident for a loss of property insured in another state in which the loss was payable.

RESERVATION by the Superior Court for Newcastle County for the opinion of the Court of Errors and Appeals of the question of the vacation of an attachment which had been levied by plaintiff upon a claim of defendant against the garnishee. Attachment vacated.

Irving Furtick was and is a citizen of the state of South Carolina, and he effected insurance upon a stock of merchandise and a store building situated in that state through an agency located there with the Liverpool & London & Globe Insurance Company, a corporation of Great Britain having its principal office for the United States in the city of New York. On December 6, 1894, a loss occurred for which the insurance company acknowledged a liability. Plaintiff is a Delaware corporation having a demand against Furtick. It sued out a writ of foreign attachment in the state of Delaware against him, which was laid in the hands of Ferdinand L. Gilpin, agent for the Liverpool &

London & Globe Insurance Company, who was appointed under the provisions of 16 Laws, chap. 140, requiring the appointment of resident agents before foreign insurance companies could do business in the state. He appeared and pleaded nulla bona. Subsequently a rule was granted to show cause why the attachment should not be vacated, and the question raised by this rule was reserved for the opinion of the court of errors and appeals. It further appeared in the case that Furtick had assigned his claim against the insurance company to Allen J. Green.

Mr. John Biggs for plaintiff.

Mr. William S. Hillos, for defendant:

Service of process of attachment must be made in strict conformity with the provisions of the law relating to attachments, which requires that corporations doing business in the state "shall be summoned as garnishee, for which purpose service of summons upon the president, treasurer, cashier, or paying clerk shall be sufficient."

14 Del. Laws, chap. 90, Passed April 23, 1871, Amended April 29, 1889, 18 Del. Laws, chap. 681.

As Mr. Gilpin was neither the "president," "treasurer," "cashier," or "paying clerk" of the garnishee, the attachment could not be served upon the company through him.

A foreign corporation is not liable to be summoned as a garnishee in respect to a debt payable or property situated without the jurisdiction of the state.

Garnishment rests wholly on judicial process. It can borrow no aid from the acts of the garnishee, and the fact that Mr. Gilpin at the election of the plaintiff pleaded nulla bona cannot give the court any jurisdiction over the cause there having been no appearance by attorney and the corporation not being in court other than by the answer of Mr. Gilpin.

Marvel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It was contended by counsel for the garnishee in this case that the attachment should be vacated for two reasons: (1) Because of want of service upon the statutory officer; (2) because the debt, under the facts, was not the subject of attachment in the state of Delaware. We will first consider whether there was such a service upon the garnishee as to give the court jurisdiction. The garnishee is a foreign corporation and it is unquestioned law that the service must be in accordance with the provisions of the statutes of this state. The sufficiency of the service, therefore, depends upon the requirements of the statutes. What these requirements are, as applicable to the case before us, depends upon which statute controls, — the general insurance law regulating the transaction of business in this state by foreign fire insurance companies or the attachment statute providing for the summoning of corporations as garnishees. The insurance law, passed March 24, 1879, 16 Del. Laws, chap. 347, § 7, and amended for the last time March 17, 1881, 16 Del. Laws, chap. 140, provides, "that before insurance companies shall be permitted to transact business in this state they shall file with the insurance commissioner a certificate of the name and residence of some person or agent, within this state, upon whom service of process may be made, and all processes against said company, issued out of the courts of this state may then and thereafter be served upon such person or agent so designated." At the time of the passage of this law, and the last amendment thereto the act relating to attachments authorized the summoning of corporations as garnishees in attachment proceedings only in the case of "corporations chartered by act of the general assembly" of this state (14 Del. Laws, chap. 90). It was not until April 25, 1889, that the legislature amended this statute, generally known as the "Attachment Act," and subjected all corporations "doing business in this state to the provisions of the laws in relation to garnishees" (18 Del. Laws, chap. 681); and this statute provided that "service of the summons upon the president, treasurer, cashier, or paying clerk, as provided in other attachment cases, shall be sufficient to render said officers and the corporation subject to all the liabilities provided by the said law." Thus it is seen that prior to March 31, 1871, corporations were not subject to the attachment laws of this state, and that by the act of that date only certain corporations "chartered by act of the general assembly" of the state were made liable to be summoned as garnishees in attachment proceedings. Foreign corporations were not included. The insurance law of March 17, 1881, did not extend the attachment law nor authorize the issuing of attachment process against foreign corporations, but only provided that, before foreign insurance companies should be permitted to do business in this state they must appoint an agent upon whom all processes against them issued out of the courts of the state might be served. It provides only for service of process already authorized by law, and attachment against foreign corporations was not then expressly recognized as such a process. It was not until eight years after the passage of this act that the attachment laws were amended, and for the first time "made foreign corporations doing business in this state" subject to be summoned as garnishees in attachment proceedings, and under this act process could be served only on the "president, treasurer, cashier, or paying clerk of such corporation."

It is true, as contended by the counsel for the plaintiff, that the attachment statute is a remedial statute, and that, as a general rule, when the object of a statute is remedial it is to be construed liberally. But it is equally true that when the remedy is sought to be obtained by summary proceeding, and under a statute which is in derogation of the common law, a statute is to be strictly construed and must be exactly followed by those who act under or in pursuance of it. "A proceeding in attachment, as authorized by the statutes of the several states, is always viewed as a violent proceeding, wherein the plaintiff, at the inception of his suit, seizes the property of the defendant without waiting to establish his claim before the judicial tribunals of the land, and the statute authorizing it has invariably received a strict construction." Black, Interpretation of Laws, 315. This rule of construction has become so general in this country that in some of the states statutes have been enacted directing that the attachment laws shall be liberally construed. As before stated, the attachment statutes of this state expressly provide upon whom service must be made to give the court power to appropriate, to the satisfaction of the plaintiff's demand, the effects or credits of the debtor in the hands of the garnishee; for it is by the service of the writ that the court gets control of the property. To acquire jurisdiction and secure such control the terms of the statute must be strictly followed. The power originates with the statute, and exists only to the extent plainly granted. This has been recognized to be the law in this state. In Pennsylvania Steel Co. v. New Jersey Southern R. Co. 4 Houst. (Del.) 572, and in Frankel v. Satterfield, 9 Houst. (Del.) 209, the court (per Grubb, J.) said: "In this state the institution of a suit by foreign attachment process is a statutory proceeding, which must be pursued conformably with the statutory provisions authorizing it." We are therefore of the opinion that service of process upon corporations, when such corporations are to be summoned as garnishees, must be made upon one of the officers designated in the statute relating to attachments. Ferdinand L. Gilpin, under the facts of this case, was not such an officer, being neither the president, treasurer, cashier, nor paying clerk, and the attempt to serve the writ upon the Liverpool & London & Globe Insurance Company through him was ineffectual to bind the corporation, and it should be discharged. If the garnishee should be discharged, no other property being attached, there was nothing to give the court jurisdiction, and the attachment should be vacated.

The second reason assigned why the attachment should be vacated was that, even if it could be granted that service was had upon the statutory officer, the debt, under the facts of this case, was not the subject of attachment. To reach a satisfactory solution of this proposition will require an examination into the nature of attachments and garnishment, and the law fixing the situs of the res when the res is a debt or other chose in action. In doing this we will confine ourselves to the consideration of the attachment and garnishment proceedings against non-residents alone. In Wells v. Jones, 2 Houst. (Del.) 370, Houston, J., said: In this state a suit by foreign attachment is, in its original character, in the nature of an ex parte proceeding in rem to judgment of condemnation against the property bound by the foreign attachment; for, while it continues such there is no appearance of the defendant, no defense whatever pleaded, no issue joined, and no trial had. This was followed in

Frankel v. Satterfield, 9 Houst. (Del.) 201, where the court (per Grubb, J.) said: "Under our statutory provisions it is plain that, if no property has been attached by the writ, there can be no attachment to dissolve, no security given, no appearance by the defendant, no action in personam, and, consequently, from want of jurisdiction, no judgment in personam. Nor can there be a judgment in rem, for a like reason." These views are not new. They have been frequently expressed with more or less distinctness in opinions of eminent judges, and have been carried into adjudications in numerous cases. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 318, 19 L. ed. 932, in the case of absence of personal service on the defendant within the jurisdiction, said: "The court in such a suit cannot proceed, unless the officer finds some property of defendant on which to levy the writ of attachment. A return that none can be found is the end of the case, and deprives the court of further jurisdiction, though the publication may have been duly made and proved in court. Now, in this class of cases, on what does the jurisdiction of the court depend? It seems to us that the seizure of the property,—or that which, in this case, is the same in effect, the levy of the writ of attachment on it, is the one essential requisite to jurisdiction, as it unquestionably is in proceedings purely in rem. Without this, the court can proceed no further; with it, the court can proceed to subject the property to the demand of the plaintiff. If the writ of attachment is the lawful writ of the court, issued in proper form, under the seal of the court, and if it is by the proper officer levied upon property liable to the attachment, when such a writ is returned into court the power of the court over the res is established." And in the subsequent and well-considered case of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 723, 24 L. ed. 569, Mr. Justice Field said: "It is in virtue of the state's jurisdiction over the property of the nonresident situated within its limits that its tribunals can inquire into that nonresident's obligations to its own citizens, and the inquiry can then be carried only to the extent necessary to control the disposition of the property. If the nonresident had no property in the state, there is nothing upon which the tribunals can adjudicate." Hart v. Sansom, 110 U. S. 151, 28 L. ed. 101; Arndt v. Griggs, 134 U. S. 316, 33 L. ed. 918; Grover & B. Sewing Mach. Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. 287, 34 L. ed. 670; Wilson v. Seligman, 144 U. S. 44, 36 L. ed. 339; Scott v. McNeal, 154 U. S. 34, 38 L. ed. 896; Goldrey v. Morning News, 156 U. S. 518, 30 L. ed. 517; Rorer, Interstate Law, p. 174; Drake, Attachm. §§ 52, 54, 453, 478; Waples, Attachm. 227, 244, 249; Story, Conf. L. §§ 532, 592a. Garnishment, as in this case, is a form of attachment. It is an attachment by means of which money or property of a debtor, in the hands of third parties, which cannot be levied upon, may be subjected to the payment of the debtor's claim. To subject the property or credit to attachment, and thus confer jurisdiction, it must be within the jurisdiction, so that the court may obtain legal control of the res; otherwise, it could make no legal disposition of it, because it is an axiomatic principle of law that the courts cannot change rights of property situate without the state. American Cent. Ins. Co. v. Hettler, 37 Neb. 849.

These principles governing attachment and garnishment proceedings against nonresidents are founded upon reason, and established by the adjudicated cases of the highest courts, and recognized by nearly all text writers. It being essential, then, that, in the absence of personal service within the jurisdiction, an actual seizure of or levy on property of the absent defendant within the jurisdiction should be had, and until this is done the jurisdiction is not established, the question of the situs of the property or res is one of paramount importance. This inquiry could present no difficulty in respect to real estate, and little or none in regard to tangible personal property having an actual situs; but, for the purpose of jurisdiction, the situs of a debt or chose in action is a question upon which there has been some diversity of opinion. There is, of course, no actual or visible, but only constructive, situs. Does the debt follow the creditor and his domicile, or the debtor and his domicile? The legal title and right are clearly in the creditor, and, by analogy to the principle that constructive possession is with the rightful owner, we should expect that the chose in action, particularly a debt, follows the person of the creditor for the purpose of attachment, as well as for many other purposes. And such seems to us to be the law, especially where there is no stipulation to the contrary. Central Trust Co. v. Chattanooga, R. & O. R. Co. 68 Fed. Rep. 685; Douglas v. Phenix Ins. Co. 138 N. Y. 209, 20 L. R. A. 118; Everett v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 4 Colo. App. 509; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Maggard, 6 Colo. App. 85; State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, 21 L. ed. 179; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Sharitt, 43 Kan. 375, 8 L. R. A. 385; Renier v. Hurlbut, 81 Wis. 24, 14 L. R. A. 562; Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 33 L. ed. 538. This was laid down in the case of State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, where Mr. Justice Field says: "Debts owing by corporations, like debts owing by individuals, are not property of the debtors in any sense; they are obligations of the debtors, and only possess value in the hands of the creditors. With them they are property, and in their hands they may be taxed. To call debts property of the debtor is simply to misuse terms. All the property there can be, in the nature of things, in debts of corporations, belongs to the creditors to whom they are payable, and follows their domicile, wherever that may be. Their debts can have no locality separate from the parties to whom they are due." The same rule has been held to apply for discharge under insolvent laws. Reno, Nonresidents, § 271; Main v. Mesener, 17 Or. 78. The principle seems well established in cases of attachment for the purpose of giving jurisdiction, especially when the debt is payable at the domicile of the creditor. In Douglas v. Phenix Ins. Co. 138 N. Y. 209, 20 L.

R. A. 118, the facts were that the insurance company, a corporation formed under the laws of the state of New York, was indebted to Douglass, a citizen of New York, the insured, on account of a loss. The insurance company had an agent in Massachusetts, appointed under the laws of that state, upon whom process might be served, and was engaged in carrying on business in that state. Alley and other creditors of Douglass brought suit in Massachusetts, jointly against the insurance company and Douglass, and the attachment or trustee process was served on the legal agent, and levied on the debt. This was set off as a defense to the suit on the policy by the insurance company, and the question was whether the Massachusetts court (that suit having been first instituted) had jurisdiction, and it was held that it had not. The court (Andrews, Ch. J.) said: "We are of opinion that the attempt to execute an attachment in Massachusetts upon the debts owing to the plaintiff by the insurance company by serving upon the agent of the corporation there, and without having acquired jurisdiction of the plaintiff, must fail, for the reason that the debtor, the insurance company, was in no just or legal sense a resident of Massachusetts, and had no domicile there, and was not the agent of the plaintiff, and that in contemplation of law the company and the debt were, at the time of the issuing of the attachment, in the state of New York, and not in the state of Massachusetts." In Everett v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. the facts were: Everett was a citizen of Colorado. Mrs. Walker was a nonresident, though formerly a resident of Colorado, and was indebted to Everett on a promissory note executed by her jointly with her husband. The insurance company was a Connecticut corporation, and had, under a written designation of authority, appointed the superintendent of insurance of the state of Colorado for the purposes of the service of process as a condition precedent to its right to do business in the state. The insurance company admitted an indebtedness to Mrs. Walker on account of the death of her husband, and forwarded to her the money through their agent in Denver. So far as it is disclosed by the record, there was no other tangible property in the state capable of seizure. Everett commenced suit, but was unable to obtain service on the principal defendant. In aid of his suit he procured a writ of attachment to issue, and attempted to effectuate it by the service of the process of garnishment on the superintendent of insurance as the agent of the company. Judgment was entered so that upon the record it would appear there had been a recovery against the principal defendant. The insurance company asked to be discharged, on the invalidity of the judgment, and that they were not legally charged by the service of garnishment on the superintendent of insurance. The court (per Bissel, P. J.) said: "We do not find any satisfactory authority which holds that, where both the debtor and the creditor are outside of the state, a suit may be commenced by attachment, and the debt seized. To escape the force of the doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 711, 21 L. ed. 565, and obtain a judgment against one without the limits of the sovereignty, an attachment must issue and be levied on the property of the nonresident person. To the extent of the property seized, judgment may go against the absent person, and he will be held to have had notice through the seizure of the res, and be bound by the judgment. The cases go this far. It is not easy to perceive how a case is brought within the scope of this exception when the only levy is that made by the service of the garnishment process upon the agent of the nonresident debtor. Nothing is seized, nothing is taken, nothing is within the jurisdiction of the court, and a person out of the state is sought to be brought into court where the service of a writ is upon another, who is likewise absent. The circle never ends. . . . It is as impossible by judicial construction as by legislative enactment to declare that property out of the state, having a domicile with the debtor or the creditor, is within the limits of the sovereignty for the purposes of a levy." In the case of Central Trust Co. v. Chatanooga R. & C. R. Co. in the United States circuit court for the eastern district of Tennessee, the facts, in brief, were: A citizen of Tennessee sought to attach by garnishment proceedings the wages of employees of the railroad company, which was incorporated and organized under the laws of Georgia, with its line of railway extending a short distance into the state of Tennessee. The laborers whose wages were sought to be attached were employed and paid in the state of Georgia. The garnishment was served upon the receiver, who was a citizen of Georgia, but who was appointed by the courts both in Georgia and in Tennessee with power to operate the railroad, and he answered, showing wages due the nonresident. No personal service was had on the nonresident defendant. The court said: "Where both garnishee and the principal debtor are nonresidents of this state, and the debt, such as wages due, is payable in the state of their residence, there is no property within the state, and the courts of the state and the courts of the United States for such state are without jurisdiction to proceed by attachment, and a judgment based on such an attachment is an absolute nullity. And this rule applies fully to the case of wages due by a corporation of another state to its employee, a resident of such other state, under contract of employment there made, and is not affected by the fact that a foreign railway corporation, without being incorporated in this state, extends its railroad into the state, and is subject to suit by process on its local agents." In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Maggard the plaintiff was a resident of Colorado. The defendant was a resident of Kansas, and an employee of the garnishee railroad company, a corporation created by the state of Kansas, but operating a part of its line in Colorado when the wages of its employee for work performed in Kansas, and payable there, was attached. The court (per Reed, J.) said: "As between the plaintiff and defendant, the debt, beyond question, followed the domicile of the plaintiff—that was its situs; but the indebtedness of the garnishee to the defendant did not follow the plaintiff. Its situs was by contract fixed where the services were performed, and the payment to be made, and if such claim or indebtedness is property, in contemplation of the statute, the situs of such property was in Kansas, and not in Colorado. Care must be taken not to confound the indebtedness due from the defendant to the plaintiff with that due the defendant from the garnishee. They have no relation to each other whatever.” The court in this case review the Federal and state decisions, and show that a large majority of the states have followed the principle that, for purposes of jurisdiction in attachment proceedings, the situs of a debt is at the domicile of the creditor, unless otherwise stipulated.

An exception to this rule appears to be where the garnishee is a resident of the state where the proceedings are instituted, and is under the exclusive jurisdiction of that state, and as a consequence under its power to determine for itself the rights and obligations arising from his contracts, and the mode of enforcing them; and possibly another exception is where a foreign corporation is doing business in a state and the debt arose in respect to such business, and where the corporation submits or subjects itself to the law of the state in the same manner and to the same extent in respect to such business as it would be bound to were it a corporation created by the state. We avoid expressing an opinion upon these cases. The proceeding here is not based upon any cause of action that originated in this state, nor to enforce any contract or agreement entered into with any of its citizens or in reference to any subject-matter within the state. It is a case of a nonresident defendant and a nonresident garnishee. True, the garnishee is a corporation doing business in this state, but the debt due the defendant arose from its contract for insurance made through its agency in South Carolina, with the defendant, a citizen of that state, and concerning property situated there, and was payable there under the custom of the company; and it was payable there in accordance with the principle of law that, in the absence of a place fixed by the contract, a debt is payable at the domicile of the creditor (Central Trust Co. v. Chattanooga R. & C. R. Co.) and is not such a credit or property within this state as will confer jurisdiction in this proceeding, even if service had been made upon the statutory officer. To take any other view would be to hold that it existed, had its situs, and was liable to attachment in every state in this Union where the defendant happened to have an officer upon whom process could be served, as a condition precedent to its being permitted to do business in such state. That this is true is shown by the fact that an attempt was made to attach this very same debt by a creditor in the state of New York. Upon motion, the court there vacated the attachment upon the grounds we have just stated. We believe this view to be based upon reason and supported by authority, and 44 L. R. A.

to be the only doctrine consistent with proper protection to citizens of other states. If it is not the situs of the defendant that gives jurisdiction, as is held in National F. Ins. Co. v. Chambers, 53 N. J. Eq. 468, and if it could be granted that service was had upon the statutory officer, we would still hold that the attachment in the case should be dissolved. The statute provides that, before foreign insurance companies shall be permitted to do business in this state, they must appoint an agent upon whom process may be served. The condition has relation to the permission given. The presumption is that only such jurisdiction is claimed as is necessary to deal with litigation arising out of the business that is done under this permission. “Statutes by which the jurisdiction is assumed should be construed strictly, and should not, unless their language is explicit, be held to confer jurisdiction beyond that which is required to enable the courts to take cognizance of matters arising out of the business done within the state, or else to protect and enforce the rights of the residents of their own state against foreign corporations.” Judge Wheeler, in a case decided in Vermont in 1874 (Sawyer v. North American L. Ins. Co. 46 Vt. 697), expressed very strongly the opinion that a statute providing for the appointment of an agent on whom a process might be served ought not to be construed as intended to permit a nonresident to sue a foreign corporation for a cause of action arising outside of the state. He said that, even assuming that the agent in that case had been appointed in obedience to the statute, the question still remained what cases the statute was intended to reach. A statute is to be construed with reference to the old law, the mischief, and the remedy. When this statute was passed, the old law permitted the agents of any insurance company, foreign as well as domestic, to make contracts of insurance within the state under which causes of action would accrue to our own people within the jurisdiction of the state courts. The mischief was that the jurisdiction of the state courts over these causes of action would be unavailing except upon voluntary appearance, for want of power in the courts to compel appearance. The remedy provided was the requiring of any foreign insurance company making such contract to keep an agent in this state on whom service could be made. This would be a full remedy for all that mischief, without requiring such companies to keep an agent here on whom any process for any purpose could be served. There could be no advantage obtained for the people of the state by providing means to give the courts of the state jurisdiction over causes of action that occurred out of the state in favor of persons not citizens of the state against a corporation existing out of the state; and it is not to be presumed that the legislature intended to accomplish that purpose unless that is the necessary result of the enactment. It is more reasonable to suppose that the intention was to provide a method for obtaining jurisdiction over a defendant to a cause of action the courts had jurisdiction of before, than that it was to provide means for obtaining jurisdiction of a cause of action where none was had before, and of the parties also, by the compulsory appointment of an agent. 12 Harv. Law Rev. 1. The statute is not so explicit as to be clearly intended to require a foreign insurance company to submit to suits in this state having no relation to the business done within the state, nor with one of her citizens, or to suits brought by persons that are citizens of the state where the corporation was organized, or of some other foreign state. For this reason, the attachment would have to be dismissed in this case.

The contention of the plaintiff's attorney that no hardship could follow by permitting the judgment, as a foreign jurisdiction would be bound to give full faith and credit to it, does not seem to be in accordance with the rulings of the adjudicated cases. We find that judgments rendered upon such facts as in the present case have been in many jurisdictions held void, and no bar to a suit to recover the same debt in the courts of another state having unquestioned jurisdiction over it. Renier v. Hurlbut, 81 Wis. 24, 14 L. R. A. 562; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Sharitt, 43 Kan. 375, 8 L. R. A. 385. And, by courts assuming jurisdiction in similar cases, parties have been made to pay the same debt twice, through no fault or negligence of their own. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Chumley, 92 Ala. 317; Green v. Farmers' & C. Bank, 25 Conn. 452; Smith v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 33 N. H. 337; Pierce v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 283; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Baker, 122 Ind. 433; McCarty v. The City of New Bedford, 4 Fed. Rep. 818; Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 33 L. ed. 538. The rulings of the courts in these cases were based upon the reason that the previous judgments were rendered without the court's having jurisdiction of the person or subject-matter, and upon the now well-settled principle of law that when the courts are without jurisdiction the proceedings are an illegitimate assumption of power, and no faith and credit or force and effect will be given them in any other jurisdiction. Such judgments cannot be sustained under the provisions of the Constitution requiring that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of other states," and the act of Congress providing for the mode of authenticating such acts, records, and proceedings, and declaring that, when thus authenticated, "they shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States, as they have by law, or usage in the courts of the states from which they are, 44 L. R. A.

or shall be taken." Said Justice Field in Pennoyer v. Neff: "In the earlier cases it was supposed that the act gave to all judgments the same effect in other states which they have by law in the state where rendered. But this view was afterwards qualified so as to make the act applicable only when the court rendering the judgment had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, and not to preclude an inquiry into the jurisdiction of the court in which the judgment was rendered, or the right of the state itself to exercise authority over the person or the subject-matter." M'Elmoyle v. Cohen, 13 Pet. 312, 10 L. ed. 177; D'Arcy v. Ketchum, 11 How. 165, 13 L. ed. 648; Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How. 404, 15 L. ed. 451; Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. 457, 21 L. ed. 897; Frankel v. Satterfield, 9 Houst. (Del.) 201. Such judgment "can be taken advantage of at any time and in any court, where it is offered as a conclusive adjudication between the parties, . . . when collaterally drawn in question may be disregarded and treated as a nullity, and need not be adjudged to be such by a formal and direct proceeding for its vacation or reversal." Frankel v. Satterfield, 9 Houst. (Del.) 201. The contention that the garnishee cannot thus attack the judgment is not supported by any well-considered case. In a suit by attachment the court must acquire jurisdiction and proceed to enter a judgment before it can pronounce any judgment against a party summoned as garnishee. If the previous proceedings are unauthorized and void, there is no sufficient basis to support the judgment against the garnishee. By it no rights would be divested, and the garnishee would not be protected in the payment of a judgment under such circumstances. It would be regarded, as shown by the authorities above cited, as a voluntary, and not a compulsory, payment, and the defendant might compel him to pay a second time. Black, Judgm. § 260. In attachment proceedings, therefore, like the one we are now considering, it is the duty of the garnishee, and a duty he must perform at his peril, to see that the court has jurisdiction. Drake, Attachm. §§ 691, 693; Shinn, Attachm. §§ 660, 707, 708.

It is therefore considered by the court that upon the facts of this case, as set forth in the record filed with the statement of the question reserved, the attachment should be vacated; and it is ordered that the opinion of this court be certified to the court below, and the record remanded.

Cullen, J., dissented, but delivered no opinion.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of Idaho, ex rel. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Respts.,
v.

ALTURAS COUNTY, Existing now under the Name of Blaine County, et al., Appts.

(.....Idaho.....)

*1. The state, having, through each of its co-ordinate branches of government, repeatedly recognized Blaine county as a county and legal subdivision of the state, is estopped, after the lapse of nearly four years, from questioning the regularity of the passage of the act creating the county.

2. The legislature, by an act approved March 5, 1895, established the county of Blaine. The legislature thereafter, in four different acts, recognized the existence of Blaine county as a legal subdivision of the state. The supreme court of the state held the act creating Blaine county to be valid. Its existence was repeatedly recognized by the executive department. The people residing within the territory embraced within Blaine county repeatedly recognized the existence of the county, held general elections therein, participated in by the electors generally, elected county and precinct officers, levied and collected taxes, assumed debts of its predecessors, funded a large indebtedness, brought suits as a county against other counties, and recovered large sums, and exercised all the powers and functions of a county government for a period of nearly four years. Held, that, under such circumstances, the court would decline to examine into the manner of the passage of the act creating the county.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Bannock County in plaintiffs' favor in a quo warranto proceeding to exclude Blaine County from the exercise of municipal powers within the boundaries fixed by the act creating such county. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kingsbury & Parsons, for appellants:

Long acquiescence and universal recognition of a municipal corporation are a bar to any inquiry as to any irregularity in its original formation.

As soon as Blaine county was created suits were brought to test the constitutionality of the act of its creation. Four such suits have been previously heard and determined in this court.

When the point was fully argued and considered, its decision is not without authority,

The state of Idaho is estopped from denying the de jure existence of Blaine county.

Where a county has a de facto existence, recognition and long acquiescence in the existence of the county estop the state from denying its de jure existence.

Messrs. Johnson & Johnson, also for appellants:

Not only has the creation, organization, and existence of Blaine county been repeatedly recognized and declared by the judiciary, but its recognition by the other co-ordinate departments of the state government has been no less unequivocal and explicit.

The court will take notice that Blaine county is, and has long been, organized and its officers chosen and acting under the general laws of the state regulating county government.

"All these laws are constitutional and valid," and it was under these, and not under the law questioned here, that Blaine county is now discharging the functions imposed upon counties, and its officers were elected and are acting.

Mr. Arthur Brown for respondents.

Quarles, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action, in the nature of quo warranto, was commenced in the name of the state, ex rel. attorney general, to recover judgment excluding the defendant, Blaine county, from exercising the rights, privileges, and powers of municipal government within the boundaries fixed by the act creating the county. The two questions raised by the record are these: Was the act of March 5, 1895, creating Blaine county, prohibited by the provisions of article 18 of the Constitution? Was said act passed in the manner prescribed by the provisions of article 3 of the Constitution?

The first of these questions was answered by this court in the decision in the case of Blaine County v. Heard, August 4, 1896, reported in (Idaho) 45 Pac. at page 890, where the court, speaking through its present chief justice, said: "Notwithstanding this case, in all its salient points, has been heretofore presented and considered by us, in view of its importance we have again gone carefully over the case as presented in the briefs and arguments of counsel, and are convinced that the contention of the appellant cannot be sustained, and that the acts of the legislative assembly of Idaho (Sess. Laws 1895, pp. 32, 170), establishing the counties of Blaine and Lincoln, are valid and constitutional laws." It will thus be seen that more than two years ago this court held said act to be constitutional. Since then the people of these two counties, doubtless relying on the judgment of both the legislative and judicial branches of government, have acted on the theory that said act was valid; and the former decision of this court, having been acted upon by the people, who have adjusted the business matters of the county, funded old indebtedness, and created new, should not be disturbed at this late day. No good would be accomplished by overruling that decision, but much evil and confusion would result therefrom. Whether that decision was right or not, public policy and sound legal principles demand that we now adhere to it, and regard that question as a sealed book, which is no longer open to public scrutiny.

But it is argued that the manner of the passage of said act was not considered by the court in Blaine County v. Heard (Idaho) 45 Pac. 890, and that that question is now open, and should be determined in this case. If the regularity of the passage of that act had been attacked in the case of Blaine County v. Heard, the decision would have been upon the same lines as the decision in Cohn v. Kingsley (Idaho) 38 L. R. A. 74. But that question was not raised in the Heard Case, or in any other case that has come before this court. We feel that it is our duty, under the circumstances of this case, taking into consideration the nature of the act in question, the long-continued acquiescence in and recognition of the validity of said act, both by the state and by the people residing in the defendant county, to hold that the state is now estopped from questioning the regularity of the passage of the act in question. The legislature has recognized the validity of the act in question in at least four different bills which have been introduced and apparently enacted into law since its passage. At the regular elections in 1896 and 1898, men have been elected by the people of Blaine county to represent "Blaine county" in both houses of our state legislature, and the senators and representatives so elected have been received and recognized in the legislature as legal representatives of Blaine county. In fact, Blaine county, through its senators and representatives, has participated in conducting and carrying on the state government itself, and has been permitted to do so by the state government, through its different branches, without question. Then the defendant county has been recognized as a valid subsisting county by the courts of this state in divers actions, notably the following cases: Wright v. Kelly (Idaho) 43 Pac. 505; Blaine County v. Heard (Idaho) 45 Pac. 890; Belle-rus Water Co. v. Stockslager (Idaho) 43 Pac. 568; Ravenscraft v. Blaine County Comrs. (Idaho) 47 Pac. 942; Blaine County v. Smith (Idaho) 48 Pac. 286; Osborn v. Ravenscraft (Idaho) 51 Pac. 618; Bingham County v. Bannock County (Idaho) 51 Pac. 769; Blaine County v. Lincoln County (Idaho) 52 Pac. 165. The defendant county has adjusted its business matters, funded a large indebtedness inherited by it from other counties, and has sued, as a county, other counties, and recovered large sums of money. Its existence having been recognized by every department of the state government, and it having been invited and encouraged to act in its municipal capacity, and having acted in such capacity, in the matters suggested, public policy and sound principles of law require that the state now be held estopped from questioning the manner of the passage of the act in question. People v. Maynard, 15 Mich. 463; Rumsey v. People, 19 N. Y. 41; Mitchell v. Campbell, 19 Or. 198; Speer v. Kearny County, 88 Fed. Rep. 762; State, West, v. Des Moines, 96 Iowa, 521, 31 L. R. A. 186; Jameson v. People, 16 Ill. 257, 63 Am. Dec. 304; Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. p. 312.

It is unnecessary to cite further authority or adduce further argument showing why the state should be now held estopped from questioning the legal existence of Blaine county. We do not desire to be regarded as announcing the rule that a legislative act which is void at the time of its passage, because not passed in the manner required by the Constitution, can ripen into a valid act by the mere lapse of time. The conclusion in this case is based upon a rule of estoppel, demanded in this case by public policy. The act in question is different from an ordinary act of legislation, and should not be held subject to the same rules, under the conditions surrounding this case.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to sustain the defendants' demurrer to the complaint and enter judgment in favor of the defendants, dismissing the action. Costs awarded neither party.

(June 18, 1898.)

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to issue to complainant a license to open subscription books for the capital stock of a proposed corporation. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Church & McMurdy, for petitioners:

Among the aids to a proper construction of a doubtful statute is, "a contemplation of the object to be accomplished . . . by the clause in which the ambiguity is met with."

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 80.

The declared object of the legislature in the clause under discussion is to authorize the formation of corporations "for any lawful purpose except insurance."

The legislature had made provision by the statute of 1869 for what was ordinarily and popularly known as "insurance" in that day.

So that when the legislature of 1872 undertook, in obedience to the command of the Constitution (art. 11, § 1), to "provide by general laws for the organization of all corporations hereafter to be created"; the word "insurance" which was employed to designate one of the excepted classes, was no doubt used to avoid interference with the general laws already existing.

The prior state of the law furnishes the clue to the real meaning of the ambiguous provision.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 73, note 2; Stuart v. Hamilton, 66 Ill. 255; Epps v. Epps, 17 Ill. App. 200; United States v. Dickson, 15 Pet. 141, 10 L. ed. 689; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 223, 224; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 186.

There is a certain clearly-defined and radical distinction, not only in the meaning of the two words "insurance" and "suretyship," but between the contracts of insurance and of suretyship or guaranty, both in their legal and popular acceptance.

Lucena v. Craufurd, 2 Bos. & P. N. R. 300; Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 160; Beach, Ins. (1895) § 1; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Farrish, 73 Ill. 166.

The object of the exception was not to exclude the classes of business named from the field of corporate enterprise.

It was the legislative intent that these excepted classes should be provided for by what may be called special general laws, some of which were already in force, and the fact that the legislature, while so providing for the different kinds of insurance, as that term is popularly understood, has passed no specific act for the organization of corporations to carry on the business of suretyship, affords some evidence, at all events, of the 44 L. R. A. legislative understanding of the meaning and effect of the act of 1872.

The legislature has recognized the business of corporate suretyship.

Wilkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original petition for mandamus against James A. Rose, as secretary of state. The petition sets forth that on January 27, 1898, petitioners made application to the respondent for a license authorizing them to open subscription books to the capital stock of a proposed corporation. The application was made in due form, and accompanied by the requisite fee. The object of the corporation, as contained in the statement, is as follows: "To transact in the state of Illinois and elsewhere the business of guaranteeing the fidelity of persons holding public or private places of trust, and the performance by persons, firms, and corporations of contracts, bonds, recognizances, and undertakings of every kind, and of becoming surety on bonds required by law, and on every kind of contract, obligation, and undertaking of persons, firms, and corporations." The secretary refused to issue the license, upon the ground that the statute under which the application is made does not authorize the organization of corporations for the objects stated in the application. Section 1 of the statute entitled "An Act Concerning Corporations," approved April 18, 1872, provides "that corporations may be formed in the manner provided by this act, for any lawful purpose, except banking, insurance, real-estate brokerage, the operation of railroads, and the business of loaning money, provided," etc. The only question here raised is whether or not the objects, or any of them, of the proposed corporation, fall within the exception "insurance."

The following definitions of the term "insurance" are cited from standard authorities on behalf of the respondent: "Guaranty insurance is a contract whereby one, for a consideration, agrees to indemnify another against loss arising from the want of integrity, fidelity, or insolvency of employees and persons holding positions of trust, against insolvency of debtors, losses in trade, losses from nonpayment of notes and other evidences of indebtedness, or against other breaches of contract. It includes other forms of insurance, which are specifically classified as 'fidelity guaranty,' 'credit guaranty,' etc." 1 Joyce, Ins. § 12. "Insurance is a contract by which the one party, in consideration of a price paid to him adequate to the risk, becomes security to the other that he shall not suffer loss, damage, or prejudice by the happening of the perils specified, to certain things which may be exposed to them." Lucena v. Craufurd, 2 Bos. & P. N. R. 300. "Insurance, in its most general sense, is a contract whereby one party agrees to indemnify another in case he shall suffer loss in respect of a specified subject by a specified peril." 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 280. "Insurance is a contract whereby one, for a consideration, undertakes to compensate another if he shall suffer loss. Such, in its most general terms, is the definition of the contract which is to constitute the subject of the following chapters. It is substantially the definition given long ago by Roccus, and is recommended alike by its brevity, its logic, and its comprehensiveness,—qualities upon which subsequent writers have scarcely been able to improve. . . . It had its origin in the necessities of commerce; it has kept pace with its progress, expanded to meet its rising wants and to cover its ever-widening fields, and, under the guidance of the spirit of modern enterprise tempered by a prudent forecast, it has, from time to time, with wonderful facility, adapted itself to the new interests of an advancing civilization. It is applicable to every form of possible loss. Wherever danger is apprehended or protection required, it holds out its fostering hand, and promises indemnity." 1 May, Ins. §§ 1, 2. "A contract whereby, for a stipulated consideration, one party undertakes to indemnify the other against certain risks." 1 Phillips, Ins. § 1. "A contract by which a person, in consideration of a gross sum or a periodical payment, undertakes to pay a larger sum on the happening of a particular event." Smith, Common Law, 299. "In law, a contract by which one party, for an agreed consideration, which is proportioned to the risk involved, undertakes to compensate the other for loss on a specified thing from specified causes." Century Dict. Insurance. "An act or system of insuring or assuring against loss; specifically, the system by or under which indemnity or pecuniary payment is guaranteed by one party or several parties to another party, in certain contingencies, upon specified terms." Standard Dict. Insurance. "The act of insuring, or assuring against loss or damage by a contingent event; a contract whereby . . . one party undertakes to indemnify or guarantee another against loss by certain specified risks." Webster, Dict. Insurance. It is said in 9 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 65 (cited in People, Stevens, v. Fidelity & C. Co. 153 Ill. 32, 26 L. R. A. 295): "Guaranty insurance is, in its practical sense, a guaranty or insurance against loss in case a person named shall make a designated default, or be guilty of specified conduct. It is usually against the misconduct or dishonesty of an employee or officer, though sometimes against the breach of a contract. This branch of insurance is so much more modern in origin and development than fire, marine, life, and accident insurance that there are few decisions upon the subject; but the business is gradually increasing, and is doubtless destined to take an important place in the commercial world. It may be confidently stated, notwithstanding the comparative absence of specific decisions, that the general principles applicable to other classes of insurance are applicable here as well. Thus, the general doctrine of warranty, representation, and concealment, as applied to fire, life, and marine insurance, is applicable also to the subject of guaranty insurance. It was held in a Canadian case that a company was liable on a policy guaranteeing the faithful and diligent performance of the duty of a clerk where such clerk went to lunch, leaving a large sum of money in open bags in his room, which money disappeared while he was gone. Overdrafts allowed without security, by collusion with the party making the overdrafts, is within a policy which insures against loss 'by the want of integrity, honesty, and fidelity, or by the negligence, default, or irregularities of the manager.'" In Shakman v. United States Credit System Co. 92 Wis. 366, 32 L. R. A. 383, it was held that a contract to indemnify a merchant against loss from insolvency of customers was a contract of insurance, and it was said: "We regard the contract before us as unquestionably a contract of insurance. An insurance contract is a contract whereby one party agrees to wholly or partially indemnify another for loss or damage which he may suffer from a specified peril. The peril of loss by the insolvency of customers is just as definite and real a peril to a merchant or manufacturer as the peril of loss by accident, fire, lightning, or tornado, and is in fact much more frequent. No reason is perceived why a contract of indemnification against this ever-present peril is not just as legitimately a contract of insurance as a contract which indemnifies against the more familiar, but less frequent, peril by fire. This very contract has been (sub silentio) construed as a policy of insurance by the supreme court of New Jersey. Robertson v. United States Credit System Co. 57 N. J. L. 12. The contract being, then, a contract of insurance, and the defendant's business being the making of such contracts, it follows that the defendant is an insurance corporation, within the meaning of §§ 1977 and 1978, Rev. Stat." In Tebbetts v. Mercantile Credit Guarantees Co. 38 U. S. App. 431, 73 Fed. Rep. 95, 19 C. C. A. 281, the action was upon a policy of insurance against business losses or "uncollectible debts" issued by the defendant to the plaintiff, and it was said: "Insurance against mercantile losses is a new branch of the business of underwriting, and but few cases dealing with policies of that character have as yet found their way into the courts.

The necessarily nice adjustments of the respective proportions of loss to be borne by insurer and insured, the somewhat intricate provisions which are required in order to make such business successful, and the lack of experience in formulating the stipulations to be entered into by both the parties to such a contract, have naturally tended to make the forms of policy crude and difficult of interpretation."

We do not understand counsel for petitioners to deny that under these authorities and definitions one or more of the objects stated in its application fall within the term "insurance." But it is insisted that inasmuch as at the time of the passage of the general incorporation law of 1872, under which they seek to organize, there were already in existence statutory provisions for the incorporation of companies known as "insurance companies,"—that is to say, fire, inland navigation, and marine insurance companies, also life insurance companies,—and that provisions like those of the charter here sought by petitioners were practically unknown at that time, therefore the legislature did not intend, by the use of the word "insurance," other kinds of insurance than existed at that time, and named in the prior enactments. The proposition is untenable. While corporations of this character have not until recently been organized, they must, under the foregoing authorities, be treated as a form of insurance companies, and as such they fall within the express limitation named in the statute. The language of the exception, in common acceptance, includes all insurance companies, and it is not for the court to say that only certain classes were intended. "Courts cannot, as a general rule, disregard the plain language of a statute. It is their duty to accept it as they find it, and enforce it as plainly written." Ottawa Gaslight & Coke Co. v. Downey, 127 Ill. 201, and authorities cited. "It is not the province of the judiciary to make laws, but to construe and interpret them, and pass upon their validity." Referring to authorities cited, it is further said: "A careful examination of all of these cases will show that where the construction given to the words of a statute is variant from their strict and literal meaning, such construction is only justified upon the ground that it effectuates the intention of the legislature as manifestly disclosed by a consideration of the whole context. Wunderle v. Wunderle, 144 Ill. 62, 19 L. R. A. 84. The manifest purpose of the legislature in excepting banking, insurance, real-estate brokerage, and other corporations from the provisions of the act authorizing the incorporation of companies for other lawful purposes, was that these excepted corporations should be restrained by more strict requirements, securing the safe conduct and correct administration of their affairs. The object stated in the petitioner's application—especially that of guaranteeing the performance by persons, firms, and corporations of contracts, bonds, recognizances, and undertakings of every kind—is not only to enter into contracts of insurance, within the meaning 44 L. R. A.

of the authorities cited, but within the spirit and reason of the exception.

We think the application of the petition was properly refused, and the petition for a writ of mandamus will be denied.

v.

CHICAGO CITY RAILWAY COMPANY.

(173 Ill. 289.)

The gripman of a cable street car is not guilty of negligence in failing to stop or slacken speed upon seeing boys standing near the curb 12 feet from the track, in the street in front of the car, so as to render the company liable for injury to one who suddenly starts to run across the track after the car has reached a point where it cannot be stopped before striking him.

(April 21, 1898.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Burnham & Baldwin for appellant.

Messrs. W. J. Hynes and H. H. Martin for appellee.

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of trespass on the case, brought by Hermanus T. G. Rack, by his next friend, in the circuit court of Cook county, to recover damages on account of personal injuries sustained, he being at the time a boy about four years and seven months old. The accident occurred on the 8th day of August, 1893, on Fifty-Fifth street, west of the crossing of Fifty-Fifth street and Kimbark avenue, in the city of Chicago. The defendant's cable trains at that point run east and west on Fifty-Fifth street. Plaintiff and another small boy were first seen by the gripman of the cable train, which was approaching from the east, standing in the roadway of Fifty-Fifth street, south of the east-bound cable track, 2 or 3 feet from the curbstone. The grip car at that time was about 150 feet away, and was running at the rate of about 10 miles an hour. The distance from the curbstone to the east-bound track was estimated at 12 feet. When the grip car was 30 or 40 feet away, the elder boy started to run north across the street, and when he had gone about 15 feet the plaintiff also started to run across, directly in front of the approaching train. The gripman shouted as soon as the older boy started, and also at plaintiff when he started. He put on the brake, and reversed the lever, when the first boy started, but could not stop in time to save the smaller boy. One witness testified the plaintiff reached the track, stubbed his toe, and fell when the train was about 20 or 30 feet away; others, that he ran against the corner of the grip car and fell, or was knocked down by it. One of his feet was so crushed and lacerated that it became necessary to amputate it at the joint, taking off all the toes on that foot, leaving only the stump. After striking the child, the train ran the length of the grip car and about half the length of the next car, or about 34 or 35 feet, before it came to a stop. At the close of the evidence, on defendant's motion the court instructed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and judgment was entered upon the verdict for costs in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff appealed to the appellate court for the first district, which affirmed the judgment of the circuit court, but granted to appellant a certificate of importance, and appellant asks a reversal of the judgment of the appellate court.

The only question necessary to be considered in this case is embraced in appellant's third assignment of error, vis., Did the trial court err in granting defendant's motion by instructing the jury to find the defendant not guilty? In considering the propriety of such an instruction we have nothing to do with any question as to the preponderance of the evidence, or the credibility of the witnesses, or the force to be given to the evidence having a tendency merely to impeach the veracity of the witnesses. The only question is whether any evidence was given which, if true, would have tended to support a verdict for plaintiff. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Dunleavy, 129 Ill. 132. In Simmons v. Chicago & T. R. Co. 110 Ill. 340, this court used the following language (p. 346): "But we think the more reasonable rule, which has now come to be established by the better authority, is that when the evidence given at the trial, with all inferences that the jury could justifiably draw from it, is so insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff that such a verdict, if returned, must be set aside, the court is not bound to submit the case to the jury, but may direct a verdict for the defendant." Pleasants v. Fant, 22 Wall. 120, 22 L. ed. 782; Randall v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 109 U. S. 478, 27 L. ed. 1003; Martin v. Chambers, 84 Ill. 579. The case of Simmons v. Chicago & T. R. Co. 110 Ill. 340, was referred to with approval by this court in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. O'Conner, 115 Ill. 201, and again in Bartelott v. International Bank, 119 Ill. 271.

The alleged cause of action set out in the declaration in the case at bar is that the 44 L. R. A.

Chicago City Railway Company, by its servants, so carelessly and improperly drove and managed the grip car and cable train that by and through the negligence and improper conduct of the defendant, by its servants, the plaintiff was permanently injured. There was no evidence tending to show appellee was guilty of negligence. The evidence shows that the train of which George Eighme was the grip driver, and which injured appellant, was going west on Fifty-Fifth street; that the gong was rung for Kimbark avenue; that just as the train was crossing Kimbark avenue, and when near the center of the avenue, the grip driver noticed a couple of small boys about 3 feet from the curb, on the south side of Fifty-Fifth street; that when he first saw them they were both together, standing by the curbstone on the roadway, about 12 feet south of the south or east-bound track; that on the day of the accident the track was wet and slippery; that when the track was dry a train could be stopped in about 60 or 70 feet, but when slippery or wet it took a longer distance; that, when the car was within 30 or 40 feet from the boys, the older boy suddenly started to run across the track in front of the car, to the north side of the street; that, when he had gone about 15 feet, the smaller boy, the plaintiff, started to follow the first or larger boy, and he was struck by the car and injured. It further appeared from the evidence that when the gripman saw the first boy start to run across in front of the car he immediately applied the brake, reversed the lever, and commenced stopping as fast as he could; that he hallooed as soon as the first boy started, and also when the smaller one started; that he stopped as fast as he could, but says he could not stop in time, possibly, to save the small boy; that he could not have stopped sooner than he did. There was no testimony tending to contradict the gripman, but the testimony shows that he did all that was possible to stop the train and avoid the accident. It appears, also, that the grip car was only about 40 feet from the smaller boy and his companion when the latter started, which was the first thing to indicate that he intended to cross the track. Until this boy started, there appeared no necessity for stopping or slackening the speed of the train. Neither appellant nor the older boy was on the track, but they were by the curb, and in no danger, but started on a sudden impulse to run across the street,—an act which could not be foreseen or guarded against by the gripman,—and under the evidence the car could not have been stopped in time to prevent the accident.

In Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Carey, 56 Ind. 396, a child two and a half years old stood on the street crossing 3 to 5 feet from the street-railway track. A car drawn by one horse approached at the usual rate of speed of cars in that city. The driver saw the child when 60 feet away. When the head of his horse was from 3 to 5 feet from the crossing, the driver noticed that the child was about to move towards the track, and he tried to stop the car, but could not do so, and the child was run over. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. On appeal the supreme court held the judgment must be set aside, because there was no evidence of the driver's negligence. The reasoning of the court in that case seems so applicable to the case under consideration that we give a portion of the opinion. The court said: "The duty to the traveling public was to make regular trips, and on time, whenever it could reasonably be done. This necessarily forbade that he should stop his car or slacken its speed except when there was a necessity for it. The running of the street cars, as we have said, conformably to the regulations, was a service useful to the public, and required by implied contract. In our opinion, the facts in this case do not show that a necessity appeared for stopping or slackening the speed of the car till the plaintiff attempted to cross the track; that when that necessity did appear the driver made what effort he could to avert the catastrophe that happened, but that the effort was unavailing, because the necessity was created by the act of the plaintiff when it was too late to avert the unhappy consequences of that act. . . . She stood still beside the track. There she had stood from the moment the driver first saw her, and continued to stand till, it may be said, she, in effect, threw herself under his horse's feet. Nothing indicated to him that she intended to cross the track, but on the contrary, that she was standing there for the purpose, as was the habit of children of the city, to witness the passage of the car. The facts would justify the driver in drawing this conclusion. Everything indicated to him that there was no necessity for stopping the car or slackening its speed. We do not think it is the duty of a street-car driver to stop his car, or to constantly creep along at a snail's pace, for fear or in anticipation that some child may possibly throw itself under his horse, in the absence of anything indicating the probable occurrence of such an act. . . . It seems to us that he was not bound to slacken his speed, it then being but ordinary, till there was a necessity for it. What necessity for it appeared in this case? The plaintiff was standing beside the track, where she was out of danger, and where it was common for children to stand as the cars passed. She evinced no disposition to enter upon the track, or to approach to a dangerous proximity to it. The presumption was that she would not. In such a case, it seems to us clear that it was not negligence in the driver to continue his usual rate of speed till the plaintiff did commence to move upon the track." The following authorities are of similar import: Flanagan v. People's Pass. R. Co. 163 Pa. 102; Fleishman v. Niversink Mountain R. Co. 174 Pa. 510; Chilton v. Central Traction Co. 152 Pa. 425; Trumbo v. City Street Car Co. 89 Va. 780.

Appellant contends that the mere fact that the speed of trains is limited to a certain rate cannot furnish an excuse for running at that rate under all circumstances. The proof shows that the cable runs at the rate of 12 miles an hour; that the gripman had commenced slowing up, and was running at the rate of about 10 miles an hour. There is no testimony showing that the train was running at a rate of speed that was dangerous, or that was prohibited by the ordinances of the city of Chicago. Neither is there any evidence to show but that the train was properly supplied with brakes, and there is no allegation in the declaration of negligence in that regard. There being no evidence tending to show that appellee was guilty of negligence, and the evidence being insufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiff, the trial court properly instructed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

(October 25, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hamilton County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged conspiracy to procure the arrest of plaintiff as a common prostitute for the purpose of destroying her character and the weight of her evidence as a witness in a case against the defendant Tucker. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John D. Widaman and Lemuel W. Royse for appellants.

Messrs. Frank D. Butler, Charles E. Averill, and Fertig & Alexander for appellee.

Monks, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee brought this action against appellants. The complaint was in two paragraphs. It is alleged in the first paragraph, among other things, in substance, that the appellant Tucker had been sued by appellee for breach of promise to marry, and that the trial of said cause had resulted in a judgment in her favor, and the same was pending in this court on appeal; that there was another action pending in the state of Mississippi against said Tucker; that the interest of said Tucker in said cause was great, involving many thousand dollars, and prior to the commissions of the wrongs complained of by appellee she had testified as a witness in each of said causes against said Tucker, and was an important witness against him; that said cause in the state of Mississippi was set for a retrial before a jury on the 26th day of February, 1895, a day subsequent to the commission of the wrongs complained of, and she had promised and agreed to be present and testify as a witness in said cause in the state of Mississippi, all of which was well known to said Tucker prior to the formation of the conspiracy by him and his co-appellants; that some time prior to January 28, 1895, appellants conspired together to unlawfully kidnap and decoy appellee from her residence in Peru, Indiana, to the city of Indianapolis, and there inveigle and entrap her into a house of prostitution, where she should be found, and to cause the fact to be made known and published in the newspapers, and thereby to blacken and defame her character and name, and to degrade and disgrace her, and subject her to the contempt and ridicule of society,—all of which was done and carried out for the purpose of, and with the intent to, destroy the character and standing of appellee as a witness in said cause, and to destroy the force and effect of her testimony so far as the same should be adverse to said Tucker; that appellants did afterwards, in pursuance of said conspiracy, and in furtherance of their said corrupt design, inveigle and entrap her into a house of prostitution in the city of Indianapolis, where she was arrested on the charge of being a prostitute, and taken to the police station; that she had no knowledge or means of knowledge of the character of said house until after her arrest. The second paragraph sets forth the same facts in regard to the suits against Tucker, and the fact that appellee was an important witness against him in said causes; and when the cause was set for trial in Mississippi, and the conspiracy to destroy her character, and thereby destroy the weight and effect of her testimony in said actions against appellant Tucker, the same as the first paragraph. It is then alleged that in pursuance of said conspiracy appellants did, on the 21st day of January, 1895, at the city of Indianapolis, falsely and maliciously cause and procure appellee to be arrested by the police of said city, and to be by them transported through the streets of the city, and to be imprisoned and incarcerated in, and to be slated upon the records of, said police station, as a prostitute; that said prosecution was instituted maliciously, and without any probable cause whatever, in pursuance of said conspiracy; that upon the trial of said cause she was acquitted by the police court in which said charge was tried. A general denial to the complaint was filed by each appellant, and upon the issues so joined the cause was tried by a jury, and a special verdict returned, upon which, over a separate motion for a new trial by each appellant, judgment was rendered in favor of appellee. Each appellant has assigned errors, which are substantially the same: (1) That the court erred in overruling the separate motion of appellant for a new trial; (2) that the court erred in overruling said appellant's motion for a judgment in his favor on the special verdict; (3) that the court erred in permitting appellee to remit $3,000 of the verdict, and rendering judgment for $5,000.

It is assigned as one of the causes for a new trial in the motion of each appellant that "the court erred in refusing to allow defendants to prove by the deposition of Robert Anderson that the defendant Eiler was, at the date of the commission of the alleged offense set forth in the complaint, a person of unsound mind and that he was still a person of unsound mind at the time of the trial." The bill of exceptions recites that "the defendants, by counsel, offered to introduce in evidence the deposition of Robert Anderson to prove the unsoundness of mind of William Eiler." The bill of exceptions shows that appellee objected to the introduction of the deposition, and that the objection was sustained. It will be observed that the offer was to prove the unsoundness of the mind of William Eiler. No time was mentioned. The offer so made had reference to the time of the trial. His unsoundness of mind at that time was no defense, either for Eiler or his coappellants. But, if the offer to prove the unsoundness of the mind of Eiler referred to the time of the commission of the wrongs complained of, does the record show that the court below committed reversible error in excluding the same? It will be observed that the offer to prove the unsoundness of mind of Eiler was made by appellants jointly, and the ruling of the court excluding the evidence offered was excepted to by the appellants jointly; that it is assigned in the motion of the appellant Eiler, as well as in each of the motions of the other appellants for a new trial, not that the court erred in not allowing the one making the motion to prove the unsoundness of the mind of Eiler, but that the court erred in "not allowing the defendants to prove the unsoundness of the mind of Eiler." No question is presented by the record, therefore, as to whether or not it would have been error to have excluded such evidence if it had been offered on behalf of Eiler alone. The only question presented by the record is whether such evidence was competent on behalf of all the appellants. It is clear that the unsoundness of the mind of Eiler at the time of the commission of the acts complained of, if a defense for him to either or both paragraphs of the complaint, was no defense for his co-appellants. They were liable for his acts, as well as their own, in furtherance of the alleged conspiracy, the same as if he was a person of sound mind. No man can shield himself from liability for his wrongful acts on the ground that the person who assisted in carrying out and executing his wrongful purpose or the wrongful purpose of himself and others, was a person of unsound mind. One who aids or abets or otherwise procures a person of unsound mind to commit a wrongful act or acts to the injury of another is liable in damages therefor to the person injured, whether the person of unsound mind is or not.

It is next insisted that there was no evidence connecting appellant Tucker with said conspiracy, and that he is not, therefore, liable for the acts done by his coappellants in pursuance of said conspiracy. There was no direct evidence that said appellant Tucker was a party to said conspiracy, but there was circumstantial evidence which, when considered in connection with the other evidence in the cause, was sufficient to sustain the special verdict of the jury against said appellant. In order to establish a conspiracy it is not necessary that there should be direct evidence of any agreement. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 804, 865. It is true that appellant Tucker testified that he had nothing to do with the acts complained of, but the jury were the exclusive judges of the credibility of the witnesses, and, for all that appears from the record, may have been justified in disregarding his evidence. As there was competent evidence which satisfied the jury, we cannot disturb the verdict on the weight of the evidence.

No motion was made by either of appellants for a judgment in his favor on the special verdict. No question is presented, therefore, by the second error assigned.

Neither is the question whether appellee was entitled to a judgment in her favor on the special verdict presented by the third error assigned. That error challenges the right of the court to permit $3,000 of the damages assessed to be remitted, and to render a judgment for $5,000, instead of the whole amount, $8,000. There was no error in permitting a remittitur by appellee of a part of the damages assessed, and rendering judgment only for the remainder. 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 309-317; Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Beckett, 11 Ind. App. 547, 552-554, and cases cited. Even if the assignment of error had been that "the court erred in rendering judgment on the verdict in favor of appellee," no question could have been presented, because only a general objection and exception were taken in the court below to the judgment, and no defect or mistake was specifically pointed out to the rendition of said judgment, nor was any motion made to modify or otherwise change it. It is settled law that, unless the objection particularly points out the defect or mistake in the judgment, and asks that the same be corrected, in the court below, no question concerning the same can be presented on appeal. Evans v. State, 150 Ind. 651, 655, 656, and cases cited; Jarrell v. Brubaker, 150 Ind. 260, and cases cited; Cockrum v. West, 122 Ind. 372, 377, and cases cited; Rardin v. Walpole, 38 Ind. 146, 150; Smith v. Dodds, 35 Ind. 452, 460; Buell v. Shuman, 28 Ind. 464, 466; Elliott, App. Proc. §§ 345, 346. We have, however, examined the special verdict, and every fact essential to a judgment on said verdict in favor of appellee is set forth therein. It was not necessary to find as a fact that the prosecution alleged in the second paragraph was without probable cause. When a special verdict is returned in an action for malicious prosecution, the jury must find the facts, and the court determines from the facts found whether or not there was probable cause. Helwig v. Beckner, 149 Ind. 131, 133, and cases cited. Neither was it necessary that the special verdict should find the evidence and all the surplusage contained in the complaint.

Finding no available error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF MARSHALLTOWN, App't.,

v.

MARSHALLTOWN STATE BANK.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. The drawee bank which pays the good-faith holder of a forged check cannot recover back the money paid.

NOTE.—As to the duty of a bank to know the signature on a forged check, see note to Germania Bank v. Boutell (Minn.) 27 L. R. A. 635. 44 L. R. A.

2. Negligence of a bank which first cashes a forged check and puts it in circulation cannot be imputed to a subsequent good-faith holder of the check, so as to make him liable to the drawee, from whom he has obtained payment of the check.

3. The forgery of an indorsement on a forged check will not make a good-faith holder liable to the drawee, which has paid the check.

(January 25, 1899.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Marshall County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover from an indorsee money which had been paid to it by the drawee of a forged check. Affirmed.

Statement by Waterman, J.:

One F. M. Smith, having in his possession a check drawn on plaintiff bank, payable to the order of Smith & Hauser, and purporting to be signed by one J. R. Bradbury, indorsed the payee's name thereon, and presented it to the Citizens' Bank of Union, and obtained of this bank the cash therefor. This last-named bank indorsed the check as follows:

Pay F. A. Balch, cashier, or order.

Citizens' Bank, Union, Iowa.

C. E. Lawrence, Cashier.

—and forwarded it to the Marshalltown State Bank, of which Balch was cashier, and received credit for the amount thereof on the books of the last-named bank. The transaction was concluded by the Marshalltown State Bank indorsing the check, and presenting it to plaintiff bank, which cashed it. Bradbury, the purported drawer of the check, was a depositor in the last-named bank. A few days after the check was paid, plaintiff discovered that the signature of the drawer was forged, and thereafter this action was begun to recover the amount paid. A jury was waived by the parties, and the case tried to the court. From a judgment in defendant's favor, plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. Binford & Snelling for appellant.

Messrs. C. E. Albrook and E. F. Binford for appellee.

Waterman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A few facts in addition to those stated above are shown by the record, and something is claimed for them by the parties. We shall set them out, although, in our view of the case, they do not affect the conclusion at which we arrive. One Hauser was engaged in business near Union, and Smith, whose misdeed gives rise to this contention, was stopping with him. Shortly prior to the transaction complained of, Hauser sold some live stock to Bradbury, and Smith, who collected the money therefor, took from Bradbury a check, payable to the order of Smith & Hauser. This check Smith indorsed in the name of Smith & Hauser, and cashed at the bank of Union. There was in fact no such firm as Smith & Hauser. The testimony shows that the check we are now speaking of was made by Bradbury, payable to the firm, at Smith's request, and that Hauser knew nothing of this fact, or of Smith's indorsement of the paper.

2. Some of the text writers on negotiable paper lay down the rule that, when a bank upon which a check is drawn pays it upon the forged signature of the drawer, the money can be recovered as paid under a mistake of fact. Story, Prom. Notes, §§ 379, 529; 2 Parsons, Notes & Bills, 80. Others, while recognizing a different rule, incline to 44 L. R. A.

the opinion that the one just stated is the most equitable. 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. chap. 48, § 13. But, whatever the text writers may think, a long line of authority sustains the proposition that, as between the drawee and a good-faith holder of a check, the drawee bank is to be deemed the place of final settlement, where all prior mistakes and forgeries shall be corrected and settled at once for all; and if overlooked, and payment is made, it must be deemed final. There can be no recovery over. Price v. Neale, 3 Burr. 1355; Redington v. Woods, 45 Cal. 406, 13 Am. Rep. 190; First Nat. Bank v. Ricker, 71 Ill. 439, 22 Am. Rep. 104; First Nat. Bank v. Northwestern Nat. Bank, 152 Ill. 296, 26 L. R. A. 289; Deposit Bank v. Fayette Nat. Bank, 90 Ky. 10, 7 L. R. A. 49; Commercial & F. Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 30 Md. 11, 96 Am. Dec. 554; Star F. Ins. Co. v. New Hampshire Nat. Bank, 60 N. H. 442; Iron City Nat. Bank v. Peyton, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 184; Bank of St. Albans v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 10 Vt. 141, 33 Am. Dec. 188; National Park Bank v. Ninth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 77, 7 Am. Rep. 310; Germania Bank v. Boutell, 60 Minn. 189, 27 L. R. A. 635. See further, 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1071. This doctrine is founded by some courts upon the thought that the drawee bank is conclusively presumed to know the signatures of its depositors. This, however, may be too narrow a basis. It may well be that such a rule is demanded by the necessities of business in these times, when the currency of the commercial world is composed so largely of checks and drafts. Whether it is the better rule or the one most consonant with reason and justice is no longer an open question. The discussion seems to have been foreclosed by the overwhelming weight of authority. The rule, however, has one qualification, introduced by some cases, and which we feel inclined to adopt. When the holder of the check has been negligent in not making due inquiry, if the circumstances were such as to demand an inquiry, when he took the check, the drawee may recover. Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 399; First Nat. Bank v. State Bank, 22 Neb. 769; First Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 151 Mass. 280. The appellant seeks to bring its case within this exception. But the only negligence charged here is against the Bank of Union, which first cashed the check, and put it in circulation. Clearly, the negligence, if any, of that bank, cannot be imputed to the defendant. If the plaintiff had desired to take advantage of this qualification of the rule, its action, under the facts here shown, should have been against the bank which first gave currency to the paper. That was the course taken in the Nebraska case cited above.

3. Plaintiff claims, further, some rights from the fact, as it asserts, that the indorsement of Smith & Hauser was forged. The signing of a fictitious name may be a forgery. People v. Warner, 104 Mich. 337. We concede the general proposition contended for by appellant that an indorsement of negotiable paper is a guaranty of the genuineness of all prior indorsements, though we must add that this rule has no applicability under the facts of this case. If, by reason of this forged indorsement, plaintiff has been led to pay this check to one not the owner of it, no doubt it could recover from any prior indorser upon whose guaranty it had a right to rely. Levy v. First Nat. Bank, 27 Neb. 557. But how has plaintiff been injured by this so-called "forgery" of an indorsement? The party to whom it paid the money was entitled to it, if the payment was to be made at all. If the indorsement had been genuine, it could not have recovered from Smith & Hauser on the ground that they were indorsers: for, as we have seen as between all good-faith parties to the check, its payment by the drawee is final. If Smith, who actually made this indorsement, did so in bad faith, and with knowledge of the forgery, he is still liable to the bank, not on his indorsement, but because of his fraud. The drawee ordinarily has no recourse upon indorsers. If an indorsement is forged, yet, if the money is paid to the party entitled to it, the drawee has no reason to complain, and no right of action over. That is the case here. Plaintiff is liable to no one else for the amount of the check. It is in no worse situation than it would have been had the signature of Smith & Hauser been genuine.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF MANNING, Appt.,

v.

GERMAN BANK of Carroll County et al.

(.....Iowa.....)

The negligence of a notary public in failing to learn the residence of an indorser of an inland draft and give him proper notice of its dishonor is not chargeable to a bank of which he is assistant cashier, and which placed the draft, which it held only for collection, in his hands for protest, although no protest of the draft was required by law, but the law recognized the giving of notices in case of protest as part of the official duty of the notary.

(February 6, 1899.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Carroll County in favor of defendant in an action brought to hold the defendant bank responsible for the amount of a draft on which the indorsers had been released by its alleged negligence.
Affirmed.

Statement by Ladd, J.:

The plaintiff purchased of Farneman a draft indorsed by him, drawn by the Bank of Kirkman, November 7, 1892, on the First National Bank of Carroll, on November 8, and sent it for collection to the Valley National Bank of Des Moines, which, on the following day, forwarded it to the defendant for collection. It was received and presented to the drawee for payment before 10 o'clock on the 10th day of November, and payment refused. The draft was at once placed in the hands of W. A. Artz, a notary public, and also assistant cashier of the defendant bank, with instructions to protest for nonpayment. He made no inquiry of the residence of Farneman, who was engaged in the chicken business at Carroll, but a short distance from the bank, but inclosed notice to him with those to other indorsers to the Valley National Bank of Des Moines. The plaintiff has been deemed recovery in an action against Farneman. See First Nat. Bank v. Farneman, 93 Iowa, 163. This action is for the amount of the draft and the expenses and costs incurred in that case. Trial to court, and judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals.

Mr. F. M. Powers, for appellant:

If, on account of the negligent acts of the German Bank, the indorser, Frank Farneman, was released, and in consequence the owner of the paper damaged, it must be conceded that the German Bank is responsible to the extent of that damage.

There was such negligence upon the part of the officers of the German Bank, who in this instance was acting as collection agent, as to make it liable.

Dan. Neg. Inst. §§ 1115-1121.

The bank is liable for the negligence of its notary public who is also an officer of the bank.

Mr. M. W. Beach, for appellees:

The bank is not liable for the negligence or misconduct of the notary public employed by it to protest negotiable paper.

He is under a higher control than that of a private principal. He owes duties to the public which must be the supreme law of his conduct. Consequently, when he acts in his official capacity, the bank no longer has control over him, and cannot direct how his duties shall be done.

The bank which places paper in the hands of a notary public with directions to present

NOTE.—The doctrine that a bank is not liable for mistakes of a reputable notary employed by it is given a very striking, if not extreme, application in the above case. The bank escapes liability for the negligence of its own officer in a matter which is plainly within the scope of his employment and in respect to which the bank owes a duty merely because its officer was 44 L. R. A.

a notary public and assumed to act as such, although the employment of any notary was not necessary because the draft protested was an inland draft which it was not necessary to protest. The reasons for holding a bank exempt from liability for the official act of a notary seem to be limited to cases in which the employment of a notary was necessary.

it in such a manner as to protect the right of the beneficial owner and indorser will not be liable for the failure of the notary to discharge his duty.

Wood River Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 36 Neb. 744.

The notary is regarded as acting in the character of an independent officer, whose duties are prescribed by law, and the collecting bank cannot be held liable for default.

Ladd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

That the draft was sent to the defendant bank for collection, and was presented to the drawee for payment, in apt time, admits of no doubt. Hamlin v. Simpson, 105 Iowa, 125. The exercise of prudence in the selection of a notary public is not questioned. The very gist of the action is that the defendant is chargeable with the negligence of that officer in failing to learn of Farneman's residence and notify him of the dishonor of the draft. But a notary is a public officer, appointed by the chief magistrate of the state, is under bond for the faithful performance of his duties as such, and keeps a public record of his acts, certified copies of which may be received in evidence. Code, §§ 373 et seq. He is not a mere agent of the bank, but a public officer sworn to properly discharge his duties to the public. As such officer, the bank may not control his acts, nor dictate in what manner he shall perform his duties. If guilty of malfeasance in the performance of an official act, he, and not the bank, is responsible. That this notary was also an employee of the bank can make no difference. When acting as such officer, he was not discharging his duties as servant. The positions were distinct, and his acts in the capacity of an officer of the state had no connection with the services he owed the bank. Again, the defendant was a mere agent for the collection of the draft, and, owing to its dishonor, deposited it with a notary for protest. "A subagent is accountable ordinarily only to his superior agent when employed without the assent or direction of the principal. But, if he be employed with the express or implied assent of the principal, the superior agent will not be responsible for his acts. There is, in such a case, a privity between the subagent and the principal, who must therefore seek a remedy directly against the subagent for his negligence or misconduct." Guelich v. National State Bank, 56 Iowa, 435, 41 Am. Rep. 110. In making such collections it is usual to employ a notary, and, in forwarding the draft, there was an implied direction to do so, if necessary. See Mount v. First Nat. Bank, 37 Iowa, 457. If the defendant exercised prudence in making the selection, its responsibility ended. This is all it could have done had the draft been its own, and surely it will not be held to a higher degree of care when acting for others. Baldwin v. Bank 44 L. R. A.

Butler*, 41 Ohio St. 519, 52 Am. Rep. 94; Mechem, Agency, § 514. While there is a conflict in opinion, the rule announced is sustained by the weight of authority and the better reason. See collection of cases in 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 808, and note to Isham v. Post, 38 Am. St. Rep. 775, 141 N. Y. 100, 23 L. R. A. 90; also Allen v. Merchants' Bank, 22 Wend. 215, 34 Am. Dec. 289.

The distinction between a foreign and an inland bill of exchange should not be overlooked. To charge the makers and indorsers, the former must be protected. Not so with the latter. All that is required is a demand, and, on refusal to pay, notice of dishonor, in order to fix liability of the indorsers of an inland bill; and these may be made and given by the holder or anyone acting in his behalf. By the law merchant, giving notice of dishonor is no part of notary's official duty, and when he does so he is merely acting as agent of the holder. Swayze v. Britton, 17 Kan. 625; Allen v. Merchants' Bank, 22 Wend. 215, 34 Am. Dec. 289; Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 960. But it is customary for him in protesting a bill, to give the proper notice of dishonor. Proffatt, Notaries, §§ 142, 143. And in many of the states the law merchant is so modified that he is required to give notice. Formerly his certificate might not be received as proof of the protest of an inland bill. Case v. Heffner, 10 Ohio, 180. By § 378 of the Code, "every notary public is required to keep a true record of all notices given or sent by him, with the time and manner in which the same were given or sent, and the names of all the parties to whom the same were given or sent, with a copy of the instrument in relation to which the notice is served, and of the notice itself." Section 379 requires his record and official papers to be filed with the clerk of the court upon his death, resignation, or removal, and provides for certified copies. Very evidently this is for the purpose of perpetuating proof of the notice as well as of the demand and protest. Section 3054 permits a notary to "inform the indorser or any party to be charged, if in the same town or township, by notice deposited in the nearest postoffice to the parties to be charged, on the day of demand, and no other notice shall be necessary to charge such party." The advantage in having an inland bill protested by a notary, and notice given by him, is that the evidence is thus perpetuated; and notice to indorsers living in the same town or township may be given by mail, instead of personally. These statutes clearly recognize giving notice as a part of the notary's official duty. Indeed, the term "protest" is ordinarily used as including the entire proceeding necessary to charge indorsers. Notaries are nearly always resorted to for this work, and the owner of the draft may be assumed to have intended this course to be pursued. As said in Tiernan v. Commercial Bank: "No agent could have been selected . . . with more propriety for the performance of this duty than one whose profession and office were calculated peculiarly to fit him for its discharge. They are almost universally resorted to for the purpose. We cannot perceive, therefore, that the bank was wanting either in the degree of skill or diligence, which is required under such circumstances to exempt an agent from liability." Baldwin v. Bank of Louisiana, 1 La.

Ann. 13, 45 Am. Dec. 72; Hyde v. Planters' Bank, 17 La. 560, 36 Am. Dec. 621; Smedes v. Bank of Utica, 20 Johns. 384; Bellemire v. Bank of United States, 4 Whart. 105, 33 Am. Dec. 46, 1 Miles (Pa.) 173; Ottisens' Bank v. Howell, 8 Md. 530, 63 Am. Dec. 714; Fisher v. State Bank, 7 Blackf. 610; Turner v. Rogers, 8 Ind. 139.

Bank of Lindsborg v. Ober, 31 Kan. 599, is based on the finding that the statutes of Kansas do not authorize the notary to give notice.

Our conclusion rests on statutes allowing a notary, as such, to perform this duty. Surely the bank acted prudently in intrusting to a public officer the doing of that which was incumbent on him as an officer of the law to do.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

L. R. FIGG, Appt.,

v.

A. H. THOMPSON, Judge of Louisville City Court, et al.

(.....Ky.....)

An ordinance requiring a license for the business of contracting for public work is unconstitutional because it tends to create a monopoly and increase the burden of property owners, where the statutes require the cost of improvements to be assessed upon abutting owners by the front foot.

(January 31, 1899.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of defendants in an action brought to prevent enforcement of an ordinance imposing a license tax upon the business of contracting for public work. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lane & Burnett for appellant.

Messrs. O. A. Wilson and H. L. Stone for appellees.

Guffy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is alleged in the petition in this action that by § 35 of an alleged ordinance of the city of Louisville, approved April 1, 1896, entitled "An Ordinance Providing for Certain Licenses for the Sinking Fund of the City of Louisville," it is, among other things, ordained that every person, firm, or corporation engaged in the business of contracting for public, municipal, railroad, or bridge work shall pay a license fee of $100 per annum; and by § 41 of the alleged ordinance it is ordained that "all licenses shall be paid for in advance in lawful money of the United States, and it shall be unlawful for any firm, person, or corporation to carry on the business, occupation, or profession, or to use or to exhibit any articles herein mentioned, in the city of Louisville, without first having paid the license herein required for the same"; and by § 44 of said ordinance it is ordained that any person, firm, or corporation violating any of the provisions of this ordinance, where a different fine has not been provided for, shall be fined not less than $5 nor more than $100 for each offense; . . . " and by § 1 of said ordinance it is ordained that said license fee shall be paid to the sinking fund commissioners of the city of Louisville for the purpose of the sinking fund of the city of Louisville. And the plaintiff says that by the alleged ordinance no penalty or fine is prescribed other than is provided in § 44, as herein set out; that plaintiff is engaged in the business of improving by original construction the carriage way of public streets and alleys, and of improving by original construction and reconstruction the public sidewalks of and in the city of Louisville. It is further alleged that when the board of public works orders any work to be done which is authorized by order of said board, or according to law is to be performed by independent contract, said board prepares and places in the office of said department a complete drawing and specification of said work. Thereupon said board causes a notice to be published in a newspaper published in said city once a week for two weeks, informing the public of the general nature of the work, calling for sealed proposals for said work by a day not earlier than ten days after the first of said publication. " . . . Said board shall, if a satisfactory bid be received, let said contract to the lowest bidder." It is further alleged that "improvements," as applied to public ways, shall mean all work and material used upon them in the construction and reconstruction thereof, and that the cost of the improvement of the carriage ways in the construction and reconstruction thereof shall be apportioned against and paid for by the owners of the lots in the tax limits thereof as defined in said acts, and the improving of sidewalks and improving the curbing thereof by original construction and reconstruction shall be apportioned against, and paid for by, the owners of the ground fronting the improvements according to the number of front feet of their lots fronting the improvements respectively. It is further alleged that the ordinance aforesaid is void, because it is in violation of the provisions of an act approved July 1, 1893, in this: that said ordinance limits the right to contract in the city of Louisville for the improvement or original construction of the carriage ways of the streets, and lots in the city of Louisville, and for improvement by original construction and reconstruction of the public sidewalks in the city of Louisville to such persons only as may pay to the city of Louisville a bonus for such privilege in the shape of $100 per annum as a license so to do. It is further alleged that the ordinance is unconstitutional and void, because it limits the right to submit to the city of Louisville proposals to make such improvements, and limits such proposals to such persons only as pay said city of Louisville $100 per annum for the privilege of so doing. It is further averred that there is in law no such organization as the sinking fund commissioners of the city of Louisville, and that, therefore, the ordinance requiring such tax to be paid to such corporation is null and void. The petition further sets out the fact that the plaintiff was prosecuted in the city court of Louisville, charged with the offense of having violated the ordinance complained of, and fined therefor; and under the provisions of § 163 of the act approved July 1, 1893, for the government of cities of the first class, this plaintiff brought this suit in the Jefferson circuit court, law and equity division, and prayed for a writ of prohibition restraining the police judge, R. H. Thompson, et al., from further prosecuting said case against plaintiff. A demurrer was sustained to plaintiff's petition, and judgment rendered dismissing the same and denying the writ of prohibition, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

NOTE.—For provision requiring contractors to employ none but union labor as increasing burden of taxpayers, see Adams v. Brennan (Ill.) 42 L. R. A. 718.

It is earnestly insisted for appellant that there is in law no such corporation or organization as the commissioners of the sinking fund of the city of Louisville. That the expression of the act of July, 1893, which says that "the board of sinking fund commissioners is hereby continued under the existing law," is void, and of no effect, and is in violation of §§ 51-59 and 167 of the Constitution. But, inasmuch as said sinking fund commissioners are not a party to this suit, nor does it appear that they are seeking to enforce the collection of the tax, nor the fine imposed by the police court, we deem it unnecessary to enter into a discussion as to the fact whether there are any legal commissioners of the sinking fund of the city of 44 L. R. A.

Louisville. From the allegations made in the petition it seems clear to us that the imposition of the license tends to increase the expenses incident to the improvements of sidewalks, streets, etc., and would be imposing additional burdens upon property owners fronting on such improvements. It is also manifest that the imposition of such a license is inconsistent with the general law and ordinance providing that such improvements or work should be let to the lowest responsible or reliable bidder, and for that reason must be held to be illegal and invalid. It is manifestly just and right that all improvements made, the cost of which is to be taxed against the property owners, should be made at the least possible cost; and it is equally manifest that such ordinance as the one in question tends to lessen the number of persons who would be inclined to file bids or propositions for doing work, and tends to create a monopoly in the business of public works. It is also reasonable that the amount paid for license would increase the cost of the improvements, and thus the property holder would be made to pay, not only for what it cost to make the improvements, but also to pay his part of the license fee required of the contractor, which would be manifestly unjust and illegal. It must be conceded that to pay for the improvements is sufficiently onerous upon the property holder, without also having added thereto a special license to the city as a privilege to the contractor to do the work and charge therefor. It is evidently contrary to natural justice that a city should order improvements to be made at the cost of the abutting property owners, and then add thereto a license fee to the contractor for the benefit of the city at large, which license fee the contractor, according to the well-known rules of business, will estimate in the sum for which he undertakes to do the work. That such license fees as that under consideration tend to lessen the number of bidders, and consequently increase the cost of such improvements is not open to serious question, and it seems to us unreasonable that the city should order improvements to be made, and then impose a license tax upon the party who undertakes to do the work. Hence it follows that any ordinance or act of the legislature authorizing or imposing any such license fee is unconstitutional and invalid. The prohibition asked for should have been granted.

For the reasons stated, the judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to award the writ of prohibition, and for proceedings consistent herewith.

admitted a will to probate to admit a codicil which is entirely inconsistent with the original will, where the statutes provide for vacating, reversing, or annulling a decree probating a will only by appeal to the circuit court or application to equity to impeach the judgment.

(November 16, 1898.)

APPEAL by contestants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Clark County affirming a judgment of the County Court admitting to probate an alleged codicil to the will of B. W. Couchman, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. T. Shelby, George B. Nelson, and Gibson Taylor, with Mr. B. F. Buckner, for appellants:

The mere fact of making a subsequent testamentary paper does not work a total revocation of a prior one, unless the later expressly or in effect revokes the former, or the two be incapable of standing together.

If a subsequent testamentary paper be partially inconsistent with one of an earlier date, then such latter instrument will revoke the former as to those parts only where they are inconsistent.

1 Wms. Exrs. 6th Am. ed. p. 199.

Probate is absolute, conclusive, and exclusive after being made by the proper county court in obedience to the formalities of the statute, and no paper of a testamentary character, whether it be in form an original will, or a codicil, or addition, formal or informal to the previous will, can ever be offered in evidence, unless it not only has been probated, but it also constitutes a part of the last will and testament of the decedent.

The whole last will and testament of the testator must be offered for probate. No matter how many separate instruments of a testamentary nature have been executed by the testator, all such as can stand together, and be each partially operative constitute the true last will and testament of the decedent.

No statute contains any provision for the separate probate of a codicil, and unless it is received and probated as a part of a pre-existing will and merely supplementary thereto, there is no authority given and no tribunal invested with jurisdiction under the statute to grant such paper a separate probate.

As the will indubitably disposes of the whole of the testator's estate, and as the codicil was not offered and probated as a part of the will, the effect of the probate of the will alone was undoubtedly to reject the codicil.

When once the probate court of Kentucky has pronounced in favor of any instrument as the last will and testament of a decedent, that judicial fiat is conclusive and final until the same is set aside by reversal or annulment, or suspended by supersedeas.

In matters of probate, county courts have exclusive jurisdiction.

The county court may without summoning any party proceed to probate and admit a will to record or reject the same.

Gen. Stat. chap. 413, § 36.

A codicil is a part of a will.

County courts have no power to revise at a subsequent term the final orders made by them at a previous term.

A codicil known to exist at the time of the probate of the will might be thereafter "proved and recorded as an appendage to the same will."

Reed's Will, 2 B. Mon. 80.

The county court is to proceed in the hearing of questions of probate upon original evidence.

Thompson v. Beadles, 14 Bush, 49.

The question as to the sufficiency of the order admitting this codicil to probate was never questioned until it had become too late to take the course which appellants now insist was the only proper one to have pursued.

McCarty v. McCarty, 8 Bush, 508.

A codicil is a part of a will, just as a paragraph or a clause is a part.

On the theory of the appellants' counsel, the only way to get a codicil to record would be to appeal from the order of probate, and, offering the codicil, have the judgment appealed from reversed, and the will and codicil ordered to be probated by the circuit court as the last will. After this has been done, suppose another codicil found even within the period fixed for taking an appeal. Would not the right to appeal have been exhausted? And yet can it be said that a part of the will can be ignored because it may not be probated except through the circuit court, which has exhausted its powers in the premises?

Davis v. Taul, 6 Dana, 53; Armstrong v. Armstrong, 14 B. Mon. 333.

The circuit court is not a court of probate.

Moore v. Smith, 88 Ky. 155.

A jury may find one part of a paper produced to be the testator's will, and that another part was procured through undue influence, and therefore not a part of his will.

Randolph v. Lampkin, 90 Ky. 554, 10 L. R. A. 87.

It certainly cannot be maintained that in all cases where the probate court has admitted to probate a paper purporting to be a last will and testament, it has thereby fully exercised its entire jurisdiction over the subject of testamentary disposition of the decedent's estate.

White, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

B. W. Couchman died August 12, 1887, in Clark county, Kentucky. August 22, 1887, at the regular term of the Clark county court, his will, bearing date January 4, 1886, was admitted to probate. By this will the testator devises to his wife, appellee E. J. Couchman, $3,000 cash, and sufficient to purchase horse, harness, and carriage. This to be absolute. He also gave to his wife, during widowhood, his home farm, and the dividends on certain stock in turnpikes. He gave to his niece Amanda $3,000; to the Bible College of Lexington, $500; also, to the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, $500; also, provided for the purchase of a scholarship in the Midway Orphan School; also, devised to his brothers and sisters $100. He then directs that all the remainder of his estate shall be divided equally, per capita, among his nephews and nieces, and, to the end that an equal division may be had, he directs his executors to sell and convey his real estate, except the home place, devised to his wife. He then provides that, upon the marriage or death of his wife, the farm and turnpike stock devised to her shall be sold and the proceeds divided as general estate devised to his nephews and nieces. He appoints his wife, F. J. Couchman, his brother, John A. Couchman, and his friend R. T. G. Bush, as executors. This bears date January 4, 1886. Within a year after the probate of this will the widow, E. J. Couchman, renounced the will, and elected to take under the law. On August 26, 1889, the widow, Elizabeth J. Couchman, propounded for probate a paper purporting to be, in substance, a codicil to the foregoing will; it being alleged that the original was lost or destroyed. This paper was probated as a codicil by the Clark county court, September 23, 1889, and reads: "I, B. W. Couchman, do make and publish this codicil to my last will and testament, as follows, to wit: (1) I give to my wife, Elizabeth J. Couchman, the home place, to have and to hold in fee simple, and the Curry place, to have and to hold during her natural life, and after her death to go to such of my blood kin as she may designate during her life, by will or otherwise. (2) I desire my said wife, in addition to the three thousand dollars given to her in my will, to have a sum equivalent to the rent of the land derived by her from her father's estate, and which I have used, or received rent from, since it became her property." It is claimed that this codicil was written in July, 1887, shortly before B. W. Couchman died. At the time this codicil was probated there had never been an appeal or other proceeding seeking to reverse, supersede, or annul the order probating the will, made August 22, 1887. Nor does it appear by this record that the judgment of probate of the will, of August 22, 1887, has ever been appealed from, superseded, or annulled. From the order and judgment probating the codicil dated September 23, 1889, an appeal was prosecuted to the court of common pleas of Clark county in July, 1892. The trial in the circuit court of Clark county resulted in a judgment probating the codicil, and from that judgment, after motions for new trial had been overruled, this appeal is prosecuted.

This record is very voluminous, and contains numerous exceptions to the admission and exclusion of testimony, and exceptions to the giving and refusing instructions to the jury, and other errors of the trial court. Among the questions raised by counsel, and urged, is the contention by appellants that the judgment of the county court admitting to probate the original will of B. W. Couchman was a bar to the subsequent proceeding to probate the codicil in the county court, and that, subject to review in a trial de novo of an appeal from it to the circuit court, it was absolutely conclusive. On behalf of appellees it is contended that the codicil being merely an appendage to the will, and its probate depending on the probate of the will itself, the order and judgment of probate of the will were not final and conclusive as to the codicil; in other words, that the jurisdiction of the county court as to probate was not exhausted till the whole will was probated, and that this includes all codicils. The county court and the circuit court necessarily took the appellees' view of the law on this question.

This question has never been passed on by this court, and is one of first impression. Counsel for appellees have cited, as tending to support their position, the case of Reed's Will, 2 B. Mon. 79, where Chief Justice Robertson uses this language: "A codicil, dated in 1840, and providing for the transportation of the emancipated persons to Liberia, or the sale of them in the event of their refusal to be thus transported, has not been proved or offered for probate; and therefore the only purpose of noticing it in this opinion is to suggest that it may be hereafter proved and recorded as an appendage to the will, if in fact it was legally published, and the testator was competent at the time of its publication." We are also referred to the case of Schultz v. Schultz, decided by the court of appeals of Virginia, reported in 10 Gratt. 358, 60 Am. Dec. 335, as sustaining this position of appellees. In that case the court said at page 373: "I think it certainly cannot be maintained that, in all cases where the probate court has admitted to probate a paper purporting to be a last will and testament, it has thereby fully exercised its entire jurisdiction over the subject of the testamentary disposition of the decedent's estate. To affirm this proposition would be, in certain cases, so far as the probate court is concerned, to compel a man to die intestate as to part of his estate, though it might have been his deliberate and expressed intention to dispose of the whole. A man's last will must not of necessity be confined to one testamentary paper. It may consist of several different testamentary papers, of different dates, and executed and attested at different times. It cannot be indispensable, either, that they should be propounded in the court of probate at the same time. If a will has been produced and admitted to probate in the proper court, and subsequently another testamentary paper be found, purporting to be a codicil to the former, it cannot be doubted that the probate court could also receive and admit it to probate at a subsequent period,"—citing Reed's Will, 2 B. Mon. 80. It may be remarked here that the decision of the Virginia court in the above case was by a divided court,—two dissents; also, that there was no question of codicil before it, but the contest was between two complete wills. That statute governing the probate of wills at the time of the Schultz Case was the same as our statute at the time of the case of Reed's Will, our statute being copied from that of Virginia. The statute in force at the time of Reed's Will, after providing that the county courts shall have power to hear and determine all causes, suits, and controversies testamentary arising within their respective jurisdictions, provides (§ 11): "When any will shall be exhibited to be proved, the court having jurisdiction as aforesaid, may proceed immediately to receive the proof thereof, and grant a certificate of such probate; if, however, any person interested shall, within seven years afterwards, appear, and by his bill in chancery contest the validity of the will, an issue shall be made up whether the writing produced be the will of the testator or not, which shall be tried by a jury, whose verdict shall be final between the parties, saving to the court a power of granting a new trial for good cause, as in other trials; but no such party appearing within the time, the probate shall be forever binding; saving also to infants and femes covert and persons absent from the state, or non compos mentis, the like period after the removal of their respective disabilities." 1 Litt. Laws, p. 613. Under the statute, this court, in the case of Wells's Will, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 273, held that the decision of a county court on the validity of a will, whether for or against the will, is a bar to any subsequent proceedings thereon before that court; that the remedy is by writ of error, or by bill in chancery, within the statutory period. It was also held in McMillin v. McMillin, 7 T. B. Mon. 564, that, after the lapse of seven years from the probate, the will could not be successfully assailed in equity, unless complainants are under some disability. In the case of Taylor v. Tibbatts, 13 B. Mon. 177, this court, after quoting the statute, says: "The law makes no provision for a retrial in the same court, but, instead of permitting that to be done, substitutes a proceeding in a court of equity by which the validity of the will may be contested. The decision of the court of probate may also be revised in a superior tribunal, but the same court has no power at a subsequent term to set aside or vacate an order establishing a will, and directing it to be recorded. A decision of the county court upon the validity of a will is a bar to a renewal of the controversy in that court upon the same subject-matter." In the above statute there is no provision that the order or judgment of probate shall be binding and conclusive, except after the lapse of seven years, as quoted. By Gen. Stat. chap. 113, § 26, it is provided: "Wills shall be proved before, and admitted to record by, the county court of the county of the testator's residence." By § 27: "An appeal may be taken from the county court to the circuit court of the same county, and thence to the court of appeals, from every judgment admitting a will to record or rejecting it. . . . The appeal to the circuit court shall be within five years after rendering the judgment of probate or rejection in the county court, and prosecuted to the court of appeals within one year after the final decision in the circuit court." Section 28 provides: "No will shall be received in evidence until it has been allowed and admitted to record by a county court; and its probate before such court shall be conclusive, except as to the jurisdiction of the court, until the same is superseded, reversed, or annulled." Under this statute this court, in McCarty v. McCarty, 8 Bush, 504, said: "A will once admitted to probate by the county court must be contested in the manner pointed out by the statute. This special proceeding is adopted and regulated by law as applicable to wills alone, and the remedies afforded in such cases must be found in the statute, and nowhere else. There is no power given to the county court, after a will has been admitted to record or rejected, to grant to the parties a new trial, or at a subsequent term to annul all the orders made in regard to the case at a previous term. The rights of parties to property acquired under a will would be almost worthless, if a county court, with its limited jurisdiction in such cases, could try and retry the question of will or no will whenever, in the opinion of that court, an erroneous judgment had been rendered." In all these cases supra the precise question here presented was not before the court, nor passed on. The question in each of those cases was as to complete wills. In the case of Reed's Will the question of the probate of the codicil was not before the court for decision, and, if the statute in force at that time was the same as that applicable to the case at bar,—which it is not,—that part of the opinion in the Reed's Will Case would not be binding, as it was obiter purely.

Counsel for appellants has referred us to the case of Hardy v. Hardy (decided by the supreme court of Alabama) 26 Ala. 524, which reads: "The act of 1806 . . . provides that, when any will has been admitted to probate, it may be contested by any person interested, by bill in chancery, within five years thereafter, and that unless so contested it shall be conclusive and binding upon all parties,—extending, however, to infants, married women, lunatics, and persons absent from the state, the right of contestation to five years after the removal of their respective disabilities. Under this statute the probate is conclusive, unless the will is contested in the mode and within the time fixed. In the present case the application is to establish a paper which, if regarded as a will, is inconsistent with the provisions of the one which had previously been admitted to probate; and, as it is of later execution, it must operate as a revocation of the former, pro tanto. To this extent, therefore, it impeaches the validity of the will which had been established; and, if admitted to probate, the consequence would be that there would be two wills established, inconsistent in their provisions. It was to avoid such consequences that the statute to which we have referred was enacted. The paper offered for probate impeaches in part the will already admitted to probate, and this, as we have seen, can only be done in the mode and within the time prescribed by the act." We are also referred to the case of Watson v. Turner, 89 Ala. 220, where the court, after citing with approval the Hardy Case, 26 Ala. 524, said: "To establish a later will is necessarily to disestablish a former one already proved. The same is obviously true of a codicil, any of the provisions of which are inconsistent with those of the will itself. To prove a codicil is, pro tanto, to disprove so much of the probated will as it may revoke or modify. The distinction is one of extent, not of kind or quality. The attempt to set aside a probated will, therefore, by proving a later one, or by attaching to it a codicil with inconsistent provisions, is a contest of the validity of the former will. In point of reason, we can see no valid distinction in the two cases. The evil results flowing from each are the same,—a like violation of the repose of titles, and a like uncertainty as to the conclusiveness of judicial determinations." We are also referred to the case of Adsit's Estate, Myrick's Cal. Prob. Ch. Rep. 266, cited in Mr. Freeman's notes to Waters v. Stickney, 90 Am. Dec. 137, as supporting this doctrine; but the case is not accessible. This court, in the case of Hughey v. Sidwell, 18 B. Mon. 260, said: "This was a petition in equity brought by appellants in the Mason circuit court to annul and vacate a paper which had been regularly admitted to probate by the county court of Mason as the last will and testament of Aaron Sidwell, deceased. . . . The paper sought to be annulled had been regularly admitted to probate as the last will of the decedent by a court of competent jurisdiction; and the order of probate establishing the will, until reversed, superseded, or vacated by another tribunal in the mode prescribed by law, was conclusive between the parties. It is a judgment of a court having jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and cannot be assailed collaterally, nor revised by any indirect proceeding. There is at present but one mode of reaching it, and that is by appeal to the circuit court of the county where the order was made." In the case of Abbott v. Traylor, 11 Bush, 335, this court said: "This was a proceeding in equity in the Franklin circuit court to establish the alleged last will and testament of Jasper Clayton, deceased, which it is charged had been destroyed or suppressed. . . . Prior to the institution of this action a paper purporting to be the last will and testament of said Clayton was presented to, and proved in, and ordered recorded by, the Franklin county court, a tribunal whose jurisdiction is not questioned. This judgment remains unreversed, and, unless affected by the judgment of the chancellor, is to-day in full force and effect. . . . Now it is clear that the chancellor has no jurisdiction to vacate or modify the judgment of a county court admitting a will to probate. This question was directly decided in the case of Hughey v. Sidwell, 18 B. Mon. 260. There is but one way in which such a judgment can be affected, and that is by appeal to the circuit court of the county in which the order is made. Proceedings in chancery to set aside or vacate wills that have been admitted to probate can only be maintained in two classes of cases, . . . and not in these cases until after action by the circuit court."

We are of opinion, from a careful review of these authorities, that a judgment probating a will in the county court is final and conclusive, except it be vacated, reversed, or annulled by some one of the modes provided by the statute. The first mode is by appeal to the circuit court within five years, and thence to this court within one year. This remedy is exclusive of all others while it may be invoked. The second is by a court of equity to impeach the judgment of the circuit court, as provided in sections 35, 37, chap. 113, Gen. Stat. This right of appeal to the circuit court is a matter of right to any person interested, and the trial had in the circuit court is a trial de novo, without regard to any evidence heard or offered in the county court. Neither of the statutory remedies provided for was attempted to be used in this case; but the appellees asked the county court, two years after the original will was probated, to admit to probate the codicil, and it is contended that the county court had jurisdiction to probate this codicil as an appendage to the original will. To this we do not assent. While codicils can only be probated as appendages to the original wills, and may, where not in any way inconsistent with the original will, be probated by the county court at a subsequent term from the probate of the original will, yet in this case the codicil propounded is entirely inconsistent with the original will. The original will disposes of the whole of the estate of decedent, B. W. Couchman, and distributes the same to various parties. The codicil practically gives all of his estate to his wife. The parties who take under the original will are entirely ignored in the codicil, and the effect of the judgment probating the codicil would be to annul and vacate the former judgment of probate,—at least, in so far as the two are inconsistent,—and would devast devisees under the first judgment of probate of title to property, and vest the title in devisees as provided by the codicil. This power to annul and vacate its former judgment of probate, the county court did not have. It follows that the judgment of the county court probating the codicil, being not within its jurisdiction, was erroneous, if not void; and likewise the judgment of the circuit court, appealed from, probating the codicil, was erroneous, and must be reversed. Having taken this view of the case, it becomes unnecessary to determine many questions presented in the record, and urged by counsel as cause for reversal.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to grant appellants a new trial, and to render judgment reversing the judgment of the county court admitting the codicil to probate, and for other proceedings consistent herewith.

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance requiring a license fee for engaging in the business of buying city claims. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lane & Burnett, for appellant:

To forbid the purchase of claims except by the person who purchases the privilege of so doing from the debtor is in effect to impair the value of its own obligations, and makes them sell for less than they otherwise would sell for.

Mr. H. L. Stone, for appellees:

The judgments appealed from refusing to prohibit and restrain the appellees, as the officers of the police court, in further proceeding to collect the fines imposed for non-payment of license, as provided in said license ordinance of April 1, 1896, and dismissing the appellants' petitions in each of these cases, were correct in all respects and free from error.

Clay City*, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1046.

Mr. Charles A. Wilson also for appellees.

Guffy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint of the plaintiff in this action is that the city of Louisville, by an ordinance passed 1st of April, 1896, ordained that every person, firm, or corporation who bought claims should annually pay a license of $150 per year into the sinking fund of the city of Louisville for the purpose of said sinking fund, and that such sum of $150 should be paid in advance in lawful money of the United States, and any person violating the provisions of said ordinance should be subject to a fine of not less than $5 nor more than $100; that prior to the 1st of April, 1896, the plaintiff had been engaged, and is now engaged, in buying claims against the city of Louisville, which the city of Louisville admits that it owes, and has not paid said claims because it has not the present means with which to pay same; that he has heretofore bought no claims other than those against the city of Louisville, and that, so far as the ordinance heretofore referred to requires this plaintiff to pay the sinking fund an annual income of $150 in advance, or at all, for the privilege of buying such claims against the city of Louisville, it is void. It is also claimed that there is no such corporation or body in existence as the commissioners of the sinking fund of Louisville. It is further averred in the petition that the plaintiff had been fined in the police court of Louisville for violation of said ordinance. The appellant instituted this action under § 103 of an act approved July 1, 1893, for the government of cities of the first class, for the purpose of obtaining a writ of prohibition against the appellees prohibiting them from enforcing the collection of the fine assessed against him as aforesaid. A demurrer was sustained to the petition, and same dismissed, and the writ of prohibition denied, and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

It is insisted ably, and at great length, that there is no such corporation or institution in existence as the commissioners of the sinking fund of the city of Louisville: that the provision in the said charter of cities of the first class, which it is claimed continues or creates said sinking fund, is in violation of §§ 51-59 and 167 of the Constitution. But, inasmuch as the said sinking-fund commissioners are not parties to this action, and it does not appear that they are insisting upon the payment of said license, nor engaged in the prosecution in the police court, we deem it unnecessary to determine whether or not there is any such institution or corporation as the commissioners of the sinking fund of the city of Louisville. We are, however, of opinion that the ordinance or statute which requires the license to be paid as a condition precedent to a citizen buying a claim or claims is unconstitutional and void. It is doubtless true that, if a person was engaged in the general business of brokerage, or making it his business to buy general claims, it would be competent to impose a license fee; but, according to the averments in this petition, the appellant was only purchasing claims on the city of Louisville, which were admitted by said city to be just and due, and it would seem that it would be unreasonable to impose a license tax upon a citizen who merely wanted to buy a few claims, or some of a particular class, as an investment. It would also be injurious to the claimant, whose claim could not be paid when due, to require a tax to be paid to the same authority who owed the claim before the purchaser could be allowed to buy the same. The tendency of such a license would be to impose a hardship upon the claimant as well as upon the purchaser, and it seems that public policy forbids the imposition of any such tax or restriction in regard to the purchase of such claims. Such license would tend to lessen the value of the claim which the city had undertaken to pay at maturity, and consequently would enable the city to derive a profit or revenue from its own laches, and would tend to lessen the number of claim buyers, and, as a consequence, cheapen the claim and thereby wrongfully injure the creditor of the city.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment appealed from is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to issue the writ of prohibition prayed for, and for proceedings consistent herewith.

In this case the testatrix's maiden name was written at her mark by mistake, instead of her real name.

And where the subscribing witnesses to a will signed by mark are dead, but the genuineness of their signatures is proved, it is not necessary to prove the testator's request. Scott v. Hawks (Iowa) 77 N. W. 467.

In Iowa, publication, as such, of a will is not required by statute.

And a will signed by mark is sufficiently proved to go to the jury where the attesting witnesses are all dead, and the handwriting of two and the mark of the third are proved. Jackson, Van Dusen, v. Van Dusen, 5 Johns. 144, 4 Am. Dec. 330.

Where one witness is dead the will may be proved by the surviving witness, and proof of the handwriting of the deceased witness, and other corroborating circumstances. Nickerson v. Buck, 12 Cush. 382; Stephens v. Stephens, 129 Mo. 422; Re Dockstader, 6 Dem. 106; Re Simpson, 2 Redf. 29; Re Hyland, 58 N. Y. S. R. 798, 45 Alb. L. J. 209; Re Smith, 61 Hun. 101; Re Kane, 2 Connolly, 249; Re Wilson, 76 Hun. 1; Re Murphy, 15 Misc. 208.

Some cases under N. Y. Code of Civil Procedure sustain a will on the evidence of the surviving witness and proof of the handwriting of the deceased witness. On this question there is some conflict but this is held by the latest decisions.

So, where the attesting witness to a will signed by the testator by mark is dead, the attestation by such witness is then to be shown by proof of the handwriting of the witness, and the will is valid although two remaining witnesses did not see the testator make his mark. Nickerson v. Buck, 12 Cush. 382.

The court said it is not necessary that the attesting witnesses see the testator sign his name, as the signature of the testator may be made known to the witnesses in other modes, and in this case the request to attest the will is sufficient.

And where one attesting witness to a will signed by mark dies before probate and the instrument is proved by two other attesting witnesses, but no one testifies to having seen the testator make his mark, the will is valid under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 8870, providing that every will shall be in writing signed by the testator, or by some person by his direction in his ary under a life policy is induced to make an assignment of such beneficial interest in the policy, the assignment may be avoided.

The alleged contract or assignment is vague, indefinite, uncertain.

The contract itself must be clear, certain, definite, and mutual, and the proof to sustain it clear, unequivocal, and satisfactory.

presence, and shall be attested by two or more competent witnesses subscribing their names to the will in the presence of the testator, and § 6570, providing in all cases where the written signature of any person is required, the proper handwriting of such person or his mark shall be intended. Stephens v. Stephens, 129 Mo. 422.

And under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 59, § 13, providing that when any one or more of the subscribing witnesses to a will shall be examined, and the other witnesses are dead or reside out of the state or are insane, then such proof shall be taken of the handwriting of the testator and of the witnesses so dead, absent, or insane, and of such other circumstances, as would be sufficient to prove the will on the trial at law, a will signed by mark may be admitted to probate where one subscribing witness was dead and the other subscribing witness proves that the statute has been complied with, and this is corroborated by three other persons. Re Simpson, 2 Redf. 29.

And a will signed by the testator by his mark may be probated where one of the witnesses whose handwriting is proved is dead, and the other attesting witness proves the execution of the will, and there are other corroborating circumstances, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2620, providing that if the subscribing witness whose testimony is required is dead, the will may be established upon proof of the handwriting of the testator and of the subscribing witness, and also of such other circumstances as would be sufficient to prove the will upon the trial of an action. Re Hyland, 58 N. Y. S. R. 798, 45 Alb. L. J. 209. In this case the court said: "While it is desirable to have the testimony of both witnesses to prove the making of the mark by a testator, yet when one cannot be produced, and no other persons were present, the testimony of the other, if his character is unimpeached, when supported by the apparent good faith of the transaction and a full attestation clause, I hold to be sufficient."

This rule just stated was adopted in Re Wilson, 76 Hun. 1, where it was held, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2620, that where a will was signed by mark, and one of the attesting witnesses was dead, the will may be admitted to probate where the surviving witness testifies to the proper publication of the will and that he saw the testator sign his mark thereto.

The report of this case does not show that the handwriting of the deceased witness was or absolute sale, because it is not a substitution of beneficiaries.

The burden of proving the alleged assignment is thrown on the assignee; it is not enough that the defendant holds possession, nor that the transfer was apparently executed with every legal formality, nor that the delivery was made by one who might be supposed. The court refused to follow Re Reynolds, 4 Dem. 68; Walsh's Will, Tucker (N. Y.) 132, and in effect overrules them, and cites Re Phelps, 1 Connoly, 463, as overruled by the same court in Re Hyland, 58 N. Y. S. R. 798, 45 Alb. L. J. 209.

And a will signed by mark may be admitted to probate on proof by the surviving witness that he saw the testator make his mark and the other witness attest such signature, and further proof of the handwriting of the deceased attesting witness. Re Murphy, 15 Misc. 208. In this case the proof of the surviving witness was not explicit as to all the contents of the will being read to the testatrix; but it appears from the evidence that the deceased witness did read the will to the testatrix and that she knew its contents prior to its execution.

And where the testator signs by mark, and one of the subscribing witnesses whose signature is proved is dead, the making of the will and mark may be proved by a witness other than the subscribing witness, and by corroborating circumstances, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2620. Re Smith, 61 Hun, 101.

This case does not show that the evidence of the surviving subscribing witness was used. The court said: We do not decide that a subscribing witness may not prove the handwriting by a mark of the testator.

And where an attesting witness who had drawn up a will signed by mark was dead, and the other witness proved the handwriting of deceased witness and the due execution of the will, it was held to be sufficiently proved under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2620, although the witness testified that he had signed the will as a witness before the testatrix had made her mark. Re Kane, 2 Connoly, 249.

The court held that this witness evidently was mistaken, as a magnifying glass indicated that both of the signatures were made before that of the witness who testified.

And a will signed by mark may be admitted to probate where one of the attesting witnesses is dead and the other witness testifies that he saw testator make the mark, and proves the handwriting of the other under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2620. Re Dockstader, 6 Dem. 106.

But there are several New York cases which have denied probate in cases of this kind. These, however, have been disapproved in later cases, and are of doubtful authority.

In Re Porter, 1 Misc. 262, it was held that under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 2620, a will cannot be admitted to probate where it is signed by 44 L. R. A.

mark if the execution of the mark is not proved by one of the attesting witnesses, although the handwriting of the other attesting witness who is dead is proved.

So, it was held in Re Phelps, 1 Connoly, 463 (overruled in Re Hyland, 58 N. Y. S. R. 798), that the evidence of a surviving attesting witness to a will signed by mark is insufficient, where there is no corroboration of another person who saw the testator make his mark.

And in Walsh's Will, Tucker (N. Y.) 132, where a will was signed by mark and one of the attesting witnesses was dead and his handwriting was proved by the other witness, it was held that a will subscribed by mark instead of by handwriting cannot be proved at all if one of the witnesses cannot be produced. The court said: "The statute provides that where one or more, or all, of the subscribing witnesses are dead, out of the state, or insane, proof must be taken of the handwriting of the testator and of the absent witness or witnesses on propounding the will for probate."

This decision was under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. § 13. See Re Simpson, 2 Redf. 29.

But referring to this case in Re Simpson, 2 Redf. 29, the court said: "I am not willing to follow the learned surrogate in the case just noticed. I believe he has overlooked an important part of the section of the statute to which he refers."

In Re Reynolds, 4 Dem. 68, it was held that a will signed by mark cannot be probated on proof of one subscribing witness and proof of the handwriting of the other witness, there being no other evidence as to the signature by mark, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2620.

This was on the ground that there should be more than one witness to prove the mark to a will.

Under this section of the Code of Civil Procedure, a will executed by mark cannot be admitted to probate where it was witnessed by the draftsman since deceased, and by another witness who is afflicted with a defective memory and cannot tell what occurred at the time of the execution of the alleged will, and there is no other proof of other persons or of other circumstances to establish its execution. Worden v. Van Gleson, 6 Dem. 237. The court said in this case that if other witnesses than those subscribing could prove the execution by mark it could be probated.

This was affirmed in Re Van Gleson, 47 Hun, 5, on the ground that there was no witness to prove that the testatrix had signed the will or said that she had signed it.

In Re Phelps, 1 Connoly, 463, the court reviewed these cases, and substantially followed them; but subsequently, in Re Hyland, 58 N. Y. S. R. 798, 45 Alb. L. J. 209, the question was reviewed again by the same judge, who had changed his opinion. He said that in Re Walsh's Will, Tucker (N. Y.) 132, it was held that a will subscribed by mark could not be proved if both the subscribing witnesses could not be produced, and that in Re Reynolds, 4 Dem. 68, the same was held on account of absence of evidence other than the surviving witness as to the deceased making his mark, and so in Worden v. Van Gleason, 6 Dem. 237, where the sole surviving witness did not see the testator make his mark and there was no other witness, and that in Re Phelps, 1 Connoly, 463, affirmed in Re Van Gleason, 47 Hun, 5, he had held that the will could not be proved by the sole surviving witness in the absence of testimony of others who were present, but that he had now changed his view of the law, and as the question had never been decided by the court of appeals, he now held that under the Code a will made by mark may be proved by the surviving witness and evidence of the handwriting of the other attesting witness if dead, and by other circumstances.

In Edmonds v. Lewer, 11 Jur. N. S. 911, it was held that a will executed by mark should be refused probate where the draftsman took the whole property and both of the attesting witnesses were dead, and the draftsman had failed to produce the will but had carried it with him in the Crimean war for several years, and there was lack of other evidence of identification of the testatrix.

And a will signed by mark of testator cannot be admitted to probate where one of the attesting witnesses is dead, and the only proof is that of the other attesting witness, who does not state that he attested at the request of the testator, and it is not shown that the testator knew the contents of the paper. Morrill v. Douglass, L. R. 3 Prob. & Div. 1, 42 L. J. Prob. N. S. 10, 27 L. T. N. S. 591, 21 Week. Rep. 162.

other evidence, it seems that the will may be admitted to probate.

So, where a codicil was signed by mark by the draftsman and had two other attesting witnesses, and the draftsman did not remember whether he asked the testator if it was his last will when the witnesses came in, but did ask him if it was his signature, and the draftsman proved his own signature, and another witness said he did not see the draftsman sign as an attesting witness, but saw the other witness sit down and take the pen, and did not recollect hearing any portion of the will read, while the other attesting witness testified to seeing the testator have the pen, and that he heard him say he acknowledged the will but did not see the other attesting witness sign, it was held that the proof showed that the testator had declared the instrument to be his codicil to the witnesses, and requested them to subscribe as witnesses, which they did in his presence, and the due execution was not overcome by their want of memory of some of the incidents. Dack v. Dack, 19 Hun, 630.

On appeal, 84 N. Y. 663, the decision on the execution of the codicil was approved, but the case was reversed for a new trial as to undue influence.

And a will signed by mark was held to be valid where one attesting witness testified: "My husband made the mark for her, or she made the mark herself, of course. No one guided her hand, as I know of. I cannot remember, it is so long since, but I suppose I saw her take the pen in her hand and make the mark. . . . When she made the cross she had the pen in her hand." The husband testified: "I made the mark with her hand on the pen. . . . I always witness marks in the same way. . . . I take the pen and ask the person who wishes to make their mark, put the hand on the pen, and while the hand is on the pen, I, guiding it, make the cross." Kearney's Estate, 148 Pa. 218.

And where one witness to a will signed by mark did not recollect being asked to put the testator's name or his own name to the same, but would not have done so without the testator's request, and the other witness testified as to such request being made to the other witness, the will was held valid without discussing this question. Long v. Zook, 13 Pa. 400.

There was no error in the court below refusing to permit Caroline Wienecke to testify as to the making of the contract pledging the policy for the payment of her husband's indebtedness, or the facts connected therewith; the ruling is in conformity with the statute and with the decisions of this court.

It was a good will under Pa. act 1848, validating wills previously made.

So, in Greenough v. Greenough, 11 Pa. 489, 51 Am. Dec. 567, the positive evidence of one subscribing witness that he signed the testator's name by his express direction to a will made by mark, and the attestation by the other subscribing witness, whose memory failed as to express direction, were held sufficient to probate the will.

II. Of maker of other instruments.

a. Where the attesting witness is dead.

Some cases hold that where the attesting witness is dead the execution of a written instrument may be proved by evidence of his handwriting. But the identity of the obligor must be established.

Proof of the handwriting of a deceased witness is sufficient evidence of the execution of a note, where he attested the signature of the maker who signed by mark. Sanborn v. Cole, 63 Vt. 590, 14 L. R. A. 208.

So, where an administratrix acknowledged a note and promised to pay the same by indorsement, and signed by mark, and the attesting witness had died, the writing may be established by proof of the genuineness of the handwriting of the attesting witness to the mark of the administratrix, and also his signature. Re Romero's Succession, 43 La. Ann. 975.

And a contract signed by mark, attested by two witnesses, is admissible in evidence, where both attesting witnesses are dead, and their handwriting is proved, with proof also that they were men of such honesty and general uprightness of conduct that they could not have been induced to lend their aid to a forgery. Tagliacoco v. Molinari, 9 La. 512.

In this case other circumstances were also proved which indicated the execution of the instrument.

In Smith v. Gibbon, 6 La. Ann. 684, it was held that a deed forty years old should be admitted in evidence where it was signed by the grantor and wife by mark and attested by two witnesses one of whom was dead and the other probably dead, where the signatures of the two witnesses were proved to be genuine and they were both proved to have been men of good character. In this case a witness testified that the wife refused to sign, and that he had seen the instrument attested by the witnesses without her signature; but the court held that it may have been signed by the wife before delivery, or that after the lapse of forty years this witness may have been mistaken.

And where notes are signed by mark, a default judgment will be sustained on appeal on 44 L. R. A.

On petition for rehearing.

Making a mark is signing, even in the attestation of a last will and testament, which has been fenced around by the law with more than ordinary guards.

Zacharie v. Franklin, 12 Pet. 162, 9 L. ed. 1040; Collins v. Nicols, 1 Harr. & J. 245.

When a mark is proved to be the mark of the person who made it, the mark has the same legal effect as a written signature.

See also Eichelberger v. Sifford, 27 Md. 331; Note to Re Guilfoyle (Cal.) 22 L. R. A. 370; Devereux v. McMahon, 12 L. R. A. 205, 108 N. C. 134.

It would be at least peculiar to hold that a mark is a signature, from which the same presumptions flow as from a written signature, and yet to hold that if the person who evidence of acknowledgment of the debt as to some of the notes, and evidence, as to the other notes, of the handwriting of the attesting witness, and that he is dead. Chaffe v. Cupp, 5 La. Ann. 684.

It was insisted that evidence should have been given in regard to the honesty and uprightness of conduct of the deceased witness; but the court held that that was presumed until shown otherwise.

And a mortgage is admissible in evidence where one of the plaintiffs testifies that he wrote the mortgage and a note secured thereby and the defendant's name, at his request, and that a subscribing witness, who has since died, read the mortgage and note to the defendant and held the pen while he made a mark, and then signed his own name as a witness, and the plaintiff identifies such signature. Johnson v. Davis, 95 Ala. 293.

And where a grantor signs a deed with her mark, and the parties and witnesses are all dead, evidence of the handwriting of the subscribing witness, with other circumstances as to the execution of the deed, are sufficient without evidence of the grantor's signature. Lyons v. Holmes, 11 S. C. 429, 32 Am. Rep. 482.

In Mitchell v. Johnson, Moody & M. 176, where the plaintiff was the attesting witness to a bond signed by mark, and some evidence of the identity of defendant was given, it was said that unless evidence of the handwriting of the witness was admissible, it would be impossible for the obligee of a bond to recover where the subscribing witness was dead and the obligor a marksman.

So, in Page v. Mann, Moody & M. 79, it was held that proof of the handwriting of a subscribing witness to an instrument signed by mark is sufficient, he being dead, without any other proof of the identity of the parties except the identity of the name and description. But in White Locke v. Musgrove, 1 Crompt. & M. 511, it was held that in an action upon an instrument signed by mark the subscribing witness to which is dead or resides abroad, it is necessary, besides proving the handwriting of the subscribing witness, to give some evidence of the identity of the party sued, with the party who appears to have executed the instrument.

In this case, Page v. Mann, Moody & M. 79, was referred to, the counsel saying that Lord Tenterden admits that the evidence of the attesting witness is sufficient without any proof of the identity, but subsequently such evidence was given. Bayley, B., said: "That was the case of an agreement for a lease under which the defendants had had possession, so that probably it would contain some description at least of made, the mark says he cannot read, the presumption is destroyed.

The contents of a writing, signed by a party himself, or by another at his request, are presumed to be known to him, and so of a paper drawn up by one for another, and the matters referred to in such writing.

Lawson, Presumptive Ev. p. 18; Harris v. Story, 2 E. D. Smith, 367; Doran v. Mullen, 78 Ill. 346; 2 Bl. Com. p. 305.

Fowler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The New York Life Insurance Company, on the 11th April, 1874, issued its paid-up policy for the sum of $2,170, on the life of John Wienecke, in favor of his wife, Caroline. The assured died on the 6th of February, 1897, and immediately thereafter the

the place by which the defendants might be connected."

And in an action against an executor on a note alleged to have been executed by his testator, prior to Pa. act April 15, 1869, providing that no interest shall exclude a witness except in actions against executors, administrators, or guardians, the execution of the note cannot be proved by evidence of the handwriting of a deceased subscribing witness who was an interested party. Mackrell v. Wolf, 104 Pa. 421.

On a subsequent trial of the same case it was held that the notes are not sufficiently identified to be admissible in evidence by a witness who testifies that about twenty years before the trial he went with the payee to a person who had the same surname as the alleged maker, who on being shown by the payee certain papers (which the witness thought were the notes in suit), said they were his notes and were all right. Wolff v. Mackrell (Pa.) 10 Cent. Rep. 58.

b. Where the attesting witness is forgetful.

The case of WIENECKE v. ARBIN holds that the execution of an assignment of a life insurance policy purporting to have been made by a wife by her mark is not established by evidence twenty-five years after its date by one attesting witness who is unable to show the time, place, or circumstances of the signing by the wife, who could not read, or that the document was read over to her, where it is not shown by the evidence that she ever delivered the instrument, although the attesting witness testifies that he certainly saw her sign the paper or he would not have put his name there.

There are not many cases on this question. Some allow evidence of the execution of an instrument to go to the jury, where the attesting witness testifies that he witnessed the paper in due course of business, but fails to give any of the circumstances, and when the other evidence tends to show a probability that the obligor executed the instrument.

Evidence of the execution of a mortgage and note signed by mark is sufficient to go to the jury, where the attesting witness testified that he witnessed the execution of the same, but that his recollection of the transaction was general; that he could not say whether the defendant asked him to attest the mortgage and note or not, and could not say from his recollection whether or not the defendant knew that he signed his name as attesting witness, but that he made and witnessed the paper in the usual course of business. Robinson v. Brennan, 115 Mass. 582.

administrator of Henry Arbin filed with the insurance company a claim for $2,603.83, claiming to hold an assignment of said policy. The company refusing to pay the proceeds of the policy to the wife of the assured, in whose favor it was made, she brought suit, and the company filed its bill of interpleader in the circuit court No. 2 of Baltimore city, alleging that fact, and that the administrator of Arbin was also claiming the same fund, and asked that they might be required to interplead. A decree of interpleader was passed, by which Caroline Wienecke was made plaintiff and the administrator of Henry Arbin was made defendant.

They both answered, and without stating fully what the allegations of these answers are, we think it will be unnecessary, from the view we have taken of this case, to do more

A mortgage release signed by mark is held valid where a witness testified at first that he read the instrument over to the releasor but afterwards said that he did not, or that he did not remember that he did, but adhered to his statement that he did fully explain it to her. The court said that "this, however, is not of so much importance as the paper did contain precisely what she said she wanted to do." Kraus v. Stein, 173 Pa. 221.

And the execution of a mortgage signed by mark and attested by mark may be proved by the mortgagee, where it is admitted that the attesting witnesses are illiterate and can neither read nor write, nor prove the execution of the instrument, nor identify the instrument or their marks. Jones v. Hough, 77 Ala. 487.

It will be seen by comparison of the cases on this subject that much is presumed in favor of the regularity of the execution of an instrument when the attesting witnesses are dead or have forgotten the particulars of the transaction. Such a presumption is reasonable. When reputable persons have signed their names as witnesses to a document it is too much to expect that they will always remember all that took place on the occasion. But it is not too much to suppose that ordinary intelligence was exercised in respect to the details of the transaction, when the instrument appears on its face to be made in legal form. All the analogies support such a presumption. The presumptions of mental soundness, of innocence, of due performance of duty, and others similar to these are no more reasonable than the presumption in favor of the proper performance of their functions by those who long ago signed an instrument as witnesses but have now forgotten some of the incidents of the transaction.

The Maryland case of WIENECKE v. ARBIN is exceptional. It refuses to uphold the instrument, not so much because the attesting witness, who says that he must certainly have seen the maker sign the instrument or he would not have put his name there, has forgotten the circumstances and the place of the alleged signing, as because there was no proof that the instrument was read to the maker or that the insurance policy which it purported to assign was ever delivered, while there was express proof that the maker could not read the instrument. These circumstances may possibly be sufficient to overcome the natural presumption of the regularity and validity of an old instrument duly signed and attested, when the witnesses are dead or have forgotten the transaction. But the majority of the cases, as will be seen above, recognize that presumption.

than say that the claim of the defendant is based altogether upon an alleged assignment of the policy in question purporting to be signed by the husband, which is followed, written upon the same piece of paper, by an agreement to the effect that the policy should not "be given up until the above agreement be complied with." Much testimony was taken, a great deal of it relating to transactions which took place between the assured and Henry Arbin in the year 1874, but we need not enter into a consideration of the validity of the claim of the latter against the former, for it may be conceded for the sake of the argument that the claim as allowed by the court below was a valid one as against the husband of the plaintiff, Caroline Wienecke. From the decree allowing the claim and sustaining the alleged assignment, this appeal was taken, and the whole question is whether the assignment under the facts of the case is binding as against Caroline, who is the person named in the policy as the beneficiary? The paper on which the claim of the defendant is based is as follows:

It is understood that in case of my (John Wienecke) death that all indebtedness due H. Arbin now and hereafter shall be paid out of my life insurance policy No. 105,364 in the New York Life Insurance Company, after which being paid, the policy is to be delivered to my heirs.

(Signed) John Wienecke.
Witness: W. F. Kunkle.

It is understood and agreed that the above policy No. 105,364 shall not be given up until the above agreement be complied with.

her Caroline X Wienecke.
mark

Witness: W. F. Kunkle.

This assignment or understanding or agreement, or whatever it may be called, together with the policy, is alleged to have been in the hands of Henry Arbin or his administrator, since the original transaction is alleged to have taken place in 1874. It appears, however, that in the year 1890 the insurance company, upon the representation that the original policy had been lost or mislaid, issued the following certificate:

Certificate No. 32.

This certifies that a paid-up policy of insurance upon the life of John Wienecke, of Baltimore city, Md., in favor of Caroline Wienecke, his wife, No. 105,364, dated April 11, 1874, for $2,170, was issued by the N. Y. Life Insurance Company.

During all this time, from 1874 until the death of her husband in 1897, the dividends which were paid annually by the company were collected by Caroline. It does not appear that any claim was ever made by Arbin in his lifetime, nor by his administrator since the death of the former in 1877. The whole question presented by this appeal then is simply this: Shall the property of the 44 L. R. A.

wife, without any consideration to her, be taken to pay her husband's debt? If so there should be clear and convincing proof that she executed the assignment, or rather, by making her mark, gave her consent thereto, with full knowledge of its contents and of its legal effect. Have we any such proof before us? We have carefully considered all the evidence in the record, and are of the opinion that it fails to sustain the validity of the assignment.

Recurring now to the assignment, a copy of which we have transcribed in the former part of this opinion, it is seen that the first part of the paper, that which is signed by the husband alone, describes the policy as his, and directs his debt to Arbin to be paid out of it. But, of course, the policy was not his, for it was payable to his wife. The paper is dated April 23, 1874, and is followed by the few lines, claimed to have been executed by the wife, by which it is contended she assigned the policy without any consideration whatever. Now it will be noticed that only one witness is produced to prove the execution of this paper. We will examine his testimony presently. Caroline was offered as a witness on her own behalf to prove that she never saw the paper and did not sign it or make her mark to it. But her testimony was excluded by the learned judge below, and we think properly so. The contract or cause of action in issue here being the alleged assignment, and one of the original parties thereto being dead, her testimony was inadmissible under the express terms of the Code, art. 35, § 2. See also Biggs v. McCurley, 76 Md. 411. In his testimony in chief the witness, Kunkle, said that he had signed his name as witness to the signature of John Wienecke and to the mark of Caroline. But when asked if he saw them sign the paper, he replied: "Certainly, or I would not have put my name there." But in his cross-examination he was unable even to say that both signed at the same time or place, and the inference which may be drawn from his testimony is that they did not so sign.

This appears more fully, from his attempted explanation of the difference between his signature as witness to the husband's signature and his signature as witness to the wife's mark, and also from his testimony in regard to the words "Caroline Wienecke, her mark." None of the facts accompanying the alleged execution by the wife are given—not even the place where she made her mark, whether at her own home, at the home of Mr. Arbin, her husband's creditor, or at the place of business of the firm for which the witness was transacting business. However, we have no doubt that this witness was testifying to the best of his recollection. It must be remembered he was speaking of a transaction which took place nearly twenty-five years ago. The serious difficulty in this case arises, therefore, not so much as to defects in the testimony before us, as to the entire absence of proof which we think it was necessary to produce in order to sustain this assignment. In addition to the defects already pointed out, there is no proof whatever that the paper was read and explained to her. She was not allowed to testify as to what took place, whether the paper was or was not read to her, and, as we have seen, the alleged assignee failed to furnish this most important and necessary proof. Perhaps if there had been no other testimony in the case to establish the execution of the assignment except that of the subscribing witness, meager and unsatisfactory as it is, it might have been sufficient to make out a prima facie case. But where the alleged assignee, Caroline, proved that she could not read, this fact, together with the unsatisfactory character of the evidence of the subscribing witness, raised a presumption against the validity of the assignment, which ought to have been rebutted by evidence that the paper was read to her and that she fully understood its legal effect.

But, in addition to this, it will be observed that there is an entire absence of proof that Caroline personally or through any agent, or in any manner delivered the policy to Henry Arbin. In the case of Pence v. Connecticut L. Ins. Co. 8 Ins. L. J. 746, the supreme court of Indiana held that "in order to prove an assignment . . . the plaintiff must prove, not only that she [the wife] signed her name to the assignment, but must prove also that she either delivered or authorized the delivery of the policy to . . . [the assignee]." Certainly either the execution of the assignment or the delivery of the policy, even in a court of equity, should be held necessary. But here in the one case the proof is not sufficient, and in the other there is no proof at all. If, as may be inferred from the testimony of the witness Kunkle, the first part of the paper signed by the husband and that signed by the wife were, in fact, executed on different days, it is possible that the paper signed by the husband alone, together with the policy, were delivered to the assignee without the knowledge or assent of the wife, and that her signature or mark was subsequently obtained. But whether this be so or not we cannot say, the burden of proof to establish the assignment was upon the assignee or his administrator claiming under it, and it has not been discharged to our satisfaction. Being unable to give our assent to the decree appealed from, it will be reversed.

Rehearing denied October 7, 1898.

MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASSOCIATION.

1. Jurisdiction of an inquiry into and control over the internal management of a foreign corporation is not conferred by a statute which in broad and comprehensive terms provides for all actions, suits, or proceedings against foreign corporations.

2. Things apparently within the words of a statute are outside of its purview if there was no intent to include them.
3. The motive or effect of acts within the internal management of a foreign corporation cannot make them cognizable by a court which does not otherwise have jurisdiction over them.
4. An injunction cannot be granted against illegal assessments upon members by a foreign insurance association, although they are alleged to be unnecessary and made with the dishonest and fraudulent purpose of forcing members to lapse, as this would involve an inquiry into the internal management of the association.
5. An accounting between a foreign mutual insurance association and a member involves an inquiry into the internal affairs of the company, which cannot be made by a court outside of the state in which the corporation has its home.
6. The contract between a mutual insurance association and a member cannot be construed when the application, constitution, and by-laws, which form part of the contract, are not before the court.
7. A receiver of the assets of a foreign corporation within the jurisdiction of the court cannot be appointed merely because the corporation is insolvent, if the court has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the proceeding.
8. Assessments paid for a series of years to a mutual insurance association by a member cannot be recovered back simply because he failed to read or to understand the provisions of his contract.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City in favor of defendant in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from increasing the assessment upon plaintiff's benefit certificate, to obtain the appointment of a receiver, to recover back payments made, and for other relief. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John P. Poe & Sons, Alonso M. Hurlock, and E. H. Gans for appellants.

Messrs. William Pinkney Whyte, Bernard Carter, and John M. Carter, for appellee:

The court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the bills of complaint in this case.

The whole scope, object, and purpose of the bill of complaint is to have ascertained and maintained the rights which the plaintiffs, as members of the defendant, an insurance company, formed on the mutual co-operative assessment plan, claim to belong to them by virtue of such membership, and only such rights; and all the acts on the part of the defendant corporation, or its officers, complained of in the bill, affect the rights of the plaintiff solely in their capacity as members of said association.

Defendant is a corporation of the state of New York, and not a corporation of the state of Maryland.

The taking by this court of jurisdiction of the subject-matter of said bills of complaint, and the making the inquiries and investigation, and doing the things which it is asked to do by the said bills of complaint, necessarily involve an interference with the internal management of the defendant corporation.

This court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the said bills of complaint, and they must be dismissed for the want of such jurisdiction.

The cases proceed on two grounds: (1) The general impropriety of the courts of one state attempting to settle the internal affairs of a corporation created by, and domiciled within another state, (2) the inability of a court in one state to do full justice in such a case, for want of proper parties.

As this defendant is chartered by the state of New York, and only by it, the legal existence, the home, the domicile, the habit, the residence, the citizenship, of the corporation, can only be in the state of New York, although it may do business in other states whose laws permit it.

Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274; Shaw v. Quincy Min. Co. 145 U. S. 450, 36 L. ed. 772.

Chapter 400 of the Session Laws of the state of New York of 1890 provides: "No order, judgment, or decree, providing for an accounting or enjoining, restraining or interfering with the prosecution of the business of any life or casualty insurance company, association, or society of this state or appointing a temporary or permanent receiver thereof, shall be made or granted otherwise than upon the application of the attorney general, on his own motion, or after his approval of a request in writing of the superintendent of the insurance department, except in an action by a judgment creditor or in proceedings supplementary to execution."

A proceeding in the nature of a bill in equity was brought in the supreme court of the state of New York by Joseph R. Swan, against the present defendant. The court of appeals disposed of it on the ground of "the want of legal capacity in the plaintiff to sue, in that the action is not brought by the attorney general, nor by a judgment creditor."

Swan v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 155 N. Y. 9.

The construction thus placed by the highest court of the state of New York, being a construction of a statute of the said state, is binding and controlling upon the courts of Maryland.

Supreme Council, A. L. of H. v. Green, 71 Md. 266.

Said statute of the state of New York, having been thus adjudged to be a valid exercise of legislative power, and relating to all life insurance associations, and therefore to the defendant, the provisions of said statute are to be treated as an amendment to and a part of the charter of the defendant.

Defendant carries its charter wherever it goes, for that is the law of its existence, and every person who deals with it anywhere is bound to take notice of the provisions which have been made in its charter for the management and control of its affairs.

Relfe v. Rundle, 103 U. S. 225, 26 L. ed. 339; Bockover v. Life Asso. of America, 77 Va. 89.

Members of a mutual assessment insurance company are bound by the statutes of the state where it was organized.

Not being within the scope of the jurisdiction of the Maryland court, a decree in conformity with the prayers of the bill would not be entitled to "full faith and credit" in the state of New York.

Thompson v. Whitman, 18 Wall. 457, 21 L. ed. 897.

McSherry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions to be decided on this appeal arise on a demurrer interposed by the appellee to a bill in equity filed by the appellant in the circuit court of Baltimore city. The appellant is a resident of Maryland. The appellee is a corporation created under the laws of the state of New York, and having its principal office there, though transacting business in Maryland. It is a mutual insurance company, formed on and conducting the co-operative or assessment plan. The appellant is a member of the body corporate, and holds one of its certificates of membership, issued in 1884. By this certificate, it is provided that, "in consideration of the application for this certificate of membership," the application being expressly made a part of the contract, and in consideration of the payment of certain dues and designated mortuary assessments falling due in February, April, June, August, October, and December of each year, "or from such other periods as the board of directors may from time to time determine," the mutual reserve association "does hereby receive Levi Z. Condon . . . as a member of said association." It is then stipulated that the association will, upon the death of Condon, during the continuance of the certificate and upon certain conditions, pay to his legal representatives the sum of $10,000 "from the death fund of the association at the time of said death, or from any moneys that shall be realized to the said fund from the next assessment to be made." The certificate further declares: "If at such date as the board of directors of the association may, from time to time, fix or determine for making an assessment, the death fund is insufficient to meet existing claims by death, an assessment shall then be made upon every member whose certificate is in force at the date of the last death assessed for, and said assessment shall be made at such rates, according to the age of each member, as may be established by the said board of directors, and the net amount received from such assessment (less 25 per cent, to be set apart for the reserve fund) shall go into the death fund." It is also provided that "the net earnings of the association, together with the 25 per cent of the net receipts from each assessment, shall constitute a reserve fund"; and that "after the expiration of each period of five years, during the continuance of this certificate of membership, a bond will be issued . . . for an equitable proportion of the reserve fund, and the principal of said bond shall be available ten years from its date towards paying future dues and assessments under this certificate." It is likewise declared that the contract shall be subject to all the provisions and stipulations contained in the constitution and by-laws of the association, "with the amendments made, or that may hereafter be made, thereto." And it is agreed that "the entire contract contained in this certificate and said application, taken together, shall be governed by, subject to, and construed only according to, the constitution, by-laws, and regulations of said association, and the laws of the state of New York, the place of this contract being expressly agreed to be the home office of said association in the city of New York." Upon the back of the certificate there is printed a "Table of Rates," containing, among other things, a statement that "the basis of the assessment rate for each member, according to the age taken at the nearest birthday, on each $1,000 shall be as follows"; and then the various ages, from twenty-five to sixty-five, are set forth, and the several sums payable at the respective ages are placed opposite. Condon's age upon entering the association was fifty-five, and the amount designated as the assessment upon each $1,000 at that age is $3.25. The appellant paid for some years six assessments annually, each of which amounted to $32.50. Subsequently the assessment was increased to $48.55, then raised to $49.10, and later on to $75.30. These sums were paid by Condon "with extreme reluctance." On February 1, 1898, mortuary call No. 96 was issued, and by it the appellant was required to pay, on or before March 3d, the sum of $130. He alleges that these assessments were enormously in excess of what he understood to be the meaning and effect of his contract with the appellee at the time he entered into it. By a written agreement, the time for the payment of the ninety-sixth assessment was extended, first, for thirty days from March 3d, and then for thirty days from April 2d. On the 29th of April, Condon filed a bill in equity against the appellee in the circuit court of Baltimore city, and on June 17 he filed an amended and supplemental bill. These are the bills now before us.

The bill, which was filed by Condon for himself and in behalf of others similarly situated, who might come in and make themselves parties to the proceedings, after setting forth the facts already alluded to, proceeds to charge that the levying of the assessments in excess of $3.25 per $1,000 of insurance, and in excess of six per annum, is a gross violation by the appellee of its contract with the appellant, and is both fraudulent and illegal; that the validity of this action cannot be maintained upon the ground that, by a strained interpretation of some of the conditions of the policy, the levying of assessments is remitted to the discretion of the officers, because the discretion referred to means the honest discretion of the corporation and its officers; that these assessments were not levied bona fide, in the honest exercise of any discretion vested in the corporation or its officers, but were levied with the dishonest and fraudulent purpose of forcing the appellant, and others situated as he is, to allow their policies to lapse by a failure to pay illegal, ruinous, and fraudulent assessments. The bill further charges that these increased assessments cannot be defended by the suggestion that the same are "to any extent" needed in order to enable the corporation to meet its death claims, because, if the corporation is in the prosperous financial condition represented in its circulars, the levying of such assessments is a wanton abuse of the power it possesses, and "plainly proves" that the same are illegal, fraudulent, and ultra vires. The bill then sets forth clauses 2 and 3 of the policy. It is under these clauses that a reserve fund is created out of the net earnings, plus 25 per cent of the net receipts from each assessment. By these clauses it is further provided that, after five years, a membership bond is to be issued to the policy holder for an equitable proportion of this reserve fund, and this bond is made available, after the expiration of ten years, for the payment of future dues. The bill charges that the amount of the bonds issued to the appellant is greatly less than, according to the face of his policy, he was entitled to; that, in fact, the apportionment made was fraudulent; and that, upon a true accounting, it will be found that he is entitled to sums very much greater than those allowed him in the two bonds which had been issued to him. The bill also charges that the corporation is insolvent. The relief prayed is as follows: First, for a subpoena; second, that an injunction may be issued restraining the corporation from forfeiting the appellant's policy for the nonpayment of mortuary call No. 96, "and adjudging that the said assessment is fraudulent and void"; third, that, in the event of the policy being construed as conferring the right to make the assessments complained of, the policy may "be declared to have been obtained under such circumstances as demonstrated that there was no real meeting of minds," and that no contract was in fact executed, and therefore that the corporation may be decreed to refund to the appellant all the payments made by him to it from the beginning; fourth, that, if the court shall find that a binding contract was made, then that the contract, "as set out in said policy," in connection with the constitution and by-laws of the corporation, may be interpreted, and the true meaning and effect thereof determined, and that the power of the corporation" in respect of the levying of assessments may be settled and adjudicated"; fifth, that the corporation may be required to give a full and particular statement of its assets and liabilities; sixth, that a receiver may be appointed to take charge of the assets within the jurisdiction of the court, and to administer them under the direction of the court; seventh, and for general relief. Other persons holding like policies became parties plaintiff. The defendant demurred to the bill and the amended bill, and assigned four grounds. The first, second, and third allege that the application for membership, and the constitution and by-laws of the association, forming parts of the contract of insurance, are not exhibited with the bill, and that it is therefore impossible for the court to correctly interpret the contract. The fourth ground is in these words: "For that it appears by the bill of complaint in this case that the acts complained of on the part of the defendant affect the plaintiffs solely in their capacity as members of the said association, and that the said action relates altogether to the management of the internal affairs of the said association, which, as appears by the said bill of complaint, is not a corporation of the state of Maryland, but is a corporation of the state of New York, and therefore this court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the said bill of complaint."

The amended and supplemental bill reaffirmed all the allegations of the original bill, and prayed, in addition, that a further assessment, maturing on July 1st, be declared illegal, and that an injunction be issued prohibiting the forfeiture of the policies because of its nonpayment. The demurrer distinctly challenges the court's jurisdiction to entertain the bill and to grant the relief sought. This issue of law, thus raised, we now proceed to consider.

By § 124, art. 23, Code, it is provided that, before a foreign insurance company can transact business in Maryland, it shall, among other things, file with the insurance commissioner of this state "a power of attorney appointing a citizen of this state, resident within this state, the agent or attorney for the company, upon whom process of law can be served; there must also be filed with the insurance commissioner a certified copy of the vote or resolution of the directors appointing such attorney, which appointment shall continue until another attorney be substituted. And said writing or power of attorney shall stipulate and agree, on the part of the company making the same, that any lawful process against said company, which is served on such agent, shall be of the same legal force and validity as if served on such company or association within this state; and also, that in case of the death or absence of the attorney so appointed, service of process may be made upon the insurance commissioner of this state; and such power of attorney cannot be revoked or modified (except that a new one may be substituted) so long as any policy or liability remains outstanding against such company in this state. The term (process) used above, shall be held and deemed to include any writ, summons, or order, whereby any action, suit, or proceeding shall be commenced, or which shall be issued in or upon any action, suit, or proceedings, by "any court, officer, or magistrate."

Broad and comprehensive as this statute is, it obviously does not confer unlimited jurisdiction on Maryland courts over foreign corporations. The language of an enactment does not always, or necessarily, measure its scope, or mark the limits of its action. And so, on the other hand, it is equally true that things apparently within its words may be actually beyond its operation. If they are, it is not to be assumed that the legislature intended to include them; and, if there be no intent to include them, they are outside of its purview. That which the legislature has no power to authorize a Maryland court to do—that is, to exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction—will not be held as included within the jurisdiction really given, even though the latter may be conferred in such general terms as to apparently embrace the former within the letter of the statute.

A policy holder in a mutual insurance association stands in a twofold relation towards the company. He is a policy holder and he is a member. Growing out of this, as well as altogether apart from it, there may be a distinct relation of creditor, but with this latter we are not now concerned. He is alike insurer and insured, but in both capacities he is a member, and it is solely because he is a member that he occupies either of these positions. His liabilities as insurer and his rights as insured depend wholly upon the obligations and the conditions of his membership. Those obligations and conditions are evidenced by the constitution and the by-laws of the association, and by his application for, and his certificate of, membership, and by the law of the place of the contract. Apart from these, there is nothing by which his duties and his rights as a member are to be determined. Rights as an insured he undoubtedly has. Those rights may be unlawfully invaded. If thus invaded, he is not without redress when he seeks relief in the forum having jurisdiction over the parties and the subject-matter. The mere fact that he is a member of the corporation does not preclude him from asserting against the corporation any right arising out of his contract: but the character of the remedy invoked may measure the limits of the jurisdiction of the tribunal appealed to, when the domicile of the corporation is considered. It is therefore entirely possible that a state of facts which would authorize a court, in the exercise of its visitatorial power, to inquire into the validity of acts affecting the rights of a policy holder, when done by a corporation located within the jurisdiction of the court, would, as respects a foreign corporation, be wholly insufficient to confer upon the same court jurisdiction to act at all. Thus, in Rosenberger v. Washington Mut. F. Ins. Co. 87 Pa. 207, a domestic fire insurance company was sued for the amount claimed to be payable on a policy against loss by fire. The company was a mutual association. An assessment upon all policy holders had been levied some time prior to the loss, but it was alleged by the plaintiffs to be excessive, and therefore illegal, and they refused to pay it. When the loss insured against by the plaintiffs' policy occurred, the company insisted that the policy had been annulled because of the nonpayment of the assessment. Suit was brought to recover on the policy, and it was held that the question as to whether the assessment was excessive ought to have been left to the jury. Speaking for the court, Judge Trunkley said: "By the terms of the charter, the plaintiffs submitted themselves to the acts of the managers as representatives of all the members. They were bound by the assessment, unless they can show fraud or gross mistake." The members "are, as members, subject to liabilities and entitled to privileges. A member may participate in its benefits, is presumed to know its rules and regulations, its books are evidence against him, and he shall bear his proportion of burdens. His corporate rights may be subject to the control of the corporation, but his rights as a party insured rest on the contract. Assurer and insured alike are bound by the charter, and neither can do what it does not authorize." The company was located within the jurisdiction of the court, was subject to its visitatorial power, and it was held, in these circumstances, that evidence tending to show fraud in the levying of the assessment was competent, because if the assessment was, in fact, fraudulent, it was illegal, and if illegal its nonpayment furnished no ground for declaring the policy forfeited. But we have no such state of facts to deal with in the pending case. This litigation was not instituted to recover on the policy a sum payable under it for a loss actually sustained. Its object, as will be shown later on, is to regulate, by a decree of the circuit court of Baltimore city, the management, the conduct, and the internal government of a foreign corporation. And the question is, Does the statute (§ 124, art. 23, Code, already cited) include such a proceeding, or confer jurisdiction to entertain such a bill, as we have now before us? This question must be answered in the negative, and it must be so answered, both upon principle and according to precedent.

If we turn for a moment to §§ 295 and 297 of article 23 of the Code, it will be found that provision is there made in terms quite as broad as, if not broader than, those used in § 124, for subjecting to suits in this state all corporations not chartered by the laws of Maryland. Such corporations, transacting business in this state, are deemed to hold and exercise franchises within the state, and are made liable to suit "on any dealings or transactions had in the state. Such suits may be brought in any court of the state, or before a justice of the peace, "by a resident of this state, for any cause of action," and by a nonresident, when the cause of action has arisen, or the subject of the action shall be situated, in this state. The scope of these provisions has been defined by this court. In North State Copper & Gold Min. Co. v. Field, 64 Md. 161, it appeared that the appellee was a citizen of Maryland, and the appellant was a corporation created by the laws of North Carolina. The proceeding was an application for a mandamus. Field claimed to be a stockholder in the North State Company. He alleged that the directors of the company had made an illegal and invalid assessment upon each stockholder, and had then forfeited his stock for the nonpayment of that assessment. He sought to be reinstated as a stockholder. After quoting the sections of act 1868, chap. 471, which are incorporated in the sections of the Code just above alluded to, this court said: "The object of our statute, and of similar statutes passed by other states, is to provide for the collection of debts due from foreign corporations, to our own citizens, and to enforce contracts made here by foreign corporations through its agent, and to protect our citizens from frauds or wrong, whether the wrongdoer be foreign or domestic. But it was not the intent of our statute to give our courts jurisdiction over the internal affairs of a foreign corporation. Our courts possess no visitatorial power over them, and can enforce no forfeiture of charter for violation of law, or removal of officers for misconduct; nor can they exercise authority over the corporate functions, the by-laws, nor the relations between the corporation and its members, arising out of, and depending upon, the law of its creation. These powers belong only to the state which created the corporation." The case of Wilkins v. Thorne, 60 Md. 253, is likewise in point. Thorne filed a bill, alleging that he was a stockholder in the North State Copper & Gold Mining Company; that Wilkins and others, fraudulently contriving and intending to get possession of the company's property and divide the same among themselves, to the exclusion of the lawful owners of the stock, assembled in Baltimore, and proceeded to take steps to reorganize the company, intending thereby to cheat and defraud Thorne, and the other lawful holders of the stock, out of their property, by the means of certain pretended by-laws, rules, and regulations; that Wilkins and his confederates were in actual possession of the property and franchises of the company, and had refused to allow any of the stockholders who had not paid an unlawful assessment levied by him and his confederates to have any lot, share, recognition, or authority in the matter of the corporation. The bill prayed for an injunction to restrain Wilkins, and those acting with him, from intermeddling with the property, stock, or affairs of the company. The corporation was a foreign corporation. This court, while holding that, "if this were a Maryland corporation there could be no question as to the jurisdiction of a Maryland court over the subject," decided that "such controversies must be determined by the courts of the state by which the corporation was created"; because it was "clearly a controversy relating to the internal management of the corporation, and the validity of the acts of those who claim to be, and indeed are admitted to be, de facto its president, directors, and stockholders." The relief sought was accordingly denied.

The conclusion reached in both of these cases was adverse to the court's jurisdiction, notwithstanding the provision of the statute making a foreign corporation liable to a suit in the courts of this state by a resident of this state, "on any dealings or transactions, or for any cause of action"; and in spite of the fact that in one case the foundation of the proceeding was an alleged, and as the case was presented and admitted, illegal forfeiture of stock, and in the other an alleged, and by the demurrer a conceded, fraudulent conspiracy to deprive a bona fide shareholder of his stock, and to exclude him from a vote in the management of the company. The language of § 124, heretofore quoted, is less, or, at all events, certainly not more, emphatic than that employed in §§ 295 and 297; for it makes only lawful process served on a non-resident insurance company's agent of the same force and validity as if served on the company within the state. As process, to be lawful, must be process that the tribunal issuing it has authority to issue, and as a judicial tribunal has no authority to issue process (which is a mandate to its officer, commanding him to perform certain services within his official cognizance) unless it be issued in a proceeding which the court has jurisdiction to entertain, to hear, and to decide, it follows that the statute must be interpreted in the same way that §§ 295 and 297 were construed; that is, as not intending to confer an extraterritorial jurisdiction, or a jurisdiction over a cause that involves only an inquiry into, and the exercise of a control over, the internal management of a foreign corporation.

The reasons for thus interpreting these provisions of the Code are conspicuously clear. There are obvious difficulties that would be encountered if the courts of one state undertook to adjust the internal affairs of a foreign corporation formed under the laws of a different state, and having its habitat within the borders of another sovereignty. The absence of a visitatorial power over such a corporation, and the absolute inability to enforce a forfeiture of its charter for a violation of the law, or to remove its officers for misconduct, or to punish them for malversations committed in the place of its domicile, are open and apparent obstacles in the court's pathway, should it assume to exert an extraterritorial jurisdiction. Besides all this, its lack of the means to do full justice, and its want of the machinery to enforce against the corporation, in the place of its existence, any decree it might render in such a proceeding, indicate, if they do not demonstrate, that the legislature never designed to confer a power the exercise of which would or might be utterly fruitless and vain.

With this limit to the court's jurisdiction established, it becomes necessary to ascertain what is and what is not a controversy relating solely to the internal management of a corporation; in other words, what acts are so distinctively acts pertaining to the internal management of a foreign corporation as to preclude an inquiry into them by any tribunal other than the courts of the corporation's domicile. The motives with which the acts are done, and the effect they may have upon others when done, are altogether aside from the inquiry; because, if they strictly appertain to the internal government of the corporation, neither motive nor effect can convert them from what they intrinsically are into what they obviously are not, and therefore cannot make them cognizable if otherwise they be not cognizable. An act done with a fraudulent motive is, as an act, precisely identical with the same act done without such a motive, in so far as it relates to this jurisdictional question; because it is the quality or nature of the act, and not the incentive that prompted it, or the effect that it produces, which determines whether it does pertain to the internal management of the corporation or not. In Field's Case, 64 Md. 161, which has been followed by many other courts of the country, it was said: "Where the act complained of affects the complainant solely in his capacity as a member of the corporation, whether it be as stockholder, director, president, or other officer, and is the act of the corporation, whether acting in stockholders' meeting or through its agents, the board of directors, that then such action is the management of the internal affairs of the corporation, and in case of a foreign corporation, our courts will not take jurisdiction. Where, however, the act of the foreign corporation complained of affects the complainant's individual rights only, then our courts will take jurisdiction." In Field's Case the controversy arose entirely out of the internal management of the affairs of the company. "It is the complaint of a stockholder that he has been deprived of his rights, as a stockholder, by the illegal action of the board of directors." In Thorne's Case, 60 Md. 253, it was the complaint of a stockholder that he was deprived of his right to the stock by the fraudulent conduct of persons claiming to be directors. In Madden v. Penn Electric Light Co. 181 Pa. 617, 38 L. R. A. 638, it was held that the court would not, at the suit of a resident stockholder against a foreign corporation, set aside unwise, dishonest, and useless contracts, which depreciated and destroyed the value of the stock, although the visible, tangible property of the corporation, consisting of conduits in streets for electric lighting, was within the state, because the wrong complained of was an act done in the internal management of the corporation. In Clark v. Mutual Reserve

Fund Life Assn. (February 7, 1899) 13 App. D. C. —, 27 Wash. L. Rep. 114, 43 L. R. A. 390, 1, was held that this same corporation was not amenable to the process of the courts of the District, under a bill substantially the same as the one before us, and seeking precisely the relief asked for in this proceeding. See, too, 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 378, note 4; Id. p. 379, note 1; Republican Mountain Silver Mines v. Brown, 19 U. S. App. 203, 58 Fed. Rep. 645, 7 C. C. A. 412, 24 L. R. A. 776.

We turn now to the allegations of the bill to ascertain whether the acts complained of are, according to the definition in Field's Case, acts of internal management or not. Laying aside for the moment the question as to whether the certificate of membership, by its terms, authorizes an increase in the amount of the assessments above $3.25 per $1,000 of insurance, and permits the levying of more than the designated bimonthly ones, it is obvious, we think, that the whole fabric of the bill with respect to these alleged illegal assessments involves, as its foundation, the right of a Maryland court to inquire into the internal management of this New York corporation. The substance of the allegations of the bill, as we have heretofore stated them on this subject, is that these excessive assessments are not only void, because not authorized, but because, the condition of the death fund not demanding that they should be laid, they were made with the dishonest and fraudulent purpose of forcing the appellant's policy, and the policies of others similarly situated, to lapse. Now, it is perfectly apparent that no tribunal can possibly decide whether the condition of the death fund required these extra assessments to be levied, until it knows what the condition of the death fund was and what demands there were upon it. And it is equally clear that, in order that these factors may be known, the whole internal management of the association must be investigated. The disposition made of the money assessed for, and payable to, the death fund, the validity of claims against that fund, the propriety of expenditures charged against it, and other like inquiries, strictly relating to the internal management and to the proper disbursement of the money which the many thousand members have intrusted to the directors' control, would all have to be solved, before a court could say that these assessments were unnecessary or fraudulent. No court could declare them excessive until it knew what sum was not excessive, and no court could decide what sum was not excessive until it was placed in the full possession of all the facts pertaining to the whole internal conduct of the company. These observations apply, also, to the charges of the bill in respect to the amount of the reserve fund bonds issued to Condon. It is alleged that a true accounting will show him entitled to bonds for larger amounts. A true accounting can only be had by an examination of all the entries relating to this fund, and by correcting errors, if any there are. Obviously, this would involve a control of the company's internal affairs by the agency of an injunction issued by a Maryland court, though that court possesses no power to enforce the injunction if its commands were treated with contumely by the corporation. These matters thus complained of do not affect the appellant's individual rights solely. They relate also to the rights, and bear upon the liabilities, of every other member as an insurer; and while in a sense they may, by their consequences, affect him individually as assured, they do not affect him exclusively, but concern, as well, the internal management of the company. His relation to the corporation is, as we have stated, of a two-fold character. He is insurer and insured. It is possible that the same act of the body corporate may affect both of these relations. In that event, it could not be said that the act affected a member's individual rights only. In Madden's Case, 181 Pa. 617, 38 L. R. A. 638, the fraudulent and dishonest contracts complained of impaired the value of the shareholder's stock, and in that regard injured his individual rights; but the wrong imputed arose, not from the violation of a contract with him, but from want of fidelity to duty on the part of the directors in the fiduciary position occupied by them. These acts not only depressed the value of the stock, but they concerned the internal management of the corporation, and, therefore, though causing injury, furnished no ground for a Pennsylvania court to interfere with the government of a New Jersey corporation.

If the whole of the contract between Condon and the company were before us for construction in a case where we were authorized to construe it, we would be confronted by a provision of the policy which places in the director's power and discretion, when the death fund is insufficient to meet existing claims by death, to levy an assessment "at such rates, according to the age of each member, as may be established by the board of directors." Here, then, by this term of the contract, provision is made for additional assessments beyond the bimonthly ones previously specified in the certificate. Whether this is the meaning of the contract, when all of its parts are brought together, we do not, for we cannot now, decide.

From what we have said, it is apparent that the second and fifth prayers for relief cannot be granted. We cannot, by injunction, control the internal management of a corporation which is located beyond the reach of that process. It is equally clear that the fourth prayer for relief must be denied, because it asks for the construction of a contract, when but part of the contract is before us. We are called on to interpret the contract as set out in the certificate of membership, in connection with the constitution and laws, though the application and the constitution and laws, all forming part of the contract, are not before us. The constitution and by-laws all form part of the agreement of insurance, whether mentioned or not. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 41, and cases in note 1. A construction of the contract, as set out in the policy alone, would not be a construction of the contract as contained in the application, the constitution, the by-laws, and the policy.

There is no averment cognizable by a Maryland court justifying the appointment of a receiver as asked for in the sixth prayer for relief. The allegation of insolvency is not sufficient to found such a drastic measure on. Unless the plaintiff has a standing in court, unless he presents on the face of his bill a case of which jurisdiction can be taken, a bare allegation of insolvency will not warrant the appointment of a receiver. If the court has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the proceeding, it has no authority to appoint a receiver.

The second prayer for relief is in the alternative. It asks that the money paid in by Condon during the time he has been a member be restored to him, if the court should hold that his understanding of the meaning of the policy is not its correct interpretation. He alleges that he understood the contract to mean one thing, and he claims, if the court shall find it to import something else, that then there never was any contract at all, because there was no meeting of minds in regard to its terms. Now, the bill nowhere charges that Condon was induced by fraud, deceit, or misrepresentation to enter into the contract of insurance, nor does he ask to have the policy canceled on any such ground. His claim is simply that he understood the contract to signify that he was to pay only six assessments per annum, each one of which would be for the sum of $32.50, and no more. He insists that if this is not the limit of his liability he is entitled to have his money refunded. For more than fourteen years the policy has been in his possession. Its provisions were plainly before his eyes. He has given no explanation for not reading them, and, although he has had the benefit of an insurance on his life for that period of time, he asks to have all he has paid in refunded him. The sums he paid in were not paid for his use exclusively, nor mainly. They were collected to pay the losses occasioned by the deaths of other members. They were paid in for a specific purpose, and were paid by him as an insurer. They were not assets of the corporation. May, Ins. § 550 A, and note. The corporation acted in the receipt of them as a collecting agency, for the benefit of those persons to whom they were ultimately payable, and there is no pretense in the bill that a single dollar of the sums paid in by Condon has not been disbursed or appropriated precisely in the way and to the uses he expected and intended that it should be. And, if his contributions have been expended and appropriated in that way, obviously he has no claim to recover them back, simply because he failed to read, or if he read failed to understand, the provisions of the policy, the constitution, and the by-laws. As we have already stated, the whole contract is not before us, and, even if this were a case in which we were authorized to construe it, we could not interpret it in the absence of material and essential portions of it.

Every right asserted by Condon is a right founded on his membership. Every prayer for relief is for relief sought by a member against the concern of which he is a member, in respect of some matter pertaining to the management and internal government of the association. While the acts complained of may affect him, they do not affect him alone, and they only affect him in any way because of his membership. If these acts are unwarranted, they are certainly not more grave than the forfeiture of Field's stock for the nonpayment of an illegal and void assessment. And if the latter gave no ground for the interposition of a court of equity, because it was an act of internal management done by a foreign corporation, it is difficult to see how the former can be classed as acts affecting only the individual rights of Condon. In Field's Case an injury was done to him by the misconduct complained of, but the injury was not an injury solely to his individual rights. The act which occasioned the wrong was a corporate act, relating to the internal government of the company. Its effect upon him did not deprive it of its character as a corporate act. The results to Condon do not define the nature of the acts which he complains of, or prevent them, because they do him injury as he alleges, from being acts pertaining to the internal government of a foreign corporation of which he is a member. Were he suing on the contract of insurance, the situation would be different.

If this were a suit on the insurance policy to recover a loss insured against, it would be a case within the jurisdiction of the courts of Maryland. In such a proceeding, it would be incumbent on the court to construe the policy, and to determine whether it had been forfeited or not, because it would have the authority to decide whether a recovery could be had. Necessarily, therefore, the validity of any assessment, and the inquiry as to whether an assessment was fraudulent, would be a legitimate inquiry; because in a suit on the policy in Maryland the courts of this state would not be called on to regulate, by injunction or otherwise, the government of a foreign corporation, but would be required merely to enforce the contract or to award damages for its breach. There is a broad difference between compelling a foreign corporation, at the suit of a member, to conform its internal conduct to the views of a Maryland court, and adjudging it, at the suit of a beneficiary, liable in damages for a failure to comply with its contract of indemnity. In the one instance the Maryland court has no jurisdiction; in the other, it has. As we agree with the conclusion reached by the circuit court, its decree sustaining the demurrer, and dismissing the original and amended bills, will be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, with costs in this court and in the court below.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Albert N. WATSON

v.

PORTLAND & CAPE ELIZABETH RAIL-ROAD COMPANY.

(91 Me. 584.)

1. Riding on the front platform of an electric street car is not negligence as matter of law.
2. The question whether or not a person riding on the front platform of an electric street car took such precautions to avoid injury as the obvious and usual dangers of his position required is for the jury where the facts are disputed or are susceptible of more than one conclusion.

(June 13, 1898.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to the ruling of the Supreme Judicial Court for Cumberland County directing a verdict in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. L. M. Webb, H. Knowlton, and W. J. Knowlton, for plaintiff:

The question as to whether there was room inside the car, and whether, under the circumstances, the plaintiff was justified in riding on the platform, and as to his position, are all facts for the jury.

Groswell, Electricity, §§ 727-729, p. 606; Real v. Lowell & D. Street R. Co. 157 Mass. 448; Palmer v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 120 N. Y. 174.

If the car was so crowded that riding upon the steps or platform was a necessity there can be no negligence imputed to plaintiff; but whether the car was so crowded is a question for the jury.

Maguire v. Middlesex R. Co. 115 Mass. 239; McDonough v. Metropolitan R. Co. 137 Mass. 210; Pray v. Omaha Street R. Co. 44 Neb. 167.

The question of plaintiff's due care is properly one of fact for the jury.

Beal v. Lowell & D. Street R. Co. 157 Mass. 448.

Standing upon the front platform of a car, even if there is standing room inside, is not of itself conclusive evidence that a person, injured by the negligence of the person managing the car, was not in the exercise of due care.

Maguire v. Middlesex R. Co. 115 Mass. 239; Wilde v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 163 Mass. 533; Nolan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 63, 41 Am. Rep. 345; Vail v. Broadway R. Co. 147 N. Y. 377, 30 L. R. A. 626; Hastings v. Central Crosstown R. Co. 7 App. Div. 312; Sias v. Rochester R. Co. 92 Hun, 140; Ginna v. Second Ave. R. Co. 67 N. Y. 596; Messel v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 8 Allen, 234.

Calling for and receiving fare from persons standing on the front and rear platform of a car authorizes the jury to find that those so riding had been invited by those having charge of the car to ride in that place, and that an implied assurance had been given by them that that was a suitable and safe place for them to ride.

Clark v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 135, 93 Am. Dec. 495; Edgerton v. New York & H. R. Co. 39 N. Y. 227.

When negligence on the part of plaintiff is connected with the cause of injury, the question to be determined is whether the defendant, by the exercise of ordinary care and skill, might have avoided the injury; if he could have done so the negligence of plaintiff cannot be set up as an answer to the action.

Pollard v. Maine C. R. Co. 87 Me. 55.

Mr. Clarence Hale, for defendant:

The plaintiff could not recover because he was voluntarily riding upon the platform of a car while there was standing room inside.

Goodwin v. Boston & M. R. Co. 84 Me. 211; Worthington v. Central Vermont R. Co. 64 Vt. 107, 15 L. R. A. 326; Gavett v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 16 Gray, 502, 77 Am. Dec. 422; Hickey v. Boston & L. R. Co. 14 Allen, 429; Torrey v. Boston & A. R. Co. 147 Mass. 412; Quinn v. Illinois C. R. Co. 51 Ill. 495; Wood, Railway Law, § 303; Reber v. Pittsburgh & B. Traction Co. 179 Pa. 339; Aikin v. Frankford & S. P. City Pass. R. Co. 142 Pa. 47; Francisco v. Troy & L. R. Co. 78 Hun, 13; Clark v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 138, 93 Am. Dec. 495; Willmott v. Corrigan Consol. Street R. Co. 106 Mo. 535, 25 Alb. L. J. 84; Booth, Street Railways, ed. 1892, § 338.

Wherever courts have said that it was not negligence to ride upon the front platform of a street car, it has been in cases where the cars were crowded and the occupancy of the platform was held to have been invited or permitted.

Mann v. Philadelphia Traction Co. 175 Pa. 122.

A person who rides upon the front platform of an electric passenger car is guilty of contributory negligence.

Worthington v. Central Vermont R. Co. 64 Vt. 107, 15 L. R. A. 326; Torrey v. Boston & A. R. Co. 147 Mass. 412; Hickey v. Boston & L. R. Co. 14 Allen, 429; Francisco v. Troy & L. R. Co. 78 Hun, 13; Clark v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 138, 93 Am. Dec. 495.

While the question of contributory negligence is ordinarily a question of fact, there being no dispute about the facts, it becomes a question of law for the court as to whether or not the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care.

Elwell v. Hacker, 86 Me. 416; Romeo v. Boston & M. R. Co. 87 Me. 540; Wormell v. Maine C. R. Co. 79 Me. 397; McPeck v. Cen-

Even if plaintiff had rights of a passenger, it was his duty on getting aboard of the car to place himself in a safe position; and it is no excuse for him to place himself in an unsafe position that the persons in charge knew that he was in an unsafe position and did not drive him therefrom.

The plaintiff on his own showing was guilty of contributory negligence in occupying a place of known danger without taking suitable care.

Although the court should go to the extreme point of saying that the presiding justice was incorrect in ordering a verdict for the plaintiff, and that he should have submitted the whole question to the jury, even then the exception should be overruled because the case shows that the testimony cannot support a verdict for the plaintiff.

Wiswell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, while riding upon the front platform of one of the defendant's electric street cars, was thrown from the car by its sudden jolting, and, striking the ground with considerable violence, sustained more or less injury.

It is claimed that this was caused by the negligence of the motorman in allowing his car to come towards a switch with such speed that he was unable to see whether it was properly set or not, and, the switch being open, that the car was propelled so rapidly onto a siding as to cause violent jarring and jolting.

After the evidence upon both sides had been closed, the presiding justice directed a verdict for the defendant; to which direction exception is taken. It becomes necessary, therefore, to decide whether, upon all the evidence, regarding it in the most favorable aspect for the plaintiff that it is susceptible of, the jury would have been justified in returning a verdict for the plaintiff.

Upon the question of the alleged negligence of the defendant, it is only necessary to say that in our opinion there was sufficient evidence to submit this question to the jury. Was there also sufficient evidence upon the question of the plaintiff's own care to sustain the burden of proof resting upon him in that respect?

The question of negligence is ordinarily one for the jury,—it is always so, not only when the facts are in dispute, but also when the facts are undisputed; but intelligent and fairminded men may reasonably differ as to the conclusions and inferences to be drawn from such facts,—because, in passing upon this question, a jury must not only decide what was in fact done or left undone, but also as to what should have been done in the situation. But this is not true when the facts are not in dispute, and when the undisputed facts are susceptible of but one conclusion. In such cases it is not only proper, but it is the duty of the court, to take the case from the jury. Romeo v. Boston & M. R. Co. 87 Me. 540.

In this case the presiding justice, in directing a verdict for the defendant, gave certain reasons why, in his opinion, a verdict for the plaintiff would not be warranted, and could not be sustained, saying, among other things, "that the riding upon the platform of a passenger car upon the railroad is such negligence upon the part of the passenger as would bar his recovery for injury sustained by being thrown from the platform in rounding a curve." And, again: "It is settled as a question of law that one who rides upon the platform of a car and is injured by being thrown from it as the car rounds a curve is guilty of contributory negligence."

In our opinion, this was not a correct statement of law when applied to a street-railroad car, whether propelled by horses, electricity, or otherwise. Riding upon the platforms of such cars is too much encouraged by transportation companies, and too much indulged in by the public, for the court to say, as a matter of law, that the mere riding upon the platform of such a car is conclusive evidence of negligence, or is negligence per se, or is negligence in law. It depends upon too many other circumstances and conditions for a court to lay down any hard and fast rule in regard to it; but it is a fact which should ordinarily be submitted to the jury, in connection with all of the other circumstances of the case.

That this is true with respect to horse street cars is not questioned, and has been frequently decided. Meesele v. Lynn & B. R.

Co. 8 Allen, 234; Maguire v. Middlesex R. Co. 115 Mass. 239; Fleck v. Union R. Co. 134 Mass. 480; Germantown Pass. R. Co. v. Walling, 97 Pa. 55, 39 Am. Rep. 796; Vail v. Broadway R. Co. 147 N. Y. 377, 30 L. R. A. 626; Nolan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 63, 41 Am. Rep. 345; City R. Co. v. Lee, 50 N. J. L. 435.

But it is claimed upon the part of the defense that, while this is true in the case of a horse car, as to electric cars the rule laid down in this state, and generally, with respect to trains of cars upon steam railroads, should apply. Goodwin v. Boston & M. R. Co. 84 Me. 203. We do not think so. An electric street car is still a street car, and, in our opinion, the conditions, especially with respect to riding upon platforms, are more similar to those of the horse street car than those of a railroad train upon a steam railroad.

It is a notorious fact that street-railroad companies whose cars are propelled by electricity constantly accept and invite passengers to ride upon the platforms of their cars when there is no room inside, and that persons having occasion to use such cars are frequently glad for even a foothold upon the platform step, or footboard. Neither carrier nor public have regarded the street-car platform as a known place of danger, and we are not disposed to say, as a matter of law, that a passenger who rides upon the platform of an electric street car is thereby guilty of such contributory negligence as to prevent his recovery for injuries sustained through the fault of an employee of the transportation company. We hold, rather, that it is a circumstance to be submitted to and decided by the jury.

Such is the conclusion that many of the courts of this country have arrived at: Elliott v. Newport Street R. Co. 18 R. I. 707, 23 L. R. A. 208; Pray v. Omaha Street R. Co. 44 Neb. 167; Wilde v. Lynn & B. R. Co. 163

Mass. 533; Reber v. Pittsburg & B. Traction Co. 179 Pa. 339.

It is further urged by counsel for defendant that the verdict was properly ordered, even if the reasons given therefor by the presiding justice cannot be sustained; that, if the court should hold that a person cannot be said, as a matter of law, to be guilty of negligence from the mere fact that he was standing upon the platform of an electric street car in motion, this plaintiff was nevertheless negligent in not taking such precautions as the obvious and usual dangers of his position required; and that it is immaterial that the reasons given by the presiding justice in ordering a verdict were erroneous, if, upon the facts, the verdict was properly ordered.

There is no question about the correctness of these propositions of law. A passenger who rides on the platform of a car necessarily takes upon himself the duty of looking out for and protecting himself against the usual and obvious perils attendant upon his position; such as, for instance, the danger of being thrown from the platform by the jolting or swaying of the car. Elliott v. Newport Street R. Co. 18 R. I. 707, 23 L. R. A. 208.

But the court is of the opinion that the evidence in this case does not sustain the defendant's contention; that is, in the opinion of the court, the evidence does not so clearly show contributory negligence upon the part of the plaintiff as to authorize the withdrawal of this question from the determination of the jury. The case comes within the general rule that the question of negligence is ordinarily one for the jury, and not within the exception that, when the facts are undisputed, and are susceptible of but one conclusion, it is the duty of the court to take the case from the jury.

The entry will therefore be: Exceptions sustained.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

TELEGRAM NEWSPAPER COMPANY
v.
COMMONWEALTH of Massachusetts.

GAZETTE COMPANY
v.
SAME.

(172 Mass. 294.)

1. A corporation may be held liable for criminal contempt for publishing in a newspaper printed and circulated in a place where a trial is had an article concerning the cause on trial which is calculated to prejudice the jury and prevent a fair trial.

NOTE.—As to the lawfulness of publications respecting pending suits, see Cooper v. People, Wyatt (Colo.) 6 L. R. A. 430; also State v. Kaiser (Or.) 8 L. R. A. 584, and note.

2. A formal complaint is not necessary to authorize a court to take cognizance of a contempt consisting in publishing newspaper articles calculated to prejudice the jury in a trial pending before it.

3. Publishing in a newspaper the figures named by the respective parties to a suit on trial in an effort to compromise the controversy, so that they are likely to be brought to the notice of the jury, is punishable as a contempt of court, although there was no intent to pervert the course of justice.

4. That the jurors did not in fact see a newspaper article published during a trial in such a way as to be likely to come to their notice and prejudice the judgment will not relieve the publisher from punishment for contempt of court.

5. The necessity for instituting contempt proceedings to vindicate its authority in case of publication of newspaper articles calculated to prejudice the jury in a pending trial is for the trial court, and will not be considered on appeal.

(January 4, 1899.)

WRITS of error to the Superior Court for Worcester County to review judgments punishing plaintiffs in error for contempt of court in publishing newspaper articles calculated to interfere with the due course of justice in cases on trial before the court. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. P. Goulding, D. Manning, and W. C. Mellish for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Herbert Parker and George S. Taft, for defendant in error:

The power of punishment for contempt is an incident to all courts, necessary to their maintenance, and independent of any statutory provisions.

Cartwright's Case, 14 Mass. 240; State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384.

It is not necessary that the action of defendant should have actually embarrassed or impeded justice; it is enough if it had such tendency.

Respublica v. Passmore, 3 Yeates, 441, 2 Am. Dec. 388; Re Sturoc, 48 N. H. 428, 97 Am. Dec. 626.

The construction and tendency of publication as determining its character as contempt are matters of law for the court.

People v. Wilson, 64 Ill. 195, 16 Am. Rep. 528; State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384; Respublica v. Oswald, 1 Dall. 319, 1 L. ed. 155.

Publication such as that proved is considered to have been in the presence of the court.

State v. Post, 4 Ohio N. P. 157; Myers v. State, 46 Ohio St. 473.

A complaint, sworn to, is not a necessary prerequisite to jurisdiction.

Cartwright's Case, 14 Mass. 240; State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384; People v. Wilson, 64 Ill. 195, 16 Am. Rep. 528; Re Sturoc, 48 N. H. 428, 97 Am. Dec. 626; Golden Gate Consol. Hydraulic Min. Co. v. Yuba County Super. Ct. 65 Cal. 187; People. Greeley, v. Court of Oyer & Terminer, 27 How. Pr. 14; Re Chessman, 49 N. J. L. 116, 60 Am. Rep. 596.

Even if such a preliminary complaint were requisite, it has been waived by plaintiff in error not having interposed any objection in the trial court.

Randall, Petitioner, 11 Allen, 473; Re Chessman, 49 N. J. L. 115, 60 Am. Rep. 596; Ex parte Keeler, 45 S. C. 537; 31 L. R. A. 678; Bishop v. Donnell, 171 Mass. 563.

The court had jurisdiction of the party. Even if it were not so, this objection has been waived by the plaintiff having filed no dilatory plea, by general appearance, and by hearing on merits.

The court did have authority to impose a fine.

Min. Co. v. Yuba County Super. Ct. 65 Cal. 187.

It is necessary only to show by the record that court had jurisdiction of the cause, not of the parties. The latter is matter to be raised by plea in abatement, or motion to dismiss.

Piper v. Pearson, 2 Gray, 121, 61 Am. Dec. 438.

The presumption of law is that the court had jurisdiction of the cause and parties until the contrary is shown.

Cuddy, Petitioner, 131 U. S. 280, 33 L. ed. 154.

Field, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are two writs of error, and, although the pleadings may possibly raise issues of fact as well as issues of law, the cases were entered, without objection on the part of any of the parties, upon the docket of the full court, and each case was heard upon the plea. In nullo est erratum. The Telegram Newspaper Company is a Massachusetts corporation, having its usual place of business in Worcester, and publishing there a daily newspaper. The Gazette Company is a corporation established under the laws of the state of Maine, having its usual place of business in Worcester, and publishing there a daily newspaper. It is understood that it had complied with Stat. 1884, chap. 330, and had made the commissioner of corporations its attorney, upon whom legal process might be served. The record in the cases recites that the corporations, respectively, appeared in the superior court, with counsel, in obedience to the summons of that court to show cause why they should not be adjudged in contempt for publishing certain articles in their newspapers, of the dates of January 13 and 14, respectively, of the year 1898, which articles dealt with and discussed the matter of the trial before said court of the action or petition of Silas H. Loring against the town of Holden, and that the corporations appeared, and were heard, so that any question of due service of the summons upon the foreign corporation has become immaterial.

At the time of the publication of the articles in the newspapers the petition of Silas H. Loring against the town of Holden was on trial before the superior court then sitting at Worcester, and it was for the assessment of damages suffered by the taking of land of the petitioner for the abolition of a grade crossing of the Fitchburg Railroad Company. The portion of the articles published which the court found was calculated to obstruct the course of justice in said court, and prevent a fair trial of said petition, was, after describing the petition of Loring against the town of Holden, the following: "The town offered Loring $80 at the time of the taking, but he demanded $250, and, not getting it, went to law," which appeared in the Worcester Daily Telegram; and "The town offered the plaintiff $80, but he wanted $250," which appeared in the Worcester Evening Gazette. Whether there is any truth in these statements does not appear. The facts stated, even if they were true, were not admissible in evidence at the trial of the petition before the superior court; and, so far as appears, they were no part of the proceedings at the trial, and, if they were brought to the knowledge of the jurors before they rendered their verdict, were calculated to influence them upon the amount of the damages to be given by their verdict. The newspapers were published and circulated in Worcester, and it was not improbable at the time of publication that the articles would be read by some of the jurors before the trial of the petition was finished.

The record before us in each case, after setting out the whole of the articles published, and the summons, service, and appearance of the corporation, and the hearing, concludes as follows: "When, after hearing all matters and things concerning said publication by said respondents, it appearing to said court that said article was calculated to obstruct the course of justice in said court, and prevent a fair trial of said case, and that it was a contempt of said court for said corporation to publish the said article during the said trial, it was, therefore, ordered by said court that said respondent corporation be adjudged guilty of contempt of said court for said publication of said article; and it was thereupon ordered by said court that said respondent corporation pay a fine of $100, and it was further ordered that, if said fine be not paid within twenty-four hours, an execution be issued against said respondent corporation for the collection of said fine by a levy on its property."

It is contended that a corporation cannot be guilty of a criminal contempt of court, although it may be fined for what is called a "civil contempt." It is said that an intent cannot be imputed to a corporation in criminal proceedings. It has been decided in this commonwealth that a corporation may be liable civilly for a libel or a malicious prosecution. Fogg v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 148 Mass. 513; Reed v. Home Sav. Bank, 130 Mass. 443. 39 Am. Rep. 468. We think that a corporation may be liable criminally for certain offenses, of which a specific intent may be a necessary element. There is no more difficulty in imputing to a corporation a specific intent in criminal proceedings than in civil. A corporation cannot be arrested and imprisoned in either civil or criminal proceedings; but its property may be taken, either as compensation for a private wrong or as punishment for a public wrong. In most of the states of this country corporations may be formed, under general laws, for the purpose of doing almost any kind of business, as easily as partnerships, and many of the newspapers are published by corporations. Although natural persons who publish or assist in publishing a libel in a newspaper owned by a corporation may be punished criminally by fine or imprisonment, or both, yet, if the corporation cannot be punished by a fine, it will escape all criminal liability. The authors of libels are often irresponsible persons, and the remedy by private action against corporations for the publishing of libelous statements is often inadequate. That a corporation may be indicted for a misfeasance as well as for a nonfeasance has been decided in this commonwealth. Com. v. Proprietors of New Bedford Bridge, 2 Gray, 339. See Queen v. Great North of England Ry. Co. 9 Q. B. 315, 326. A corporation may be indicted for a libel. State v. Atchison, 3 Lea, 729, 31 Am. Rep. 663, and note; Brennan v. Tracy, 2 Mo. App. 543; Pharmaceutical Soc. v. London & P. Supply Asso. L. R. 5 App. Cas. 857, 869, 870; 2 Bishop, New Crim. Law, §§ 9, 35; Newell, Defamation, Slander, & Libel, 2d ed. 362, 363; Odgers, Libel & Slander, 3d ed. 436; 5 Thomp. Corp. §§ 6418 et seq. The publication of an article in a newspaper which is printed and circulated in the place where a trial is had pending the trial, and which concerns the cause on trial, and is calculated to prejudice the jury in the cause and prevent a fair trial, often has been held to be a criminal contempt of the court trying the cause. O'Shea v. O'Shea, L. R. 15 Prob. Div. 59; Ex parte Green, 7 Times Law R. 411; Daw v. Eley, L. R. 7 Eq. 55; Ramsbotham v. Senior, L. R. 8 Eq. 575; People v. Wilson, 64 Ill. 195, 16 Am. Rep. 528; Re Sturoc, 48 N. H. 428, 97 Am. Dec. 626; Re Cheeseman, 49 N. J. L. 137, 60 Am. Rep. 596; State v. Freu, 24 W. Va. 416, 49 Am. Rep. 257; Oswald, Contempt, 2d ed. pp. 58 et seq.; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 59. If a corporation publishes the article, we see no reason why it should not be held liable for a criminal contempt. 5 Thomp. Corp. §§ 64, 68 et seq.; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 847, and cases cited. There are no statutes in this commonwealth regulating the proceedings in the trial and punishment of contempt of court. "The summary power to commit and punish for contempts tending to obstruct or degrade the administration of justice is inherent in courts of chancery and other superior courts, as essential to the execution of their powers and to the maintenance of their authority, and is part of the law of the land, within the meaning of Magna Charta and of the 12th article of our Declaration of Rights." Cartwright's Case, 114 Mass. 230, 238; Tinsley v. Anderson, 171 U. S. 101, 43 L. ed. 91.

In the present cases it was not necessary that a formal complaint should first have been made to the court. The contempt, if there was one, was not, strictly speaking, committed in the presence of the court, but it related to a trial then proceeding before the court. In each case a summons to the plaintiffs in error was issued by the court, of its own motion, and without complaint made, to show cause why the corporations should not be adjudged in contempt for publishing an article dealing with a matter on trial before the court. When it comes in any manner to the knowledge of the presiding justice of a court that articles are published in a newspaper circulated in the place where the court is held which are calculated to prevent a fair trial of a cause then on trial before the court, the court, of its own motion, can institute proceedings for contempt. Such a power in the court is necessary for its own protection against an improper interference with the due administration of justice, and it is not dependent upon the complaint of any of the parties litigant. If the publication amounts to a contempt of court, because it interferes with the due administration of justice in a cause before the court, the contempt is analogous to a contempt committed in the presence of the court. The proceedings in the present cases, after the service of process, show that the plaintiffs in error were specifically informed of the nature of the charge against them, and were given a full opportunity to be heard with the aid of counsel.

The most important question is whether the publication of these articles under the circumstances stated could be adjudged a contempt. The articles published were not defamatory either as regards the presiding justice of the court, or the jurors before whom the cause referred to was being tried, or the parties to the cause. In one case the court discharged the treasurer and manager of the newspaper, and in the other the editor and the publisher, on the ground that they were not shown to be directly responsible for the publications. It is probable (although this does not expressly appear in the papers before us) that the person or persons employed to report for each newspaper the proceedings of the court wrote the articles, and caused them to be published. The superior court has not found that there was an intent to influence the trial of the cause referred to on the part of anybody. The articles are objectionable only because they purport to state the amount of money which the town offered to pay the plaintiff, and the amount the plaintiff demanded, before the petition was brought. The law encourages attempts to settle or compromise disputes, without subjecting the parties to any liability, if the attempts fail, of having any concessions therein made to avoid litigation put in evidence against them in the subsequent litigation. Upton v. South Reading Branch R. Co. 8 Cush. 600; Harrington v. Lincoln, 4 Gray, 563, 64 Am. Dec. 95; Gay v. Bates, 99 Mass. 263; Draper v. Hatfield, 124 Mass. 53. We are content to assume that the person or persons who wrote and caused the articles to be published did not know this rule of law, and acted without any intent to pervert the course of justice. As the only intent which can be imputed to the corporation is the intent of its officers or agents, the question is whether the publication of these articles without any intent to pervert the course of justice can be adjudged a contempt. In Metropolitan Music Hall Co. v. Lake, 58 L. J. Ch. N. S. 513, it is said that it must be shown that the articles were published with knowledge of the pending cause, 44 L. R. A.

and that appears in the present cases. In Cartwright's Case, 114 Mass. 230, 238, it is said by the court: "But the jurisdiction and power of the court do not depend upon the question whether the offense might or might not be punished by indictment. . . . As regards the question whether a contempt has or has not been committed, it does not depend upon the intention of the party, but upon the act he has done." By Taney, Ch. J., in Wartman v. Wartman, Taney, 362, 370. "If a person talk with or send a statement to a juror about a cause, during the trial of it, in such a manner that it may cause prejudice or bias in the cause, although the intent with which the person acted may affect the amount of his punishment, he cannot justify his conduct by showing that he had no evil intent, and knew no better.

It was not necessary that the superior court should find that the articles published actually had been read by some of the jurors while trying the cause to which the articles referred. They plainly had been read by the presiding justice during the trial, and it was likely that they had been read by some of the jurors. The intention of the publisher of a newspaper is that it should be bought and read by persons within the place where it circulates. Cases before a court should be determined on the evidence presented in court. It is an inevitable perversion of the proper administration of justice to attempt to influence the judge or jury in the determination of a cause pending before them by statements outside of the courtroom, and not in the presence of the parties, which may be false, and, even if they are true, are not in law admissible in evidence. We cannot say that it appears that the superior court erred in adjudging that the publication of these articles, under the circumstances stated, was a contempt of that court; and it was for that court to determine whether it was necessary to institute proceedings for contempt in order to vindicate its authority to secure the due administration of justice in a cause pending before it. The publications contained statements of facts, evidence of which was not competent at the trial, and was not introduced at the trial; and they were so made that it was likely that the presiding justice and the jurors would read them during the trial, and the natural and probable effect of them would be improperly to influence the court and jury in the determination of the cause.

The proper method of collecting a fine imposed upon a corporation is by levy of an execution, issued by the court. King v. Woolf, 2 Barn. & Ald. 609. 1 Chitty, 583; Huddleson v. Ruffin, 6 Ohio St. 604; 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 2d ed. 811; 1 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. §§ 1303 et seq.

Judgment affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

John A. MAY, Receiver of the Ingham County Savings Bank,

v.

Rollin J. CLELAND et al., and Frederick THOMAN, Appt.

(.....Mich.....)

A purchaser at execution sale of corporate stock with notice that it has been pledged to a third person takes subject to the rights of the pledgee, although the pledge has not been entered on the books of the corporation.

(May 17, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendant Thoman from a decree of the Circuit Court for Ingham County sitting in Chancery in a suit brought to enforce a lien on certain corporate stock. Affirmed.

Statement by Grant, Ch. J.:

The facts are undisputed, and are as follows: The complainant, as receiver of the Ingham County Savings Bank, filed the bill of complaint in this cause to foreclose a lien on certain shares of the corporate stock of the Michigan Knitting Company, pledged December 13, 1895, with said bank, by the defendant Rollin J. Cleland, as collateral security for the payment of a certain loan made to him, and certain indebtedness owing said bank by one George M. Dayton. At the time of receiving the stock, the bank did not notify the Michigan Knitting Company of its rights therein, nor did it have or seek to have a transfer of the stock upon the books of the company until after the levy of the execution hereinafter mentioned. On the 9th day of July, 1896, a levy was made upon this stock under a writ of execution, issued on a judgment in the circuit court for Ingham county, in favor of one Phillip Perkins, and against the defendant Cleland and others. The levy was regularly made, and proper proceedings to a sale thereof followed. On August 13, 1896, said shares of stock were sold by Sidney Edson, deputy sheriff, to the defendant Frederick Thoman, for the sum of $7.50, such sum being the highest bid made therefor. While the sale was in progress, and before Mr. Thoman purchased, the complainant caused public notice of its rights in said stock to be given to all bidders attending the sale; and the defendant Thoman had full notice of complainant's rights and equities in the stock. The case was heard upon pleadings and proofs, and a decree made in favor of the complainant establishing his prior rights and equities in the stock, and decreeing a sale thereof for the satisfaction of the debts for which it had been pledged. Defendant Thoman alone appeals.

NOTE.—As to the effect of a pledge of stock certificates, see, in general, cases in note to Re Argus Printing Co. (N. D.) 12 L. R. A. 781.

For pledgee's liability as a stockholder, see note to Andrews v. National Foundry & Pipe Works (C. C. App. 7th C.) 36 L. R. A. 139. 44 L. R. A.

Under statutes like ours an unrecorded transfer is void as to subsequent ones.

Meyer*, 52 Vt. 66; Murphy's Application, 51 Wis. 519.

New York, Louisiana, and the United States courts have held both ways.

See Stebbins v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 3 Paige, 350; Johnson v. Underhill, 52 N. Y. 203; New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N. Y. 80; Friedlander v. Slaughter House Co. 31 La. Ann. 523; Williams v. Mechanics' Bank, 5 Blatchf. 59.

New York, Louisiana, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and Texas have no statutes making transfers invalid as does the Michigan law.

Mr. Charles F. Hammond, for appellee:

The entry of a transfer of shares of stock upon the books of a corporation is not necessary to the validity of the transferee's title, which becomes absolute upon the delivery to him of the certificates with an assignment of the shares indorsed thereon signed by the owner.

Mandlebaum v. North American Min. Co. 4 Mich. 465; McLean v. Charles Wright Medicine Co. 96 Mich. 479.

A sale, transfer, or pledge of corporate stock, although not entered upon the books of the corporation, is effectual as between the parties, and takes precedence of a subsequent levy thereon in behalf of the vendor's creditors.

1 Cook, Stock & Stockholders, §§ 486, 487; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 193 et seq.; Newberry v. Detroit & L. S. Iron Mfg. Co. 17 Mich. 141; Colebrooke, Collateral Securities, § 294.

This seems to be the rule, with some modifications, in Connecticut, Maine, Vermont, Indiana, Maryland, Wisconsin, Alabama, and California.

Fisher v. Esser Bank, 5 Gray, 373; Sabtn v. Bank of Woodstock, 21 Vt. 353; Skowhegan Bank v. Outler, 49 Me. 315; Colt v. Ives, 31 Conn. 25, 81 Am. Dec. 161; Fort Madison Lumber Co. v. Batavian Bank, 71 Iowa, 270, 60 Am. Rep. 789.

The defendant Thoman purchased the stock with full notice of the complainant's rights, having at least such notice as put him upon inquiry, which is sufficient in equity.

A court of equity will not compel a corporation to allow a transfer of stock by a purchaser at execution sale, where the price paid at such sale is so small as to shock the conscience of the court.

Grant, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question is: Does the transfer of shares in a corporation at an execution sale take precedence of a previous bona fide sale and transfer not entered on the books of the corporation? The authorities are in conflict. In 30 Am. L. Rev. 223 et seq., the decisions in the various states are collected. In that article the author argues forcibly for the execution creditor and reaches the conclusion that the weight of authority supports that theory. He, however, says: "As a theory this ground is opposed by most of the text writers, including Cook, Morawetz, Lowell, and Pomeroy." Counsel for the defendant have given us the benefit of an able and exhaustive examination of the decisions in the states where the question has arisen. We deem it unnecessary to discuss or to distinguish them. We think our own court has settled the question. Mandlebaum v. North American Min. Co. 4 Mich. 465; Newberry v. Detroit & L. S. Iron Mfg. Co. 17 Mich. 141; McLean v. Charles Wright Medicine Co. 96 Mich. 479. In the Newberry Case it was held that a transfer of stock, though unrecorded, conveys the interest of the holder, and is valid, except as against persons having equities; and a judgment creditor buying at an execution sale, with notice of the transfer, can get no better title than his creditor had. One Russell was the owner of the stock, as appeared by the books of the corporation, but had sold and transferred his shares to two other parties before Newberry's levy was made. Chief Justice Cooley said: "The levy was entirely ineffectual." Justice Campbell said: "No title passed under the execution sale, as Russell's rights had been already divested." In the Mandlebaum Case it was held that these certificates of stock were "not commercial paper, in the strict sense of the term; but . . . that the holder is entitled to every right respecting it, as against third parties, which the law confers upon the holder of commercial paper." In the McLean Case we cited with 44 L. R. A.

approval the Mandlebaum Case, and held that the transfer upon the books is not essential to the validity of the purchaser's title. An execution creditor has no prior equities, nor are we able to see that he has any existing equities in consequence of his levy. He has parted with no interest or right, and is in no worse condition by the failure of the levy than he was before. If his debtor has no title, he can acquire none by a levy and sale of land, the title to which, upon the record, stood in the debtor, but with which he had parted, or by a levy and sale of personal property in his possession, but to which he had no title. 1 Cook, Stock & Stockholders, §§ 486, 487; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 193-195.

The decree is affirmed.

1. The clerk of one branch of the legislature has no power to amend a bill which has been sent over from the other house so as to add an enacting clause without definite action by the legislative branch upon the matter.
2. A bill in which the enacting clause is not inserted by the legislature is void under a constitutional provision requiring it to contain such clause.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Rood & Hindman and E. F. Sweet, for defendant in certiorari:

The Constitution, art. 4, § 48, provides that the style of the laws shall be "The People of the State of Michigan Enact."

This constitutional provision is mandatory—its omission is fatal.

Article 6, § 35, as to the style of processes "In the Name of the People of the State of Michigan," is strikingly similar to the provision here under consideration. It has been held by this court that the omission of these constitutional words is fatal to a process, and the constitutional requirement held to be mandatory.

Forbes v. Darling, 94 Mich. 621.

To now hold the provision as to the style of laws to be merely directory when it is so nearly the provision with reference to processes, would be approaching too closely an inconsistency.

Hooker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These cases involve the validity of Act No. 76, Laws 1897, which is as follows:

An Act to Prevent Deception in the Manufacture and Sale of Imitation Butter.

Sec. 1. The people of the state of Michigan enact, that no person, by himself or his agents, or servants, shall render or manufacture, sell, offer for sale, expose for sale, or have in his possession with intent to sell, any article, product, or compound made wholly or in part out of any fat, oil, or oleaginous substance or compound thereof, not produced from unadulterated milk or cream from the same, which shall be in imitation of yellow butter produced from pure unadulterated milk or cream from the same; provided, that nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine in a separate and distinct form, and in such manner as will advise the consumer of its real character, free from coloration or ingredient that causes it to look like butter.

Sec. 2. Whoever violates any of the provisions of § 1 of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not less than $50, nor more than $500 and the costs of prosecution, or by imprisonment in the county jail, or state house of correction and reformatory at Ionia, for not less than six months nor more than three years, or by both such fine and imprisonment in the discretion of the court, for each and every offense.

Approved, April 15, 1897.

The evidence in the first-entitled cause shows that one of the defendants was convicted of the alleged offense of selling oleomargarine in contravention of this act. In the other, a complaint was made of a similar act to a justice, who refused to issue the warrant; and, on application, the circuit court denied a mandamus to compel it. The cases raise substantially the same questions, and were argued, and will be considered, together.

The validity of the law is questioned. The record shows that this was a senate bill, and passed the senate without the constitutional enacting clause. The records of the house show that the bill was reported by the committee on agriculture and by the committee of the whole without amendment, and with the recommendation that it be passed. Under the head of "Third Reading of Bills upon Passage," the record of the house shows that: "Pending the third reading of the bill, Mr. Chamberlain moved that the bill be recommended to the committee of the whole, which motion did not prevail. The bill having been read a third time, and the question being upon the passage, pending the taking of the vote Mr. Graham demanded the previous question. The question being, 'Shall the main question be now put?' the same was ordered. The bill was then passed, a majority of all the members-elect voting therefor by yeas and nays as follows: Yeas 56; nays, 19." As this is the only time the bill was before the house, we must find that the bill passed the house without an enacting clause, unless the contrary can be shown by the other evidence. Counsel undertook to show that it was amended in this particular, by the records of the senate, and the testimony of the clerk of the house. The evidence is, in brief, that previous to the passage of the bill in the house the clerk noticed the absence of the enacting clause, and brought it to the attention of the house, and said that he would enter one, and accordingly wrote the words in the original bill; i. e., the one which was then before the house. He did not testify that the house took any action upon it, or that any record was made of it. The senate record shows that the bill was subsequently returned to the senate, accompanied by a letter from the clerk of the house, reading as follows:

House of Representatives,

Lansing, April 7, 1897.

To the President of the Senate—Sir:

I am instructed by the house to return to the senate the following bill: Senate bill No. 6, file No. 24, entitled "A Bill to Prevent Deception in the Manufacture and Sale of Imitation Butter,"—and to inform the senate that the house had amended the same as follows: By inserting in line 1, § 1, after the words "Section 1," the words "The People of the State of Michigan Enact."

Very respectfully,

Lewis M. Miller,

Clerk of the House of Representatives.

In the passage of which, as thus amended, the house has concurred by a majority vote of all members-elect.

It further appears that the senate concurred in such amendment.

We must determine, therefore, whether the house is shown to have amended the bill by inserting an enacting clause, and, if not, whether the law is valid without it. The most that can be claimed is that there is oral testimony that the clerk announced its absence, and stated that he would supply it. Inferentially, perhaps, we may say that there was no objection made; but the evidence is silent as to what, if anything, occurred. There is nothing but this inference of silence which imports acquiescence in the amendment. There is nothing to show definite action by the house, which alone had power to amend the bill before it. So that, if the clause is essential to the validity of the act, we need not discuss the propriety of admitting parol evidence to prove an amendment which should be shown by the record, if one was authorized. See Atty. Gen. v. Rice, 64 Mich. 391; People, Hart, v. McElroy, 72 Mich. 446, 2 L. R. A. 609; Sackrider v. Saginaw County Supers. 79 Mich. 66. Is the constitutional enacting clause a requisite to a valid law? This must depend upon whether the constitutional provision is to be considered a mandatory provision or directory merely. See Const. art. 4, § 48. Among the authorities cited by the relator in support of his contention is that of Swann v. Buck, 40 Miss. 270. The constitutional provision is similar to ours, and it was held that a substantial compliance was sufficient. In that case the style of the resolution was "Resolved by the legislature of the state of Mississippi." The court was unable to discover a previous judicial decision of the question, but quoted Mr. Cushing to the effect that the prescribed "form . . . must be strictly pursued, and that no equivalent language will be sufficient," and, while declining to accept his rule, said: "It is necessary that every law should show on its face the authority by which it is adopted and promulgated, and that it should clearly appear that it is intended by the legislative power that enacts it that it should take effect as a law. These conditions being fulfilled, all that is absolutely necessary is expressed. The word 'resolved' is as potent to declare the legislative will as the word 'enacted.'" The case of McPherson v. Leonard, 29 Md. 377, holds that the provision of the Constitution of Maryland was directory, and that the omission of the words "by the general assembly of Maryland" did not render the law invalid. The question appears to have been treated as a new one. The case of Cape Girardeau v. Riley, 52 Mo. 427, 14 Am. Rep. 427, follows the Maryland case in holding the provision directory; the court saying that, after diligent search, no case holding to the contrary had been found. In this case, like the one before us, the entire enacting clause was wanting. In this connection we may add that previous decisions of the same court, holding the provision that writs should run in the name of the state was directory, were given weight. In our state a contrary holding will be found. See Forbes v. Darling, 94 Mich. 621. There are, however, cases which take a contrary view of the law, and adhere to the doctrine asserted by Mr. Cushing, and the late Mr. Justice Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, 5th ed. p. 93, viz.: "But the courts tread upon very dangerous ground when they venture to apply the rules which distinguish directory and mandatory statutes to the provisions of a Constitution. Constitutions do not usually undertake to prescribe mere rules of proceeding except when such rules are looked upon as essential to the thing to be done, and they must then be regarded in the light of limitations upon the power to be exercised. It is the province of an instrument of this solemn and permanent character to establish those fundamental maxims, and fix those unvarying rules, by which all departments of the government must at all times shape their conduct; and, if it descends to prescribing mere rules of order in unessential matters, it is lowering the proper dignity of such an instrument, and usurping the proper province of ordinary legislation. We are not, therefore, to expect to find in a Constitution provisions which the people in adopting it have not regarded as of high importance, and worthy to be embraced in an instrument which for a time, at least, is to control alike the government and the governed, and to form a standard by which is to be measured the power which can be exercised as well by the delegate as by the sovereign people themselves. If directions are given respecting the times or modes of proceeding in which a power should be exercised, there is at least a strong presumption that the people designed it should be exercised in that time and mode only; and we impute to the people a want of due appreciation of the purpose and proper province of such an instrument when we infer that such directions are given to any other end. Especially, when, as has been already said, it is but fair to presume that the people in their Constitution have expressed themselves in careful and measured terms, corresponding with the immense importance of the powers delegated, and with a view to leave as little as possible to implication." There are some cases, however, where the doctrine of directory statutes has been applied to constitutional provisions; but they are so plainly at variance with the weight of authority upon the precise points considered that we feel warranted in saying that the judicial decisions, as they now stand, do not sanction the application. The question arose in Washington territory, over a law fixing the seat of government, and the opinion of Cushing was quoted and followed. The Seat of Government Case, 1 Wash. Terr. 116. The case of State, Chase, v. Rogers (decided in 1875) 10 Nev. 250, 21 Am. Rep. 738, did the same. An extended discussion of the subject will be found in that case, in support of the proposition that the language of the Constitution should be literally followed. The opinion concludes with the following pertinent and emphatic language: "Our Constitution expressly provides that the enacting clause of every law shall be, 'The people of the state of Nevada, represented in senate and assembly do enact as follows: This language is susceptible of but one interpretation. There is no doubtful meaning as to the intention. It is, in our judgment, an imperative mandate of the people, in their sovereign capacity, to the legislature, requiring that all laws, to be binding upon them, shall, upon their face, express the authority by which they were enacted; and, as this act comes to us without such authority appearing upon its face, it is not a law." The case of State v. Patterson, 98 N. C. 662, is strong in its condemnation of the practice of treating constitutional requirements as directory. The case of Powell v. Jackson, 51 Mich. 130, is not in point, as the bill was duly and seasonably amended, if we may accept the statement of the briefs of the counsel and the syllabus. The trend of the weight of the authority is, in our opinion, against the relator's contention.

It is urged with some plausibility that the insertion of this provision previous to the signature by the governor is a sufficient compliance with the Constitution, from which we understand the claim to be made that, although the enacting clause was wanting when the bill came to the governor, it might have been supplied by him. But it is thought that this proposition is tenable only upon the assumption that the constitutional provision is directory merely. The governor has no power to make laws. The legislative power is in no part vested in him, being by § 1 of article 4 of the Constitution vested in the senate and house of representatives. It is not the design of the Constitution that he should legislate. His office is a check upon the legislature, and he may compel a reconsideration of a bill by seasonably returning it to the appropriate house with his objections to it; and, when the legislature has adjourned, his neglect to sign it prevents it from becoming a law, but he has not the slightest power in framing the law. Indeed, it is a fundamental principle in American Constitutions that the executive shall not make laws. The following language from the opinion in the case of State, Chase, v. Rogers, 10 Nev. 250, 21 Am. Rep. 738, is apropos to this subject: "Without the concurrence of the senate, the people have no power to enact any law. Every person at all familiar with the practice of legislative bodies is aware that one of the most common methods adopted to kill a bill, and prevent its becoming a law, is for a member to move to strike out the enacting clause. If such motion is carried, the bill is lost. Can it be seriously contended that such a bill, with its head cut off, could thereafter, by any legislative action, become a law? Certainly not. The certificates of the proper officers of the senate and assembly that such an act was passed in their respective houses do not and could not impart vitality to any act which upon its face failed to express the authority by which it was enacted." This being so, the only justification for the insertion of the enacting clause by the governor is to be found in the assumption that it is a clerical omission of an unimportant matter; and it might as well be held that one of the houses, or a clerk, or even the printer of the laws, might make the correction, as that the governor might do it.

Some of the states have sustained laws without enacting clauses, but we do not know of one that has made their validity depend upon the unauthorized action of some officer or person. They have preferred to rest their action upon the well-recognized distinction between mandatory and directory provisions. If the provision is mandatory, that the law shall have a prescribed style, and the making of laws is confined to the legislative branch of the government, it cannot be consistently held that omissions of essential parts of a law may be supplied and corrections made by persons without authority; and the public necessities should be much greater than in the present case, before such a proposition should be seriously considered. If, on the other hand, there is warrant for treating the provisions as directory, a much less dangerous precedent is established. But, as has been shown, the weight of authority forbids it; and, in our opinion, it will be an unfortunate day for constitutional rights when courts begin the insidious process of undermining constitutions by holding unambiguous provisions and limitations to be directory merely, to be disregarded at pleasure. In the present case it will be much better that the legislature shall correct its mistake, than that the court shall sanction the irregular correction in this case.

We are therefore constrained to hold that the law under discussion is void, and that in the certiorari case the order is affirmed; in that of Dettenthaler the judgment is reversed, and no new trial ordered.

ON MOTION in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to set aside an entry of satisfaction of judgment in favor of plaintiff. Denied.

The plaintiff having received the injury for which defendant was alleged to be responsible employed one Cormier, an attorney at law, to prosecute a suit for recovery. While he was still attorney of record, but, as plaintiff alleged, after he had been discharged and other attorneys substituted in his place, he entered into an agreement for satisfaction of judgment upon payment of $1,000. The money was paid by defendant to the attorney who absconded without paying it to plaintiff. Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Streeter & Walker, for plaintiff.

The compromise agreement entered into in this case by the counsel of record was fraudulent in law and void, and did not bind this unfortunate plaintiff.

Messrs. J. W. Fellows and C. F. Stone also for plaintiff.

Mr. David Cross, for defendant:

Rep. 5 Eq. 368.

The defendant is not responsible for what the plaintiff's counsel did with the money after it was paid.

If either party must suffer, the plaintiff, who has led the defendant into what he now calls a mistake, should be bound by the acts of his agent or restore the money before asking for any further hearing.

The offer of the defendant to show that the injuries to the plaintiff, if any, were occasioned wholly by her fault without any fault of the defendant, and that Cormier knew such to be the facts, should have been granted or the judgment allowed to stand.

Mr. William L. Foster, also for defendant:

The next friend of an infant plaintiff is, in theory of law, appointed by the court. This is not usually true in fact, where the party volunteering and assuming to act as next friend in the prosecution or defense of a suit stands in the relation of a parent or guardian, or other person in loco parentis.

But if a stranger appointed by the court as the next friend of an infant is bound to protect the infant's interests by the prosecution, defense, or compromise of the infant's suit, much more, it is manifest, will the parent, as the natural guardian, and in fact the best friend, of the infant, be presumed to exercise a wise discretion in that respect.

Prime v. Foote, 63 N. H. 52; Drew's Appeal, 57 N. H. 181.

Considerations like these have probably influenced courts in holding, as they do, that the natural guardian of an infant is the fittest person to sustain the relation of a prochein ami in court.

Bartlett v. Batts, 14 Ga. 539; Watson v. Fraser, 8 Mees. & W. 660; Miles v. Boyden, 3 Pick. 213; Archer v. Frowde, 1 Strange, 304.

The prochein ami, commencing his authority with the writ and declaration, can only maintain the suit for such causes of action as may be prosecuted without special demand; as for personal injuries done to the infant, or for sums of money where the writ itself is considered as the demand.

In this case, the next friend, being the father and natural guardian of the plaintiff, did not "consent to be named as next friend, in the sense of granting a request that he act in that capacity; but by voluntarily and of his own motion assuming that position, did "become personally bound for the infant's acquiescence" in the compromise made by the attorney.

Carpenter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The rights of the defendants are not affected by the plaintiff's undisclosed discharge of C. So long as she permitted him to remain her attorney of record, she was bound, as against parties ignorant, without fault on their part, of his discharge, by any act that, by virtue of his retainer, he was authorized to do. Lewis v. Sumner, 13 Met. 269. It is the constant practice of the court to enter defaults and judgments, assessments of damages, judgments for the defendant, judgment satisfied, and to make various other orders finally disposing of actions, upon the agreement of the counsel for the parties expressed orally in open court. These orders have the same effect as if made upon the personal consent of the parties. In the absence of fraud or mistake, they are conclusive. The authority of attorneys to make such agreements is, in practice, never questioned. It is essential to the orderly and convenient despatch of business, and necessary for the protection of the rights of the parties. Exigencies are frequent where the want of power on the part of the attorney to dispose of the action finally by agreement made in and under the sanction of the court would be disastrous to his client. The interests of the public and of the parties to actions alike require that executed agreements of the character in question be not disturbed, except, as in other cases, for fraud or mistake. It is not now necessary to consider the question of the extent of an attorney's authority to bind his client by agreement in pais, in collateral matters, or in what cases his executory agreements will be enforced. Daniels v. New London, 58 Conn. 156, 7 L. R. A. 563; Alton v. Gilmanston, 2 N. H. 520; Fernald v. Ladd, 4 N. H. 370; Pike v. Emerson, 5 N. H. 393, 22 Am. Dec. 468; White v. Hildreth, 13 N. H. 104; Eanson v. Hoitt, 14 N. H. 56; Bryant's Case, 24 N. H. 149; Bunton v. Lyford, 37 N. H. 44 L. R. A.

512, 75 Am. Dec. 144; Smyth v. Balch, 40 N. H. 363; Liabon v. Holton, 51 N. H. 209; Brooks v. New Durham, 55 N. H. 559; Everett v. Warner Bank, 58 N. H. 340. For the disposition of the present motion, it is enough to say that, in the absence of any limitation of his authority known, or that by reasonable inquiry might be known, by the opposite party, an attorney may by oral or written agreement, entered on the record, made an order of court, and executed by the adversary in good faith, bind his client to a final disposition of the action. That the agreement and order of court thereon effect a compromise of the client's cause of action is an immaterial circumstance. Swinfen v. Swinfen, 18 C. B. 485, 1 C. B. N. A petition for rehearing having been filed, Blodgett, J., handed down the following response:

In arriving at the conclusion that the motion must be denied, the authorities have not been overlooked which hold that an infant cannot employ an attorney or an agent, or make a valid agreement to compromise his suit (Biddell v. Dowse, 6 Barn. & C. 255; Armitage v. Widoe, 36 Mich. 124; Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 824; Tapley v. McGee, 6 Ind. 56; Wainwright v. Wilkinson, 62 Ind. 146), or those which hold that the "next friend" of an infant is not his agent or attorney, but an officer of the court, who derives his authority, not from the infant, but from the court (Guild v. Cranston, 8 Cush. 506; Tripp v. Gifford, 155 Mass. 108; Morgan v. Thorne, 7 Mees. & W. 400). However this may be, it must be conceded that rights and remedies are as much the inherent birthright of an infant as of an adult, and, if this be so, it necessarily follows from his disability to enforce such rights and remedies that the infant must have the right to enforce them through the assistance of another. By what name such other person may be called is immaterial. He may be styled, or may be in fact, the guardian, the parent, or the next friend; but, in the very nature of things, he is, and must be held to be, the representative of the infant, and to have the power to bind him by his proper and lawful acts. Among such acts is that of bringing suit for any cause of action which has accrued in the infant's favor; and for this purpose the representative may, in the exercise of an undoubted authority, employ an attorney at law in the management and control of the suit (Davis v. Merrill, 47 N. H. 208, 210, 211), which, "although attended by a next friend, is the suit of the infant" (Bartlett v. Batts, 14 Ga. 539). In such a case, the attorney becomes clothed with the ordinary powers pertaining to an attorney of record. Baltimore & O. R. Co.

v. Fitzpatrick, 36 Md. 619, 628. His authority is as extensive as it is in other cases, and the infant, through his representative, is bound by the attorney's acts within the ordinary scope of his authority the same as an adult would be, and has a like remedy against the attorney for any abuse of such authority, express or implied. The bringing of a suit in the infant's behalf being rightful, it follows, as a legal consequence, that, if judgment is properly rendered against him, he will be concluded by it (Guild v. Cranston, 8 Cush. 506, 509; Tripp v. Gifford, 155 Mass. 108), for there is no distinction between an infant and an adult with regard to the binding effect of a judgment (Smith v. McDonald, 42 Cal. 484; Ralston v. Lahee, 8 Iowa, 23, 74 Am. Dec. 298, note; Waring v. Reynolds, 3 B. Mon. 59; Wills v. Spraggins, 3 Gratt. 567; Porter v. Robinson, 3 A. K. Marsh. 254, 13 Am. Dec. 159, note; Albee v. Winterink, 55 Iowa, 184; Freeman, Judgm. 4th ed. §§ 151, 513). "He will not be permitted to dispute it, unless upon the same grounds as an adult might have disputed it, such as fraud, collusion, or error" (Freeman, Judgm. § 513); and no recognizable distinction is believed to exist between the case of an entry of judgment in regular course by an attorney of a party sui juris and the case of a like entry by an attorney properly employed by the representative of an infant to conduct the suit. The authority of attorneys of record to make entries is always presumed, if nothing appears to the contrary, and when made they are conclusive, as between the parties, in the absence of fraud or mistake; and we apprehend it makes no difference, practical or legal, whether the agreement of the counsel to make them is expressed orally in open court, and the entries are thereupon made upon the records by its order, or whether the agreement is reduced to writing by the counsel, and duly filed and entered upon the records, without being expressly brought to the court's attention, and without obtaining its sanction, which in practice is never refused, and, at most, is but the merest formality. In such a case, the assent of the court is to be presumed. In our opinion, the law in cases like the present one is correctly stated in Tripp v. Gifford, 155 Mass. 108, which recognizes the fact of an extensive practice with regard to the adjustment and settlement of such cases, and in which it is said (155 Mass. page 109): "Sometimes, but very rarely, the proposed arrangement is brought to the attention of the court, and its sanction obtained. In most instances, however, the settlement is made and the judgment entered without calling the attention of the presiding justice to it, or obtaining his approval. That such judgments conclude the minor, we have no doubt; . . . and even in equity, if a decree is rendered against him by consent without special inquiry, he will be bound by the decree.

Motion for rehearing denied.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Adelaide E. T. BUCHANAN, Appt.,

v.

George H. TILDEN, Resp't.

(158 N.Y. 109.)

A woman may sue on a contract of a third person with her husband to pay her certain moneys in the event of success in contesting a will, where the husband procured an advancement of funds for the contest, and there were strong moral and family reasons why she should be regarded as one of the heirs, although she was not legally such.

(Parker, Ch. J., and O'Brien and Gray, JJ., dissent.)

(January 24. 1899.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing a judgment of the Trial Term for New York County in her favor in an action brought to enforce defendant's contract to pay plaintiff a certain amount in consideration of services rendered by her husband in procuring a declaration of invalidity of a clause in a will. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William B. McNiece and Louis S. Phillips, for appellant:

An action lies on the part of the plaintiff to enforce the specific promise made by defendant to Robert D. Buchanan, the husband of plaintiff, in consideration of the services rendered by Robert D. Buchanan to the defendant, to pay to plaintiff or her order the sum of $50,000, upon a contingency which has happened.

The services rendered by Robert D. Buchanan to the defendant, which were concededly valuable, formed a sufficient consideration for defendant's promise.

Jefferson v. Asch, 25 L. R. A. 257, note, 53 Minn. 446; St. Mark's Church v. Teed, 120 N. Y. 583.

There can be no question about the legality of such a consideration.

Mr. Delos McCurdy, for respondent:

Dutton v. Pool, 1 Vent. 318, is a very peculiar case, and if it established the general proposition that a stranger to the promise and to the consideration could maintain an action on the contract, it would be impossible to reconcile it with adjudged cases of its own period.

1 Vin. Abr. Actions of Assumpsit, Z, pp. 333-337; 1 Comyn's Dig. note to 1st Am. from 5th Eng. ed. pp. 309, 312.

Carefully considered, the case amounts to no more than this: That the defendant having, for his own benefit and advantage, prevented the father from applying his timber to the payment of his daughter's portion, and so deprived her of that portion by his promise, that if the father would forego his purpose he himself would pay her £1,000; and the daughter having lost, in consequence of the defendant's promise, the money which but for this promise her father would have given her, and the defendant having got the timber,—the fund out of which the portion was to be paid,—this loss to her, effected by the defendant, constituted a sufficient consideration moving from her to entitle her to demand and enforce the fulfilment of the defendant's promise.

Comyn, Contr. pt. 1, chaps. 2, 10, p. 21; Bourne v. Mason, 1 Vent. 6; Crow v. Rogers, 1 Strange, 592; Pigott v. Thompson, 3 Bos. & P. 147; Bull. N. P. 134.

In Barford v. Stuckey, 2 Brod. & B. 333, Fark, J., remarks that he finds it difficult to understand the reasoning of Dutton v. Pool, or to see how the parties in that case stood.

Although there is some apparent conflict in the other cases, they will be found on examination to result in the principle that, upon a parol contract, none but the party to it,—the promisee,—or the person from whom the consideration moves, can maintain assumpsit, much less debt, in his own name. A stranger both to the promise and the consideration can maintain no action on a contract.

Griffith v. Ingledew, 6 Serg. & R. 442, 9 Am. Dec. 444, says Dutton v. Pool cannot, in all reason, be considered as having settled the law.

Taylor v. Foster, Cro. Eliz. pt. 2, p. 807;

Crow v. Rogers, 1 Strange, 592; Pine v. Morris, cited in T. Jones, 103, and Pigott v. Thompson, 3 Bos. & P. 147,—are in flat contradiction to it, while it is supported only by Bourne v. Mason, 1 Vent. 6, and Bell v. Chaplain, 1 Hardr. 321. So far from being conclusive, it does not even furnish a general rule.

It is now firmly settled in England that a mere stranger to the consideration cannot enforce performance of the contract by an action in his own name, although he is the party avowedly intended to be benefited thereby.

Tweedle v. Atkinson, 1 Best & S. 393; Jones v. Robinson, 1 Exch. 454.

In this country the uniform rule is that the plaintiff in action on a simple contract must be the person from whom the consideration of the contract actually moved, and a stranger to the consideration cannot sue on the contract.

If the judgment in the case of Dutton v. Pool can be considered as establishing the general principle that the relationship of father and child enables the child to maintain an action against a third person to enforce a promise made by that third person to the father, to give money or property to such child for a consideration supplied to the third person by the father, this principle has not been so extended as to give the same effect to any other or different relationship.

Bartlett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the close of plaintiff's case both parties moved for a directed verdict, and neither asked to go to the jury on any question. The trial judge thereupon directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The appellate division, with a divided court, reversed the judgment in plaintiff's favor entered upon the verdict, and ordered a new trial. The plaintiff has appealed from that order, stipulating for judgment absolute in case of affirmance, and presents for our determination a single question of law arising upon undisputed facts. Before stating that question, reference will be made to the material facts:

The plaintiff is the adopted daughter of Moses Y. Tilden, a brother of the late Samuel J. Tilden. The defendant is an heir at law and next of kin of Samuel J. Tilden. On the 20th day of October, 1836, the defendant began an action against the executors of the estate of Samuel J. Tilden and others praying judgment that the thirty-fifth article of Mr. Tilden's will be adjudged void, and that the property therein mentioned be declared undisposed of by any provision thereof. The defendant, being without means to prosecute this action, applied to Robert D. Buchanan, the husband of the plaintiff, for assistance in raising the funds necessary to carry on the litigation. Buchanan expressed his willingness to aid defendant, if certain arrangements were made, and said that his uncle, Robert G. Dun, might be willing to advance the money required. The defendant expressed himself as willing "to do anything in the world to raise the money,—to make any arrangement that was reasonable,"—and said to Buchanan that, if the contest was successful, Mrs. Buchanan "should come in, share alike, with the rest of them." It was evidently within the contemplation of the parties that, if this action of the defendant was successful, the result would be that, as to a very large part of his estate, Mr. Tilden died intestate, and that, while the plaintiff, as an adopted child of Moses Y. Tilden, and not of Samuel J. Tilden's blood, might take no part thereof, yet there were the strongest moral and family reasons why she should be regarded as an heir at law and next of kin. Buchanan induced Dun to make certain necessary advances, to the extent of $5,000, and Dun consented to do so solely on the ground that plaintiff was to share the fruits of a successful contest, he being unacquainted with the defendant. This portion of the money was advanced by Dun about the time defendant began his action, and he was then presented to Dun, and repeated to him the promise, in regard to plaintiff sharing alike with the rest of the heirs, that he had made to her husband.

In February, 1837, the defendant asked Buchanan if he could raise more money. Buchanan testified that, in response to this application, "I told him that I thought, before any more money was talked about, that the arrangement that had been talked about had better be whipped into line, . . . and he said they were all perfectly willing to share and share alike in that matter. I said, 'That does not satisfy me; that is not what I want; I want some positive agreement.' After considerable further talk, he said that his brothers and sisters were scattered; that he could not get it into shape just then, but that he had to have some more money, and had to have it right away, and, in order to get the money, and have it right away, he, on his own personal behalf, having nothing to do with his brothers or sisters in any sense, would obligate himself to pay personally $50,000." Thereupon defendant and Buchanan went to the office of counsel, where the following letter was drawn up, signed by defendant, and delivered by Buchanan to Dun:

New York, February 19th, 1837.

Robert G. Dun, Esq., No. 314 B'way, N. Y. City—

My Dear Sir: It is understood between Mr. R. D. Buchanan and myself that, in the event of the success of the proceeding now pending, or any which may be taken, to practically set aside the thirty-fifth section of the will of my late uncle, Samuel J. Tilden, in view of the assistance, looking to that end, which has been and may be rendered by Mr. Buchanan, as well as by yourself, that I will, and hereby do, become responsible for the payment to Mrs. Adelaide E. Buchanan, or her order, of the sum of fifty thousand dollars. It is further understood between us, that, while I am not strictly authorized to speak in behalf of my brothers and sisters in that respect, from what has already transpired between me and them, in the event of such success, they will be disposed to act generously with Mrs. Buchanan in the premises.

Yours, very resp'y,
George H. Tilden.

It will be observed that this letter, while charging defendant in a fixed sum, leaves open the general adjustment between plaintiff and defendant's brothers and sisters. After receiving this written declaration of the defendant, Dun continued his advances, until they aggregated over $20,000. A long contest followed in the courts. Defendant succeeded in his action, and he and others became entitled to a very large sum of money that the late Samuel J. Tilden supposed he had dedicated to public uses under the thirty-fifth article of his will. Dun testified that the defendant had repaid his advances; that they were collected through his attorney, but he thought an action was brought against him. Defendant paid plaintiff $8,150, on account of the $50,000, under the letter of February 19, 1887. As nothing more was paid, and plaintiff received no recognition from the heirs at law and next of kin of Mr. Tilden, she brought this action to recover the balance of the $50,000 and interest.

One of the learned judges of the appellate division thus states the question of law presented in this case: "Can a wife enforce payment in her own name, where the husband renders valuable services, and stipulates with the person to whom the same are rendered that compensation therefor shall be made, not to him, but to her?" In answering this question in the negative, the main positions of the court below may be briefly stated: While admitting that there is a distinct class of cases where promises have been made to a father, or other near relative, for the benefit of a child, or other dependent relative, in which the person for whose benefit the promise was made has been permitted to maintain an action for the breach of it, and further admitting, for argument's sake, that the duty and obligation of the husband to the wife is, as a consideration, quite equal to the duty and obligation of the father to the child, yet the fact still remains, in the case at bar, that this is not a contract looking towards the discharge of the obligation which the husband owed to support the wife, and must, therefore, be supported, if at all, upon the mere relation of husband and wife. The learned court then states that it has found no authority for holding that a promise made to the husband by a third person for the benefit of his wife, which was not intended to provide for her support, or to discharge the husband's duty in that regard, could be enforced by the wife. It is also intimated that there is no disposition to extend the principle of some of the cases relating to father and child to any other relationship. As to this latter suggestion, we do not think it will be seriously questioned, on principle, that the relation of husband and wife is fully equal to that of parent and child as a consideration to support a promise.

Before discussing this appeal in the light of the authorities, we have to say that, in our judgment, the learned appellate division have failed to give due weight to certain controlling features of this case. In the first place, the question formulated by the court below does not contain what we regard as one of the most important points disclosed by the evidence, to wit, the large equitable interest the plaintiff had in this scheme to attack the will, under the provisions of the agreement made to raise funds for that purpose. This is not the case, simply, of a husband rendering valuable services to a third party upon the latter's promise to pay the compensation, not to him, but to his wife. While this case embraces that feature, it involves the further element of the wife's joint interest in the scheme to attack the will. It may fairly be inferred, from this record, that the defendant was powerless to conduct the action he had begun unless someone furnished him the funds. This assistance was rendered by Buchanan and Dun, upon the express agreement and understanding that the plaintiff should receive, in case of success, $50,000 from defendant as part of her share of the estate, and generous treatment from his brothers and sisters. Plaintiff, in equity and good conscience, as an adopted child of Moses Y. Tilden, was entitled to come in and share with the other heirs and next of kin the large fund that had been freed from the provisions of the will. When this equitable right or interest is coupled with the relation of husband and wife, we have presented a situation that affords ample consideration for the contract sued upon,—a situation that distinguishes this case from any of the cases where the party suing upon a promise rests exclusively upon a debt or duty owed him by the promisee.

Another general feature of this case, to which we think the court below has failed to give due prominence, is the extent of the legal and moral obligation resting upon a husband to support and provide for his wife. A brief quotation from one of the opinions below will make this point clear: The court says: "It is quite true that the husband is under an obligation to support his wife, and it may be that any contract which he makes with a third party, having for its object the carrying out of that obligation, would be enforced by the courts." Then, coming to the case at bar, the court continues: "There is no obligation, legal or equitable, here, on the part of the husband towards the wife, to entitle her to the performance of this contract.

This was not a contract for her support, nor was it one to do anything which, under any circumstances, the husband could be compelled to do. It was simply an obligation on the part of the defendant to pay the plaintiff a sum of money, as an independent fortune for her separate estate, in case the husband rendered some service to him. So far as the plaintiff and her husband were concerned, as to this contract there were no legal relations between them. They occupied no different relations from that of any other man and woman," etc. [5 App. Div. 354]. It seems to us that this is an entire misconception of the duties and relations existing between man and wife. It is, in effect, said that it is only the duty of bare maintenance that is a consideration sufficient to support the promise of a third party. We are of opinion that a husband rests under other, and far higher, moral and legal obligations that the law will recognize as a sufficient consideration to support a covenant in favor of the wife. There is no evidence in this case to bear out the statement that this was not a contract for the wife's support; but, assuming that she had food, raiment, and shelter,—the necessities of life,—can it be said that these represent the full measure of the moral and legal obligations imposed upon a husband by the common law? Is it not his bounden duty, if opportunity offers, to provide for his wife against that day when he may be incapacitated by disease or removed by death? If, as in the case at bar, the husband seeks to provide for his wife, beyond the duty of furnishing food and shelter, by securing a fund to which she is equitably entitled, that may perpetuate his protecting care after he has departed this life, shall it be said that this is not an obligation that a court can recognize as a sufficient consideration to support a covenant on her behalf? We are of opinion that this broader view of the duties and obligations of a husband is to be invoked in determining the rights of this plaintiff.

We come then to a consideration of this case in the light of precedent. The court below recognized the strong equities of the plaintiff's case, and expressed regret that the action is not sustainable in her behalf. Our full discussion of the facts and the position of the court below discloses, we think, a very strong case in favor of the plaintiff maintaining this action. While it is true that for more than 200 years the courts of England and this country have been discussing the vexed question of when a party may sue upon a promise made for his benefit to a third party, yet we are of opinion that, under the peculiar facts of this case, the plaintiff can recover by invoking legal principles that are well established by authority. In order to maintain the plaintiff's cause of action, it is not necessary to invoke the principle established by Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268, and the cases that have followed it in this state, to the effect that an action lies on a promise made by the defendant upon valid consideration to a third person for the benefit of the plaintiff, although the latter was not privy to it. It will be recalled in that case one

Holly loaned the defendant, Fox, money, stating at the same time that he owed the amount to the plaintiff, Lawrence, for money borrowed, which he had agreed to pay the then next day. The defendant, in consideration of the loan to him, agreed to pay plaintiff the then next day. This court, in holding that the plaintiff, Lawrence, could enforce that promise in an action at law, established a legal principle that the courts of England have never recognized. The plaintiff in the case at bar, if driven to it, might doubtless derive aid and comfort from the doctrine laid down in Lawrence v. Fox, by parity of reasoning; but we think her case rests upon very different principles.

The first case to be considered is Dutton v. Pool, 1 Vent. 318, and 332, decided in England in the reign of Charles II. The plaintiff declared in assumpsit that his wife's father, being seised of certain lands now descended to the defendant, and being about to cut £1,000 worth of timber to raise a portion for his daughter, the defendant promised to the father, in consideration that he would forbear to fell the timber, that he would pay the daughter £1,000. After verdict for the plaintiff on nonassumpsit, it was moved in arrest of judgment that the father ought to have brought the action, and not the husband and wife. The court said: "It might be another case if the money had been to have been paid to a stranger; but there is such a nearness of relation between the father and child, and 'tis a kind of debt to the child to be provided for, that the plaintiff is plainly concerned." The judgment was affirmed in the exchequer. 2 Lev. 212. T. Raym. 303.

In one of the opinions of the appellate division in the case at bar, it is stated that Dutton v. Pool has been repudiated by the English courts in Tueddle v. Atkinson, 1 Best & S. 393. A careful examination of this latter case shows that Justice Blackburn, while attacking Dutton v. Pool, says: "We cannot overrule a decision of the exchequer chamber." Lord Mansfield said of Dutton v. Pool, 100 years later, that it was difficult to conceive how a doubt could have been entertained about the case. Martyn v. Hind, 2 Cowp. 443, 1 Dougl. 142. It has also been repeatedly followed in this state.

The learned counsel for the defendant, in an able and comprehensive brief, complains that Dutton v. Pool has on several occasions been cited to sustain the broad doctrine that a stranger to the consideration and to the promise may maintain an action on a contract. He points out that such an alleged erroneous citation appears in Schemerhorn v. Vanderheyden, 1 Johns. 139, 3 Am. Dec. 304, and that it has led to confusion in subsequent cases. We are not concerned at this time whether this is a just criticism or not, as there can be no doubt that Dutton v. Pool rests upon the nearness of the relation between father and child, and to this extent is undoubted authority.

In Shepard v. Shepard, 7 Johns. Ch. 57, 11 Am. Dec. 396, Dutton v. Pool is approved and followed, and Chancellor Kent also recognizes the principle, contended for in this case, that the consideration of natural affection, and to make sure the maintenance of a wife in case she survived her husband, is "very meritorious." There were two principal points decided by Chancellor Kent in this case; the first being that, although a deed from a husband directly to his wife is void in law, yet, where the conveyance of the husband is for the purpose of making a suitable provision for the wife "in case she should survive him," equity will lend its aid to enforce its provisions. The second point held that, where a husband conveyed land to his son for a nominal sum, on his covenanting to pay an annuity to his mother during her widowhood, the wife could sue on this covenant so made for her benefit, and that an attempted release of the son from the covenant by the husband, in his lifetime, was fraudulent and void. The learned chancellor said: "But, if the deed of 1808 was out of the question, I should then have no difficulty in declaring that the defendant was bound to pay her the stipulated annuity, or the gross sum of $400, in lieu of it, on her releasing," etc. "The relationship between husband and wife was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to her action upon the covenant to her husband, and which was made for her benefit. The consideration inured from the husband and arose from the obligations of that relation," etc. The chancellor then comments approvingly and at length upon Dutton v. Pool, points out the subsequent commendation of it by Lord Mansfield, and concludes by saying: "The same doctrine appears in the more early case of Starkey v. Will, Style, 296, and it has had the sanction, also, of Mr. Justice Buller in Marchington v. Vernon, 1 Bos. & P. 101, in notis. But it is quite unnecessary to dwell longer on this second point." While the chancellor allowed relief to the plaintiff by enforcing her deed in equity, yet he distinctly held that she had the additional remedy of an action on the covenant between her husband and the son if there were no deed, by reason of the relations and obligations of husband and wife, resting his decision squarely on the case of Dutton v. Pool.

With this case approved by Lord Mansfield, Justice Buller, and Chancellor Kent, and followed in this state, it is not of controlling importance that the doctrine of this and other early cases is said to be questioned in England at the present day. In a jurisdiction where the doctrine of Lawrence v. Fox is the settled law, there is no difficulty in sustaining, both in law and equity, the kindred principle announced in Dutton v. Pool.

It is quite impossible to follow the learned counsel on both sides of this case in the exceedingly interesting and exhaustive discussion of the questions involved, as the limits of an ordinary opinion forbid it. We shall content ourselves with the citation of but one more case. In Todd v. Weber, 95 N. Y. 181, 47 Am. Rep. 20, this court held that the relation of parent and child, even between a father and his illegitimate daughter, was a sufficient consideration for a contract made by him with the relatives of his unfortunate child to pay for her support and maintenance, and that she could enforce it by action. The learned judge writing for the court in that case, in an opinion that does honor to his heart as well as his intellect, quotes with approval Dutton v. Pool. We see no valid distinction, in principle, between the relation of parent and child and husband and wife, as affording an ample consideration for covenants inuring to the benefit of the child or wife. The relation of husband and wife has been twice recognized in this state, in cases just cited, as a sufficient consideration for supporting a covenant in the wife's favor, and amply sustains the plaintiff's cause of action in the case at bar. This court has recently held that, while the common-law rule that husband and wife are one has been to some extent abrogated by special legislation, yet there are situations where that unity still exists. Wetmore v. Wetmore, 149 N. Y. 520, 529, 33 L. R. A. 708; Bertles v. Nunan, 92 N. Y. 152, 44 Am. Rep. 361. The case before us illustrates a situation where that unity survives for the purpose of aiding the wife to enforce a covenant for her benefit made by her husband, and which equity and good conscience approve.

The appellate division refer to Durnherr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219, as a case, which, "while not directly in point, is in its controlling principles, adverse to the plaintiff's right to maintain this action." We think that case has no application to the one before us. The husband of plaintiff conveyed to the defendant certain premises, the latter covenanting to pay all encumbrances on the premises "by mortgage or otherwise." The deed declared that the wife (the plaintiff) reserved her right of dower. By the foreclosure of mortgages on the premises, existing at the time of the conveyance and in which the wife joined, her dower interest was extinguished. The wife sued on the defendant's covenant in the deed to pay all encumbrances, and sought to recover the value of her dower interest cut off by the foreclosure. This court held that the covenant was with the husband alone, as the wife was not bound to pay the mortgages, and that the joinder of the wife in the mortgages was a voluntary surrender of her right of dower for the benefit of the husband, and bound her interest to the extent necessary to protect the securities. It is perfectly clear, under this state of facts, that the husband rested under no duty to protect the wife's dower interest. There was no legal or equitable obligation which the wife could lay hold of to enable her to sue on the covenant. The court points out that it is not sufficient that the performance of a covenant may benefit a third person, but it must have been entered into for his benefit.

The case at bar is decided upon its peculiar facts. We do not hold that the mere relation of husband and wife alone constituted a sufficient consideration to enable the plaintiff to maintain this action. We deem it unnecessary to decide that question at this time. What we do hold is that the equities of the plaintiff were such that, when considered in connection with the duty of her husband to provide for her future, and, with that purpose in view, the money was procured for the defendant to institute and pursue the necessary litigation to secure the fund to which her equities related, they, all taken together, were sufficient to sustain the plaintiff's action.

The order of the Appellate Division granting a new trial, and the judgment entered thereon, should be reversed, and the original judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant affirmed, with costs in all the courts.

Haight, Martin, and Vann, JJ., concur:

Gray, J., dissenting:

I think that the order appealed from should be affirmed, and that any other doctrine than that laid down by the appellate division would be without support in principle or in the cases. The defendant needed money in order to prosecute an action to set aside certain provisions of the will of Samuel J. Tilden, deceased. He applied to the plaintiff's husband for that purpose, and the latter procured Dun to advance the money. The agreement between the defendant and the plaintiff's husband was that, in the event of the success of the action, in view of the assistance, rendered by the latter as well as by Dun, the defendant would become responsible for the payment to the plaintiff of the sum of $50,000. The action was successful, and the defendant repaid the money loaned. In addition, he gave to the plaintiff a sum of $8,500; but she has brought this action to compel the payment by the defendant of the whole sum mentioned in the agreement.

The question is whether the plaintiff had a cause of action upon the contract. It seems to me that this case is not brought within that class of cases wherein a third person is entitled to enforce a promise which has been made by one person to another, because of the absence of the essential element that some liability or duty must exist from the promisee to such third person in connection therewith. As it was held in Durnherr v. Rau, 135 N. Y. 219, the rule is that, to permit a third party to enforce such a promise, the promisee must have a legal interest that the covenant be performed in favor of the party claiming performance. How was that the case here? Could it be because of the general obligation on the part of the plaintiff's husband to support and maintain her? That, of course, is a well-recognized obligation in the law. But did the contract in question have that for its object? I cannot so regard it. It related solely to the payment of a large sum of money contingently upon the success of a certain litigation, of which the defendant was the promoter, and promised a reward or compensation to the party with whom made for his aid in furnishing the needed moneys. It is perfectly clear that this contract was not based upon marital obligations, but that it was simply a mode, suggested by the husband and adopted by both parties, for the payment by the defendant of the consideration for his (the plaintiff's husband's) services in the matter. It does not appear that the plaintiff's cause of action has any other basis than the mere fact of the marital relation. While that relation imposes strong legal and moral obligations upon the husband, it is difficult to see that they involve a liability on his part to provide a separate estate for his wife; and yet, if there is not that liability, what liability was there towards the plaintiff, which furnished the element required to exist in order that the third person, the plaintiff here, might claim the right to enforce the promise? It is not necessary that the wife should be privy to the consideration of the promise; but it is necessary that the promisee, her husband, should owe some debt or duty to her, in connection with the promise, to enable her to sue upon it.

I think that the insuperable legal objection to the plaintiff's cause of action is that the contract in question was not one which looked towards the discharge of any obligation owing by him to her, and, therefore, is not enforceable, upon the doctrine which underlies the cases where, as in the relation of parent and child, the promisee owed a duty which the contract was supposed to meet. I am prepared to admit, as it is argued, that we should recognize the obligation of the husband to support the wife to be as meritorious as the obligation of the parent to support the child, and, if this contract could be regarded in that light, I might be prepared to extend to the present case the principle of the cases referred to. But, as previously suggested, the relationship between the parties here does not help us out in endeavoring to find support for the plaintiff's cause of action, for the reason that the contract which is sought to be enforced does not bear upon the husband's obligation, and is not connected with it, but simply provides for the payment of a sum of money as a compensation for his services in the event of success. In view of the more elaborate discussion in the opinion below, I think nothing more need be said, and that the order should be affirmed.

Parker, Ch. J., and O'Brien, J., concur with Gray, J., for affirmance.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

NORTH CHICAGO STREET RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

Lemuel M. ACKLEY.

(171 Ill. 100.)

1. A decree pro confesso entered on default of defendant to a bill in chancery concludes him only as to the averments of the bill, and not as to the sufficiency of the bill itself or the averments contained in it to justify the decree.
2. A right of action for personal injuries is not assignable.
3. A contract by which a person in whose name an action is brought and to whom it belongs attempts to transfer his control over it so as to restrict him from compromising or settling the claim is not valid.

(Craig and Magruder, JJ., dissent.)

(December 22, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a decree of the Superior Court for NOTE.—Assignability of cause of action for personal injury.

- I. Summary.
- II. Classification by causes of action.
- III. In cases of insolvency and bankruptcy.
- IV. Test of assignability.
- V. Classification by states.

The general principle of law is that a cause of action for a personal injury is not assignable because it does not survive to the personal representative, but is assignable where it survives by statute. There are some cases which sustain an equitable assignment of such a cause of action to secure attorney's fees, and in some states an assignment after verdict is sustained. But upon this question there is some conflict.

In NORTH CHICAGO STREET R. Co. v. ACKLEY it is held by a majority of the court that actions for a personal injury are not assignable, and that a contract assigning to the attorney one half of such right of action to secure the fees is not valid in equity as against a settlement made with notice of the assignment. This decision in effect overrules Hawk v. Ament, 28 Ill. App. 390. The court construes Ill. Rev. Stat. chap. 3, § 123, providing that actions to recover damages for an injury to the person shall survive, and chap. 70, providing that when an injury results in death, whenever the injury is such that if the injured party had lived he would have been entitled to maintain an action, the cause of action shall survive and the action shall be brought for the benefit of the widow and next of kin, as merely saving the right of action from abatement without affecting the assignability, and holds that such a right of action is non-assignable on grounds of public policy. In this case the injury did not result in death, and the rule is well established by the former decisions of that court that in such a case on the question of survivorship chapter 3 is applicable and chapter 70 is not. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. O'Connor, 119 Ill. 586; Holton v. Daly, 106 Ill. 131.

This case therefore holds that although such a cause of action survives by statute it is non-assignable in equity. This in effect is supported 44 L. R. A.

Cook County in favor of complainant in a suit brought to recover damages from defendants for paying over to plaintiff's client money in settlement of an action against defendant in alleged violation of plaintiff's rights. Reversed.

Statement by Phillips, Ch. J.:

Appellee filed his bill against the appellant, alleging that in 1891 Mrs. Mary Butler was injured while alighting from a cable car of the defendant, by reason of the negligence of the gripman; that she employed the complainant as her attorney, upon a contingent fee, by a contract in writing, whereby he agreed to take exclusive charge of the matter, and prosecute such parties as he might deem liable for such injuries, and begin and prosecute diligently to final settlement such suits or legal proceedings as he might deem necessary; that he was to receive a sum equal to one half the gross amount recovered or received on account of such injuries, and to secure the payment of such fees. Mrs. Butler assigned to the complainant and his assigns one half of such right of action, and by Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 566, although in that case the court referred to the doctrine of survivorship, but did not discuss it. It seems that the weight of authority is against this decision.

I. Summary.

In the absence of statutory provisions as to the survival or assignment of a cause of action for a personal injury, it is generally held to be nonassignable. Francis v. Burnett, 84 Ky. 23; Renfro v. Prior, 25 Mo. App. 406; Hodgman v. Western R. Corp. 7 How. Pr. 492; Purple v. Hudson River R. Co. 4 Duer, 74; People, Stanton, v. Tloga Common Pleas, 19 Wend. 73; Lawrence v. Martin, 22 Cal. 178; Rand v. Fleischman, 6 W. N. C. 497; Stewart v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. 62 Tex. 246; Texas Mexican R. Co. v. Showalter, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 69; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wooten, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 54; Dillard v. Collins, 25 Gratt. 343; Kusterer v. Beaver Dam, 56 Wis. 471, 43 Am. Rep. 725; Milwaukee Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sentinel Co. 81 Wis. 207, 15 L. R. A. 627; Dowling v. Browne, 4 Ir. C. L. Rep. 265; Howard v. Crowther, 8 Mees. & W. 601, 5 Jur. 91; Benson v. Flower, W. Jones, 215, Cro. Car. 166; Ollwell v. Verdenhalven, 17 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 362, 26 N. Y. S. R. 116; Alexander v. Grand Ave. R. Co. 54 Mo. App. 66; Quincey v. Francis, 5 Abb. N. C. 286; Cahill v. Cahill, 9 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 241; Pulver v. Harris, 52 N. Y. 73, Aff'g 62 Barb. 500.

And the same is held even if the assignment is made after verdict. Gamble v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 80 Ga. 595; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Brunswick & W. R. Co. 87 Ga. 386; McGlinchy v. Hall, 58 Me. 152; Averill v. Longfellow, 66 Me. 237; Miller v. Newell, 20 S. C. 123, 47 Am. Rep. 833; Wade v. Orton, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 444.

In Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 566; Linton v. Hurley, 104 Mass. 353; and Stone v. Boston & M. R. Co. 7 Gray, 539,—it is held that an assignment of a cause of action for a personal injury if made before judgment was invalid. In that state such causes of action were made to survive by statute prior to these decisions. But this statute was only referred to in the case of agreed to assign, in proper legal form, in writing, upon request, one half of any verdict or judgment which might be had or recovered by reason of such accident and injury; that Mrs. Butler further agreed to pay the costs, and not to settle or compromise such claim, or have any dealings with any person in reference thereto other than such attorney; but, if the matter were settled before the suit was placed on the trial call, the fees were to be less than one half in proportion to the work done up to the date of such settlement. This contract was signed and sealed by the parties September 2, 1891. The bill then recites a collateral verbal agreement made at the same time, whereby the complainant agreed to employ associate counsel, and states that this written contract conveyed to the complainant the ownership of one half of Mrs. Butler's right of action; alleges that, relying on such assignment and covenants, the complainant hunted up witnesses, took their written statements and addresses, began a suit in September, 1891, engaged associate counsel, prepared the pleadings, watched the case when it was reached upon the first call in April, 1894, had it then marked for trial, and watched it eight days on the trial call; that on May 15, 1894, while it was on the trial call, the defendant, by one of its attorneys, called on Mrs. Butler, and assured her that, notwithstanding her previous assignment of such cause of action (of which notice to the defendant is charged), she had full power herself to release and discharge the defendant from all liability by reason of such injuries; that she owed complainant only a small amount for his services; that she might personally collect the whole amount which the company would pay; and that the company's attorneys would defend her from any suit Ackley might bring. That thereupon the company's attorneys paid her $3,750, and obtained from her a full release, together with a letter to the complainant informing him of Rice v. Stone, incidentally, as not materially affecting an assignment to a "stranger." The other cases do not discuss the question of survivorship.

The case of NORTH CHICAGO STREET R. Co. v. ACKLEY holds that a cause of action for a personal injury, although surviving by statute, is nonassignable.

But where the cause of action survives by statute it is assignable. Hawk v. Ament, 28 Ill. App. 390 (overruled in effect by NORTH CHICAGO STREET R. Co. v. ACKLEY); Gray v. McCallister, 50 Iowa, 497; Vimont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 513, 69 Iowa, 296; Hawley v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 71 Iowa, 717; Quin v. Moore, 15 N. Y. 432; Lehmann v. Farwell, 95 Wis. 185, 33 L. R. A. 333.

And where by statute it is made to survive after verdict the claim for personal injuries is assignable. Kent v. Chapel, 67 Minn. 420 (overruling Hunt v. Conrad, 47 Minn. 557, 14 L. R. A. 512); Mackey v. Mackey, 43 Barb. 58.

And a claim is assignable where the statute so provides. Bonner v. Green, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 96; Putnam v. Capps, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 610.

And some cases uphold an equitable assignment of a verdict as against a set-off. Zogbaum v. Parker, 55 N. Y. 120. Aff'g 66 Barb. 341; Nash v. Hamilton, 3 Abb. Fr. 35; Countryman v. Boyer, 3 How. Pr. 386.

And some cases uphold an equitable assignment of a verdict as against an attaching creditor. Hutchinson v. Brown, 8 App. D. C. 157; Williams v. Ingersoll, 89 N. Y. 508.

And some cases uphold an assignment before a verdict as against an attaching creditor. Schubert v. Herzberg, 65 Mo. App. 578; Patten v. Willson, 34 Pa. 299.

Since 1879 an assignment of a verdict to secure the attorney is held good in New York under the Code of Civil Procedure, § 66.

Some cases sustain an equitable assignment to the attorneys of a cause of action for personal injuries, as against a settlement. Weeks v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 73 Mich. 256.

And in such a case an assignment was sustained to the extent of the attorney's costs. Rooney v. Second Ave. R. Co. 18 N. Y. 368.

And an assignment of a cause of action for personal injuries is valid as against the assignor who settles the case. Stanton v. Thomas, 24 Wend. 70, 35 Am. Dec. 595.

act is assignable. Ludwig v. Glaessel, 34 Hun. 321. But the converse was held in McGee v. McCann, 69 Me. 79.

And an assignment of a claim for personal injuries based on a contract of a common carrier is valid. Blakeley v. Le Duc, 22 Minn. 476.

And an assignment by the King is said to be valid. 3 Vin. Abr. pp. 157, 158.

II. Classification by causes of action.

Generally.

A cause of action for personal injuries is nonassignable. Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 566; Linton v. Hurley, 104 Mass. 353; Hutchinson v. Brown, 8 App. D. C. 157; Oliwell v. Verdenhalven, 17 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 362.

And the same was said to be the rule in the following cases: Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Maher, 91 Ill. 312; Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y. 347; Zabriskie v. Smith, 13 N. Y. 322, 64 Am. Dec. 551; Byxble v. Wood, 24 N. Y. 607; Jones v. Matthews, 75 Tex. 1; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Freeman, 57 Tex. 156; Hegerich v. Keddie, 90 N. Y. 258, 52 Am. Rep. 25; St. Joseph Mfg. Co. v. Miller, 69 Wis. 389; Grant v. Ludlow, 8 Ohio St. 1; Hancock v. Caffyn, 8 Bing. 358, 1 Moore & S. 521; Beckham v. Drake, 8 Mees. & W. 846.

Injuries from railroads and common carriers.

A cause of action for personal injuries caused by a railroad or common carrier is nonassignable. Alexander v. Grand Ave. R. Co. 54 Mo. App. 66; Rand v. Fleishman, 6 W. N. C. 497; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wooten, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 54; Gamble v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 80 Ga. 595; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Brunswick & W. R. Co. 87 Ga. 386; Stone v. Boston & M. R. Co. 7 Gray, 539; Hodgman v. Western R. Corp. 7 How. Pr. 492; Purple v. Hudson River R. Co. 4 Duer, 74; Coughlin v. New York C. & H. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 448, 27 Am. Rep. 75; Stewart v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. 62 Tex. 246; Texas Mexican R. Co. v. Showalter, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 69; NORTH CHICAGO STREET R. Co. v. ACKLEY.

And the same was said to be the rule in Lamont v. Washington & G. R. Co. 2 Mackey, 502.

But some cases hold that such a claim is assignable, where by statute it survives to the personal representatives. Hawk v. Ament, 28 Ill. App. 390; Vimont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co.

the settlement, and directing him to sign a stipulation of the settlement; that on the day following, without notice to the complainant, the case was called up out of its order in the court in which it was on the trial call, and a judgment entered for $3,750, which was satisfied in open court; that the complainant has never received anything for his services; that Mrs. Butler and the railroad company refuse to pay him anything; and that she is insolvent, as he is informed and believes; that, by reason of these facts, Mrs. Butler had no legal right to receive more than one half of the money paid as compensation for such injury; and that the defendant was bound, after notice, to pay one half of whatever amount was agreed upon in settlement of such claim to the complainant, and that such right of the complainant could not be taken from him without his consent; and that there was due to the complainant from the defendant the sum of $1,875, being one half of the amount for which such settlement was made, with legal interest from May 15, 1894. The bill then prays that the defendant be decreed to pay to the complainant the amount alleged to be due, and for general relief. On June 5, 1894, the appearance of the defendant was entered; and on June 30 a default was taken against it. On September 11 the court rendered a decree that the bill be taken as confessed, and that all matters and things therein stated were true; that the equities were with the complainant; that the court had jurisdiction of and over all the parties thereto, and the subject-matter therein; and that there was due and owing from the defendant to the complainant the sum of $1,875, being one half of the sum of $3,750, which was paid to Mary Butler by the defendant, as alleged in the bill; and, on motion of the complainant, it was ordered and decreed that the complainant have and recover from the defendant the sum of $1,875, together with costs of suit. A motion was

And it is held assignable in equity to the extent of costs. Rooney v. Second Ave. R. Co. 18 N. Y. 368.

Malicious prosecution and false imprisonment.

A cause of action for malicious prosecution or false imprisonment is nonassignable. Francis v. Burnett, 84 Ky. 23; Hunt v. Conrad, 47 Minn. 557, 14 L. R. A. 512 (overruled in Kent v. Chapel, 67 Minn. 420); Lawrence v. Martin, 22 Cal. 173.

And the same was said to be the rule in the following cases: Hudson v. Pleats, 11 Paige, 180; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Read, 87 Va. 185; Butler v. New York & E. R. Co. 22 Barb. 110; Lamphere v. Hall, 26 How. Pr. 509; Wright v. First Nat. Bank, 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 87; Dayton v. Fargo, 45 Mich. 153.

But an assignment of such a claim is held to be valid where it survives by statute. Gray v. McCallister, 50 Iowa, 407.

And so where it survives by statute after verdict. Mackey v. Mackey, 48 Barb. 58.

And an equitable assignment is valid where by statute an attachment is subject to claims. Patten v. Wilson, 34 Pa. 299.

And an equitable assignment to secure an attorney's claim was held valid. Williams v. Ingersoll, 89 N. Y. 508; Zogbaum v. Parker, 55 N. Y. 120, Affirming, 66 Barb. 341. (Assignment after verdict.)

Libel and slander.

A cause of action for libel and slander is not assignable. Renfro v. Pryor, 25 Mo. App. 402; Millard v. Collins, 25 Gratt. 349; Milwaukee Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sentinel Co. 81 Wis. 207, 15 L. R. A. 627 (libel of a corporation); Benson v. Flower, W. Jones, 215, Cro. Car. 166, 176; Quincey v. Francis, 5 Abb. N. C. 286; Wade v. Orton, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 444.

And the same was said to be the rule in the 44 L. R. A.

following cases: North v. Turner, 9 Serg. & R. 244; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Read, 87 Va. 185; Butler v. New York & E. R. Co. 22 Barb. 110; Lamphere v. Hall, 26 How. Pr. 509; Howard v. Crowther, 8 Mees. & W. 601, 5 Jur. 91; Hudson v. Pleats, 11 Paige, 180; Drake v. Beckham, 11 Mees. & W. 315, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 486, 7 Jur. 204; Gibson v. Gibson, 43 Wis. 23, 28 Am. Rep. 527; Dahms v. Sears, 13 Or. 47; Wright v. First Nat. Bank, 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 87.

But an equitable assignment to secure the attorney's claim was held valid in Nash v. Hamilton, 3 Abb. Pr. 85; Weeks v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 73 Mich. 256.

Assault and battery.

A cause of action for an assault is nonassignable. McGlinchy v. Hall, 58 Me. 152; Averill v. Longfellow, 66 Me. 237; Cahill v. Cahill, 9 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 241; Pulver v. Harris, 52 N. Y. 73.

And the same was said to be the rule in the following cases: Lamphere v. Hall, 26 How. Pr. 509; Gardner v. Adams, 12 Wend. 297; Brewer v. Dew, 11 Mees. & W. 625, 1 Dowl. & L. 383, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 448, 7 Jur. 953; Hudson v. Pleats, 11 Paige, 180; Drake v. Beckham, 11 Mees. & W. 315, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 486, 7 Jur. 204; Dahms v. Sears, 13 Or. 47; Wright v. First Nat. Bank, 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 87; Dayton v. Fargo, 45 Mich. 153; North v. Turner, 9 Serg. & R. 244; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Read, 87 Va. 185; Butler v. New York & E. R. Co. 22 Barb. 110.

But such a claim was held to be assignable where it survives by statute. Kent v. Chapel, 67 Minn. 420.

And an equitable assignment was held valid. Schubert v. Herzberg, 65 Mo. App. 578.

And the same was held as against a set-off. Countryman v. Boyer, 3 How. Pr. 386.

Seduction.

A cause of action for seduction does not pass by an assignment. Howard v. Crowther, 8 Mees. & W. 601, 5 Jur. 91; People, Stanton, v. Tloga Common Pleas, 19 Wend. 73.

But is good against assignor. Stanton v. Thomas, 24 Wend. 70, 35 Am. Dec. 595.

And the same was said to be the rule in the following cases: Brewer v. Dew, 11 Mees. & W. 625, 1 Dowl. & L. 383, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 448, 7 Jur. 953; Drake v. Beckham, 11 Mees. & W.

made by the defendant to set aside the decree, and for leave to file an answer at its cost, which was supported by affidavit, to the effect that the defendant had a defense to the bill upon the merits to the whole of the complainant's demand, which motion was denied by the court. The defendant (appellant here) appealed to the appellate court of the first district, where the decree of the trial court was affirmed, and it prosecutes this appeal.

Messrs. Egbert Jamieson and John A. Rose, for appellant:

A right of action for personal injuries is not assignable.

Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Maher, 91 Ill. 314; Norton v. Tuttle, 60 Ill. 134; Prosser v. Edmonds, 1 Young & C. Exch. 481; Illinois Land & Loan Co. v. Speyer, 138 Ill. 145; Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 568; Linton v. Hurley, 104 Mass. 353; Coughlin v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 446, 27 Am. Rep.

815, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 486, 7 Jur. 204; Butler v. New York & E. R. Co. 22 Barb. 110.

But a grant by the King of a cause of action for ravishment of ward is valid. 8 Vin. Abr. 157.

Causing death.

A cause of action for death caused by negligence surviving by statute is assignable. Quin v. Moore, 15 N. Y. 432.

So, in case of action under civil damage laws for death of an intoxicated person. Ludwig v. Glaessel, 84 Hun. 312.

Highway.

A cause of action for injuries from a defective highway is not assignable. Kusterer v. Beaver Dam, 56 Wis. 471, 43 Am. Rep. 725.

Civil damage act.

A cause of action under the civil damage act is not assignable. McGee v. McCann, 69 Me. 79.

But in Ludwig v. Glaessel, 84 Hun. 312, the converse was held.

Breach of promise to marry.

In Drake v. Beckham, 11 Mees. & W. 815, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 486, 7 Jur. 204; Lattimore v. Simmons, 13 Serg. & R. 183; and Zabriskie v. Smith, 13 N. Y. 322, 64 Am. Dec. 551,—a cause of action for breach of promise is said to be nonassignable.

For the particular facts in the above cases, see sub1. V. Classification by states.

III. In cases of insolvency and bankruptcy.

A cause of action for a personal injury does not pass to an assignee for the benefit of creditors. Francis v. Burnett, 84 Ky. 23; Dowling v. Browne, 4 Ir. C. L. Rep. 265; Stone v. Boston & M. R. Co. 7 Gray. 539.

See also Anoka Lumber Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 63 Minn. 286, 30 L. R. A. 689, infra, V. among Minnesota cases.

And the same was said to be the rule in the following cases: Lattimore v. Simmons, 13 Serg. & R. 183; North v. Turner, 9 Serg. & R. 244.

And it does not pass to a receiver. Milwaukee Mut. E. Ins. Co. v. Sentinel Co. 81 Wis. 207, 15 L. R. A. 627.

And the same was said to be the rule in Hudson v. Piets, 11 Paige, 180, 44 L. R. A.

75; Oliwell v. Verdenhalven, 26 N. Y. S. R. 116, 17 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 362; Averill v. Longfellow, 66 Me. 237; Swanston v. Morning Star Min. Co. 13 Fed. Rep. 216; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Brunswick & W. R. Co. 87 Ga. 388; Hunt v. Conrad, 47 Minn. 557, 14 L. R. A. 512; Greenhood, Pub. Pol. p. 474; Lewis v. Lewis, 15 Ohio, 715; Boardman v. Thompson, 25 Iowa, 487; Elwood v. Wilson, 21 Iowa, 523.

The agreement sought to be enforced is maintainous and champertous.

Thompson v. Reynolds, 73 Ill. 13; Phillips v. South Park Comrs. 119 Ill. 636; Norton v. Tuttle, 60 Ill. 134; De Hoghton v. Money, L. R. 2 Ch. 169; Key v. Vattier, 1 Ohio, 138; Goodrich v. Tenney, 44 Ill. App. 331; Gillett v. Logan County Supers. 67 Ill. 261; Sprye v. Porter, 7 El. & Bl. 58; Powell v. Knowler, 2 Atk. 224.

The agreement in question is not an assignment of any portion of the fund expected to be recovered, but is a mere promise to pay

And it does not pass to an assignee in bankruptcy. Rand v. Fleishman, 6 W. N. C. 497; Dillard v. Collins, 25 Gratt. 343; Howard v. Crowther, 8 Mees. & W. 601, 5 Jur. 91; Benson v. Flower, W. Jones, 215, Cro. Car. 166; Noonan v. Orton, 84 Wis. 259, 17 Am. Rep. 441.

And the same was said to be the rule in the following cases: Hancock v. Caffyn, 8 Bing. 358, 1 Moore & S. 521; Beckham v. Drake, 8 Mees. & W. 846; Brewer v. Dew, 11 Mees. & W. 625, 1 Dowl. & L. 883, 7 Jur. 953, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 448; Drake v. Beckham, 11 Mees. & W. 815, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 486, 7 Jur. 204; Wright v. First Nat. Bank, 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 87; North v. Turner, 9 Serg. & R. 244.

IV. Test of assignability.

In the following cases the rule is laid down that such causes of action only are assignable as survive to the personal representative: Dayton v. Fargo, 45 Mich. 153; Final v. Backus, 18 Mich. 218; Grant v. Ludlow, 8 Ohio St. 1; North v. Turner, 9 Serg. & R. 244; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Freeman, 57 Tex. 156; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Read, 87 Va. 185; Comegys v. Vasse, 1 Pet. 193, 7 L. ed. 108; Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y. 847; Zabriskie v. Smith, 13 N. Y. 322, 64 Am. Dec. 551; Byrble v. Wood, 24 N. Y. 607; Hegerich v. Keddle, 99 N. Y. 258, 52 Am. Rep. 25; Butler v. New York & E. R. Co. 22 Barb. 110; Hutchinson v. Brown, 8 App. D. C. 157; Gray v. McCallister, 50 Iowa, 497; Hawley v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 71 Iowa, 717; Vimont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 513; Kent v. Chapel, 67 Minn. 420; Alexander v. Grand Ave. R. Co. 54 Mo. App. 66; Purple v. Hudson River R. Co. 4 Duer, 74; Mackey v. Mackey, 43 Barb. 58; Quin v. Moore, 15 N. Y. 432; Miller v. Newell, 20 S. C. 123, 47 Am. Rep. 833; Stewart v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. 62 Tex. 246; Texas Mexican R. Co. v. Showalter, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 69; Putnam v. Capps, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 610; Milwaukee Mut. E. Ins. Co. v. Sentinel Co. 81 Wis. 207, 15 L. R. A. 627; Lehmann v. Farwell, 95 Wis. 185, 37 L. R. A. 333; Dinlany v. Fay, 38 Barb. 18; Robinson v. Weeks, 6 How. Pr. 161; Meech v. Stoner, 19 N. Y. 29; Fried v. New York C. R. Co. 25 How. Pr. 285; Tyson v. McGuineas, 26 Wis. 656.

But in NORTH CHICAGO STREET R. Co. v. ACKLEY the court refuses to consider the survivability of a cause of action as the sole test of its assignability.

"a sum equal to one half of the gross amount recovered or received"; a promise which gives no lien in equity upon the fund.

Bromwell v. Turner, 37 Ill. App. 563; Story v. Hull, 143 Ill. 506; Trist v. Child, 21 Wall. 441, 22 L. ed. 623; Lamont v. Washington & G. R. Co. 2 Mackey, 507, 47 Am. Rep. 268; Christmas v. Russell, 14 Wall. 70, 20 L. ed. 762; Kusterer v. Beaver Dam, 56 Wis. 475, 43 Am. Rep. 725; Rogers v. Hosack, 18 Wend. 319; Hoyt v. Story, 3 Barb. 262; Christmas v. Griswold, 8 Ohio St. 558; Ford v. Garner, 15 Ind. 298; Coughlin v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 447, 27 Am. Rep. 75; Humphrey v. Browning, 46 Ill. 485, 95 Am. Dec. 446.

Mr. L. M. Ackley, in propria persona:

All causes of action which, by statute or common law, survive, are assignable by act of the law, and therefore, by act of the party, subject, of course, to the requirements of public policy.

North v. Turner, 9 Serg. & R. 244; Final

In the cases of Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 566, Linton v. Hurley, 104 Mass. 363, and Stone v. Boston & M. R. Co. 7 Gray, 539, which deny the assignability, a statute existed which provided that causes of action for personal injuries shall survive. This statute was only referred to in the case of Rice v. Stone, the court saying that "we do not consider this as materially affecting the question whether such rights of action may be assigned to a stranger."

V. Classification by states.

California.

An assignment of a cause of action for malicious prosecution before trial is invalid as against the defendant's right of set-off of execution against plaintiff. Lawrence v. Martin, 22 Cal. 173.

District of Columbia.

An assignment of the judgment in a suit for personal injuries is superior to an attachment subsequently levied. Hutchinson v. Brown, 8 App. D. C. 157. This was on the ground that the claim for damages ripened into a judgment on the rendition of the verdict, although the judgment was prematurely entered, and this result was reached by giving effect in equity to an assignment of a possibility capable of enforcement as a charge upon a subsequent judgment.

It was held here that the test of assignability is the right of survivorship.

In Lamont v. Washington & G. R. Co. 2 Mackey, 502, 47 Am. Rep. 268, it was said that a claim for personal injuries received in being ejected from the cars is incapable of being assigned in whole or in part to the attorney.

Georgia.

Georgia Code, § 2244, providing that all choses in action arising upon contract may be assigned so as to vest the title in the assignee, excludes by implication the assignability of other choses in action for personal injuries. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Brunswick & W. R. Co. 87 Ga. 386; Gamble v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 80 Ga. 595.

And in the latter case the cause of action is held not assignable even after verdict before entry of judgment.

Illinois.

A cause of action for personal injuries is not assignable. NORTH CHICAGO STREET R. CO. v. ACKLEY.

In this case the defendant, having notice of 44 L. R. A.

v. Backus, 18 Mich. 218; Brady v. Whitney, 24 Mich. 154; Grant v. Smith, 26 Mich. 201; Jackson v. Daggett, 24 Hun, 204.

This proposition has been held good as applied to causes of action to recover damages for personal injuries in at least five states where, by statute, such causes of action are made to survive.

Lehmann v. Farwell, 95 Wis. 185, 37 L. R. A. 333; Purple v. Hudson River R. Co. 4 Duer, 74; Final v. Backus, 18 Mich. 218; Stewart v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. 62 Tex. 246; Hawk v. Ament, 23 Ill. App. 390; Bromwell v. Turner, 37 Ill. App. 561; Zogbaum v. Parker, 66 Barb. 341, Affirmed in 55 N. Y. 120; Ludwig v. Glaessel, 34 Hun, 312; Patten v. Wilson, 34 Pa. 299; Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Brady, 39 Neb. 27; Whittaker v. New York & H. R. Co. 3 N. Y. S. R. 537; Winslow v. Central Iowa R. Co. 71 Iowa, 197; Hawley v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 71 Iowa, 717; Rooney v. Second Ave. R. Co. 18 N. Y. 368; Dunne v. Herrick, 37 Ill.

the attorney's claim under an assignment of "one half of the right of action" to secure a fee equal to one half of the amount to be recovered, was held not liable to the attorney in a suit in equity where he settled with the plaintiff.

But in Hawk v. Ament, 23 Ill. App. 390, it was held that an agreement that attorneys should have one half of the judgment to be recovered in an action for personal injuries caused by a railroad company amounts to an equitable assignment, and an assignment of the judgment to another person before the cause is affirmed on appeal is subject to the attorney's claim.

This decision is in effect overruled by NORTH CHICAGO STREET R. CO. v. ACKLEY, although not referred to in the prevailing opinion.

In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Maher, 91 Ill. 312, it was said that a cause of action for an injury to the person of another is not assignable, so as to pass the right of action to the assignee.

Iowa.

Iowa Code, § 2525, provides that all causes of action shall survive, and may be brought notwithstanding the death of the person entitled or liable to the same.

Under this statute a cause of action for malicious prosecution is assignable. Gray v. McCallister, 50 Iowa, 497.

So, a cause of action for personal injuries received from a railroad is assignable. Hawley v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 71 Iowa, 717; Vimont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 513.

In the latter case the assignment was executed in another state where the common law was in force, but was held assignable because such a claim constituted a part of the assignor's estate and at his death would have descended to his representatives, under Iowa Code, §§ 2525-2527.

Kentucky.

Kentucky Gen. Stat. chap. 10, provides that no right of action for personal injuries to real or personal estate shall cease or die with the person injuring or the person injured, except actions for assault and battery, slander, criminal conversation, and so much of the action for malicious prosecution as is intended to recover for the personal injury.

Under this statute the right of a debtor to sue for the malicious prosecution of an attachment does not pass to an assignee for the benefit of creditors, as such cause of action does not survive to the personal representative. Francis v. Burnett, 84 Ky. 23.

App. 180; Weeks v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 73 Mich. 256; Guliano v. Whitenack, 9 Misc. 562; Rasquin v. Knickerbocker Stage Co. 21 How. Pr. 293.

It is not against public policy for the client to assign part or all of the subject-matter of the litigation, or of the cause of action, to the attorney to secure payment of his fees for enforcing it, as in the case at bar.

Anderson v. Radcliffe, El. Bl. & El. 806; Wood v. Downes, 18 Ves. Jr. 120; Patten v. Wilson, 34 Pa. 299; Hauck v. Ament, 28 Ill. App. 390; Phillips v. Edsall, 127 Ill. 535; Schubert v. Herzberg, 65 Mo. App. 578; Smith v. Young, 62 Ill. 210; West Chicago Park Comrs. v. Coleman, 108 Ill. 591; Torrence v. Shedd, 112 Ill. 466; Dunne v. Herrick, 37 Ill. App. 180; Winslow v. Central Iowa R. Co. 71 Iowa, 197; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1020, note 1; Huber v. Johnson, 68 Minn. 74; Anderson v. Friend, 71 Ill. 477.

The appellant cannot defend against this claim on the ground that the contract between Mrs. Butler and her attorney was champertous, because a defense of champerty can be made only by the client when sued by the attorney.

Torrence v. Shedd, 112 Ill. 466; Omaha & R. Valley R. Co. v. Brady, 39 Neb. 27; Patten v. Wilson, 34 Pa. 299; Pennsylvania Co. v. Lombardo Co. 49 Ohio, 1, 14 L. R. A. 785; Purdy v. Nova Scotia Midland R. & Iron Co. 8 Misc. 510; Noble v. Thompson Oil Co. 79 Pa. 354, 21 Am. Rep. 66.

Appellant's payment of the entire judgment to Mrs. Butler after notice of the assignment, in equity, of half of it to appellee, with the fraudulent intent (which is admitted on this record) of depriving the assignee of his fee, clearly establishes its liability.

Winslow v. Central Iowa R. Co. 71 Iowa, 197; Bower v. Hadden Blue Stone Co. 30 N. J. Eq. 171; Bartlett v. Woodbine Sav. Bank, 57 Ill. App. 429; Rolfe v. Gregory, 11 Jur.

Maine.

The application of the doctrine of survivorship does not appear to have been noticed in this state, and no statute is referred to on that question in the decisions.

An assignment of a cause of action for a personal assault cannot be made before final judgment. McGlinchy v. Hall, 58 Me. 152; Averill v. Longfellow, 66 Me. 237.

In the latter case the plaintiffs made a verbal assignment before suit to secure counsel fees, and after a verdict notice was given to the defendant.

Under Me. Stat. 1872, chap. 63, § 4, providing that an action may be maintained against any person who shall by selling or giving any intoxicating liquor, or otherwise, have caused or contributed to the intoxication of such person, a cause of action for selling liquor to plaintiff's minor son, who was run over by a train while he was intoxicated, is not only a tort but a personal wrong and injury, as much so as that of an assault and battery, and is not assignable. McGee v. McCann, 69 Me. 79.

Massachusetts.

In this state by an early statute an action for a personal injury survives; but notwithstanding this such a claim is not assignable before judgment. The only case which appears to refer to this statute is Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 566, which says: "There cannot be the same objection to the transmission of such a claim to executors and administrators as to its assignment to strangers; and by our recent legislation, actions for damage to the person survive; but we do not consider this as materially affecting the question whether such rights of action may be assigned to a stranger."

A claim for damages for a personal injury is not assignable before judgment. Linton v. Hurley, 104 Mass. 353; Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 566.

In the latter case the court said one reason why such assignments are invalid at common law is to avoid maintenance, and another reason is that they are void unless the assignee has actually or potentially the thing which he attempts to assign, and the character of such claims is not changed by a verdict before judgment. And the court said: "It is said in Langford v. Ellis, 14 East, 203, note, that the moment the verdict comes the damages are liquidated. This was an action of slander. But the principal case of Ex parte Charles, 14 East, 17, 1 44 L. R. A.

Rose, Bankr. 372, 16 Ves. Jr. 256, in which the other was cited, is regarded as overturning it. Buss v. Gilbert, 2 Maule & S. 70. And these cases hold that neither an action for a breach of promise of marriage nor for seduction passes to an assignee in bankruptcy before judgment."

A cause of action for injuries sustained by a passenger against a common carrier does not pass by an assignment made before judgment, under Mass. Stat. 1838, chap. 163, § 5, providing that such an assignment for creditors vests in the assignees all the property of the debtor both real and personal, and all debts due to the debtor or to any person for his use, and all liens and securities therefor, and all his rights of action for any goods or estates, real or personal. Stone v. Boston & M. R. Co. 7 Gray, 539.

In this case it was said that an action for damages to the person is not property, nor a right of property, nor a debt until it is reduced to a judgment.

Michigan.

An agreement between attorneys and client that they were to be paid from the proceeds of the judgment which should be obtained in an action for libel operated as an assignment of the judgment to be obtained, and prevented a discharge of the judgment by the plaintiff. Weeks v. Wayne Circuit Judges, 73 Mich. 256.

The court does not discuss the question, but says that the equitable right of all parties, including attorneys, must be respected in settling cases.

In Dayton v. Fargo, 45 Mich. 153, it was said that Mich. Comp. Laws, § 5823, provides that in addition to the actions which survive by the common law, the following also survive, that is to say actions of replevin and trover, actions for assault and battery or false imprisonment, or for goods taken and carried away, and actions for damages done to real or personal estate. And the court said that only such actions for torts as survive to the personal representative of the injured party can be sued for by an assignee.

In Final v. Backus, 18 Mich. 218, it was said that the general rule is that a right of action for a tort is not the subject of assignment; but this rule applies only to those torts which are merely personal, and which on the death of the person wronged die with him; that generally all such rights of action for tort that would survive to the personal representative may, it seems, be assigned, so as to pass an interest to the assignee which he can enforce by suit at law.

Minnesota.

After verdict a cause of action for a personal injury is assignable and a cause of action for injuries where the action is on a contract of common carrier is assignable.

Minnesota Stat. 1878, chap. 66, § 41, provides that after the verdict of a jury, decision or finding of a court or report of a referee, in an action for a wrong, such action shall not abate by the death of any party.

Under this statute a cause of action for personal injuries from an assault is assignable after verdict. Kent v. Chapel, 67 Minn. 420.

In this case it was said that the decision in Hunt v. Conrad, 47 Minn. 557, 14 L. R. A. 512, seems to have been based upon what was considered by the court to be principles of the common law, and its attention evidently was not called to this statute, to which the common law is unapplied in that case is inapplicable.

In Hunt v. Conrad, 47 Minn. 557, 14 L. R. A. 512, it was held that a cause of action for false imprisonment is not assignable after verdict before judgment.

A cause of action against a ferry company for negligence resulting in the death of a passenger on the defendant's stagecoach, based on contract, was held to be assignable before judgment, as the right of action accrued when the defendant broke his contract, and was personal property. Blakeley v. Le Duc, 22 Minn. 476.

An assignment by a corporation under the insolvent law did not pass to the assignee any right under a casualty insurance policy for injuries suffered by an employee who had not at that time brought suit for his injuries. Anoka Lumber Co. v. Fidelity & C. Co. 63 Minn. 286, 30 L. R. A. 689.

In this case judgment was rendered in favor of the employee against the employer for the personal injury, and in an action on the judgment by the employer against the insurance company the employee garnished the insurance company and then intervened in the suit.

Missouri.

There appears to be some conflict of authority in this state on the question of an equitable assignment of a cause of action for a personal injury, the latest case sustaining such an assignment as against an attachment.

Where an assignment of a cause of action 44 L. R. A.

based on an assault and battery, and of the judgment thereon to be obtained, was made to secure the attorneys their fees, it was held that the assignment of the cause of action was of no validity, but it was valid as to the judgment thereafter entered. It was further held that under a contract for compensation that the attorneys should have 40 per cent of the judgment which the plaintiff might obtain, the attorneys were to be treated as equitable assignees of so much of that judgment, and entitled to a preference over a garnishment subsequently attached. Schubert v. Herzberg, 65 Mo. App. 578.

But a written contract with attorneys for one half of a judgment to be obtained for injuries received by a passenger on a street railroad was held invalid as an assignment. Alexander v. Grand Ave. R. Co. 54 Mo. App. 66.

This was on the ground that there can be no assignment of a part of a chose in action without the consent of the debtor, and because such a cause of action does not survive.

In this case it was held that a contract for a portion of the judgment to be recovered in a personal injury case was not an equitable assignment of a portion of the claim, where the claim was an unliquidated one.

It was also said that Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 4426, allows such actions to survive the death of the "plaintiff"; but that in this case it is not necessary to say whether such a right of survivorship would make the cause of action assignable, as in this state there can be no assignment of a part of a claim without the consent of the debtor.

And where a judgment in an action for slander was assigned and then reversed on appeal, and judgment given for the original plaintiff on a new trial, it was held that the recovery, being for the assignee's benefit, was "a recovery by an assignee of an unassignable cause of action, and it cannot stand." Renfro v. Prior, 25 Mo. App. 402.

It was also held that Mo. Rev. Stat. § 3671, providing for the continuance of a cause of action in the name of the original party if the transferee indemnified him against costs and damages, adds nothing to the rights of the assignee, but is merely permissive. The effect of this decision is that a void assignment confers no right on the assignee, and yet deprives the assignor of all his rights of action, a conclusion which appears illogical.

These cases are in effect overruled, though

New York.

The assignment of a cause of action for personal injuries will not authorize an action by the assignee, and such an assignment is defeated by a settlement before verdict, and in some cases by a settlement after verdict. But some cases sustain an equitable assignment of such a cause of action, as securing the attorney's costs, and as defeating an attachment or set-off. Some cases sustain an assignment of the verdict. The assignment is valid if the cause of action survives by statute. It seems that a claim under the civil damage act may be assigned. Since 1879, under the Code of Civil Procedure, § 66, an attorney has a lien for his fee on the cause of action, which lien attaches to the verdict, and it seems may be protected by an assignment.

An assignee of a cause of action for personal injuries caused to a passenger on a railroad train cannot maintain an action in his own name. Hodgman v. Western R. Corp. 7 How. Pr. 492; Purple v. Hudson River R. Co. 4 Duer, 74.

In the first case this was based upon the ground that such a right of action does not survive upon death. The complaint alleged a contract for reward to carry safely, and that the party was injured, and she assigned to plaintiff the cause of action.

In the latter case the court said that the test of assignability is the right of survivorship, and that the personal injuries were the gravamen of the suit, and that the contract was stated merely by way of inducement as aggravating the negligence.

And a settlement of a case before verdict defeats a prior assignment to the plaintiff's attorney of such a cause of action for a personal injury. Coughlin v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 443, 27 Am. Rep. 75 (injuries on a railroad); Quincey v. Francis, 5 Abb. N. C. 286 (libel); Cahill v. Cahill, 9 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 241 (assault and battery); Pulver v. Harris, 52 N. Y. 73, affirming 62 Barb. 500 (assault and battery); Ollwell v. Verdenhalven, 17 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 362, 26 N. Y. S. R. 116 (injuries caused by tenement house).

servant); Wade v. Orton, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 444 (slander).

In Williams v. Ingersoll, 89 N. Y. 508, it was said that in People, Stanton, v. Tloga Common Pleas, 19 Wend. 73, it was decided that a chose in action for a tort merely personal is not assignable, so that a court of law will protect the assignee against a subsequent fraudulent discharge of the damages recovered in a suit prosecuted for such tort, although the tortfeasor accepted the discharge with full knowledge of the assignment; but that the remedy of the assignee is by action against the assignor for breach of his express or implied undertaking not to do anything in the matter to prejudice the assignee, and that the adjudication was that the assignment was invalid in law, although Judge Cowen remarked that "neither law nor equity recognizes such a transfer." The court says that if the learned judge meant that equity would not recognize such a transfer as attaching to the judgment recovered, it was error, for there the court held that the assignor was liable to the assignee for a breach of the assignment. The court further said that it would seem to be reasonably clear that if such an assignment would be so far binding upon the assignor as to make him liable for defeating its operation, it should be binding upon the debtor after he has notice of it and after the recovery of the judgment.

It will be noticed that all the cases above that were settled after verdict occurred before 1879. Since 1879 under the Code of Civil Procedure, § 66, providing that the compensation of an attorney or counselor for his services is governed by an agreement, express or implied, which is not restrained by law, and that from the commencement of an action the attorney has a lien upon his client's cause of action which attaches to a verdict, report, decision, or judgment in his client's favor, and cannot be affected by any settlement between the parties before or after judgment, an attorney has a lien for his services which may be regulated by an agreement and which cannot be defeated after verdict by any settlement between the parties without his consent.

It was held that a settlement should be vacated to secure costs of attorneys having an equitable assignment of a cause of action for personal injuries. Rooney v. Second Ave. R. Co. 18 N. Y. 368 (injury from a street car).

And some cases hold that an equitable assign-

An assignment of part or all of a cause of action or the fund to be realized therefrom to the attorney who is employed to enforce it, made by way of security for the payment of his fees as such, is not against public policy, and such assignments are approved and enforced by the courts.

Appellant's payment of the whole judgment during suit of a cause of action for personal injuries is superior to an attachment. Williams v. Ingersoll, 89 N. Y. 508 (malicious prosecution).

And an equitable assignment of a verdict has been held to be superior to the defendant's right to set off a judgment or execution. Zogbaum v. Parker, 55 N. Y. 120, Affirming 66 Barb. 341 (false imprisonment); Nash v. Hamilton, 3 Abb. Pr. 35 (slander); Countryman v. Boyer, 3 How. Pr. 386 (assault and battery); Mackey v. Mackey, 43 Barb. 58 (false imprisonment).

Under 2 N. Y. Laws 1857, 552, 553, § 121, providing that after the recovery of a "verdict" in actions for personal injuries, the action may proceed after the death of the party in the same manner as where the cause of action previously survived by law, an assignment to an attorney of a verdict for false imprisonment together with the judgment to be entered, is valid and superior to the defendant's right to set off another judgment acquired by him before verdict. Mackey v. Mackey, 43 Barb. 58, Overruling Brooks v. Hanford, 15 Abb. Pr. 342, which held that an assignment after verdict to secure the attorney's fees could not defeat the right of the defendant to use a judgment as a set-off.

This appears to be the only decision applying this statute to an assignment of a cause of action for personal injuries. Prior to 1881 this statute was limited to cases where the verdict was upheld. In matters of survivorship the present Code of Civil Procedure, § 764, makes provision where the verdict is reversed, and now after verdict a cause of action for personal injuries survives in New York.

And an assignee may recover of his assignor who settled a case thereby defeating his claim. Stanton v. Thomas, 24 Wend. 70, 35 Am. Dec. 595 (debauching servant).

And an assignment of a cause of action surviving by statute is valid. Quin v. Moore, 15 N. Y. 432. In this case it was held that under N. Y. Laws 1847, 575, providing that the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages notwithstanding the death, and that the action shall be brought in the name of the personal representative, and the amount recovered shall be distributed to the widow and next of kin, the mother who is the sole heir of her infant child may assign her interest in damages causing death of her infant by selling morphine instead of quinine. This action was brought by the administrator and the mother assigned her interest in the suit so as to qualify as a witness. 44 L. R. A.

And an assignment of a cause of action under the civil damage act is valid. Ludwig v. Glaesel, 34 Hun, 312. In this case the assignment was to the mother on whom the duty of supporting the children had devolved by the father's death. The court said that it would not decide whether an assignment may be made to a stranger.

The case of Moriarty v. Bartlett, 34 Hun, 272, on the authority of which this assignment was sustained, held that an action did not abate on the death of the defendant, on the ground that by statute it seems the injured party has a certain ownership in the "means of support."

A cause of action on an undertaking on arrest is assignable. But the undertaking must be presumed to have been made to depend upon the recovery of a judgment, and a complaint alleging a discontinuance of the action does not state a cause of action on a bond given under N. Y. Code, § 182, as a cause of action founded exclusively upon false imprisonment is not assignable. Moses v. Waterbury Button Co. 5 Jones & S. 893.

In Birch v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 15 Daly, 453, defining "personal injury," it was said that "an injury to the person of the plaintiff must . . . consist of some direct attack upon his body, or upon his mind, as by threats or intimidation, or upon his reputation, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 3433, subsec. 9, and § 1910, defining what claims may be assigned. Ohio.

In Grant v. Ludlow, 8 Ohio St. 1, it was said that actions for personal torts are not assignable because not transmissible to the personal representative. Oregon.

In Bahms v. Sears, 13 Or. 47, it was said that any claim which affects the estate of the party may be assigned, but that the rule is otherwise where it arises out of an injury to the person, such as slander, assault and battery, and kindred cases. Pennsylvania.

An equitable assignment to an attorney of a cause of action for a personal injury is superior to an attachment; but such a claim does not pass to an assignee in bankruptcy.

An agreement between attorney and client that the former should have $100 for his services out of a verdict in an action for false imprisonment operates as an equitable assignment, and is superior to an attachment, under Pa. act ment to Mrs. Butler after notice of appellee's title to half of it, which is admitted, and with the fraudulent intent to deprive appellee of his fee, which is also admitted, establishes its liability.

Phillips, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Where the defendant to a bill in chancery has been defaulted, and a decree pro confesso entered, that decree concludes the party only as to the averments of the bill, and the sufficiency of the bill itself and the averments contained in it may be attacked as not justifying the decree. Gault v. Hoagland, 25 Ill. 266. The material inquiry therefore is: First, whether a right of action for personal injuries is assignable; and, second, whether a contract by which the control of the party in interest over litigation carried on in his name or behalf is prevented is void. By the common law, actions arising out of torts did not in general survive. The statute of this state has materially changed the rule with reference to actions which survive; and it is now the general rule in this country that causes of action arising from torts to property, real or personal, or injuries to the decedent's estate, by which its value is diminished, survive and go to the executor, and are assets in his hands, and such causes of action are assignable. But it is usually held that torts to the person or character, when the injury or damage is confined to the body or the feelings, and those contracts the breach of which produce direct injury and June 16, 1836, § 22, providing that debts attached in execution shall be subject, nevertheless, to all lawful claims thereupon. Patten v. Wilson, 34 Pa. 299. In this case the court said that, strictly speaking, unliquidated damages in an action sounding in tort are not capable of assignment before verdict. "But it is true only in respect to the rights of third parties."

A claim for damages for personal injuries sustained through the negligence of the company in carrying a passenger does not pass to an assignee in bankruptcy, whether the action be in form for tort or on contract, under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 546, providing that all rights in equity, choses in action, patent rights, rights of action for property or estate real or personal arising from contract, or from the unlawful taking or detention or injury to the property of the bankrupt, shall pass to the assignee, as the words "right of action for property, real or personal, arising from contract" limit the more general words "choses in action." Rand v. Fleishman, 6 W. N. C. 497.

In North v. Turner, 9 Serg. & R. 244, it was said that there are some injuries to a person, such as slander, assault and battery, crim. con. with the party's wife, which cannot be assigned so as to make the party a witness, as these do not pass by bankruptcy or an assignment under the insolvent acts, nor can they be transmitted to the executors or administrators.

In Lattimore v. Simmons, 13 Serg. & R. 183, it was said that a right of action for a breach of promise of marriage would not pass under a general assignment for creditors.

South Carolina.
An assignment by parol of one half of a verdict in an action of slander while the appeal is pending is invalid, and a chose in action on a tort of a personal character cannot be assigned where no judgment has been entered when the alleged assignment is made. A judgment could not be entered while an appeal was pending. Miller v. Newell, 20 S. C. 123, 47 Am. Rep. 833.

In this case the plaintiff and defendant compromised the case and defeated the attorney's claim, and the attorney sought to set aside the satisfaction. This decision was also on the ground that such a cause of action does not survive.

Texas.
A cause of action for a personal injury is nonassignable. But under the statute of 1889, after suit is filed such a cause of action is held assignable.

Where attorneys sought to prosecute a suit for personal injuries by reason of a written agreement to give them one third of the amount recovered, and the defendant having notice of the agreement had settled the case with their client, it was held that the claim was nonassignable, as it would not pass to the personal representative, and the claim of the attorneys was held unavailable as a security by an assignment of an interest therein or otherwise. Stewart v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. 62 Tex. 246.

A claim for damages for loss of a child alleged to have been killed through negligence is not assignable. The court said that the test of assignability is survivorship to the personal representative. Texas Mexican R. Co. v. Showalter, 3 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 69.

A contract in writing, before suit for personal injuries was filed to secure attorney's fees, "this being merely the assignment of his [the party's] one-half interest in the amount finally to be recovered or collected from said company and not an assignment of the cause of action," is not saved by Tex. Rev. Stat. (Sayles's Supp.) art. 2464a, providing that the sale of a judgment or any part thereof, or the sale of any cause of action or interest therein after suit has been filed, shall be evidenced in writing acknowledged and filed, and shall apply to any and all judgments, suits, claims, and causes of action, whether assignable in law or equity or not, where no judgment has been rendered. Neither is it a sale of an interest in a cause of action, because by express terms it disclaims it to be such, and if it is it is of no avail, as it was made before the suit was filed, and such a claim is nonassignable. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wooten, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 54.

But under Tex. Stat. § 2464a, an assignment of a two-thirds interest to attorneys after suit is brought for a cause of action for sounding a railroad whistle, causing a team to run away and injure plaintiff, is valid. Bonner v. Green, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 96.

A judgment recovered against a railroad company for damages for personal injuries is assignable by oral assignment, as it is such a claim as survives to the executor. Putnam v. Capps, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 160. The court said that the right to transfer this judgment existed independent of § 2464a.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wooten, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 54, it was said that the cases of Putnam v. Capps, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 610, and Bonner v. Green, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 96, "do not inveigh damage both mentally and to the person, are, so long as they are executory, not assignable. The controversy here is whether an action for personal injuries is assignable. Appellee contends it is.

Numerous authorities are referred to by counsel for appellee, which lay down the rule that, in many cases of torts to property, causes of action may be assigned, and of those cases we cite: Jackson v. Daggett, 24 Hun, 204,—an action against a sheriff for failure to return an execution was assignable. Dinny v. Fay, 38 Barb. 18, was an action against a sheriff for neglecting to arrest a debtor upon an execution against his person, and this cause of action was held assignable. Grant v. Ludlow, 8 Ohio St. 51, was a bill of review to set aside a decree based on a commercial transaction. The case was relative to a mortgage, and the point made was that the transaction was in the nature of a tort, and not transferable to executors or administrators, and died with against the rule here announced, as those decisions are predicated upon statements of facts different from the facts of this case. In the first case there was an assignment of the judgment after its rendition, and the fight was between two parties claiming the proceeds of same. There was also a claim to the proceeds by virtue of a transfer alleged to have been made before judgment. In speaking of this last claim the court says: "It is probable that as this cause of action before judgment could not be assigned independent of the statute, its terms should have been complied with in making the transfer before judgment, in order to constitute an effectual conveyance to one claiming thereunder. In the second case there was the sale of an interest in the cause of action made after the suit was filed."

In Jones v. Matthews, 75 Tex. 1, it was said that a claim for damages to the person from a tort cannot be assigned.

In Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Freeman, 57 Tex. 156, it was said that injuries to the person which die with the party and do not survive to his personal representative are not assignable. Virginia.

A right of action, such as slander, which is merely personal and dies with the party, is not transferable to the assignee in bankruptcy under act of Congress 1841. Dillard v. Collins, 25 Gratt. 343.

In Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Read, 87 Va. 185, it was said that a right of action for mere personal torts, such as assault and battery, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, defamation, and deceit, which die with the party and do not survive to the personal representative, cannot be assigned. Wisconsin.

An action for libel of a corporation does not pass to its receiver, and prior to 1887 a cause of action for personal injuries was not assignable; but by a statute passed in 1887, providing for survival of actions for injury to the person, such causes of action are now assignable.

A right of action for libel of an insurance company is not assignable, and does not pass to the receiver of the corporation, as a right of action for a mere personal injury which does not survive is not assignable. Milwaukee Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sentinel Co. (1892) 81 Wis. 207, 13 L. R. A. 627.

the person. The court held that it survived; that the mortgage was assignable. Robinson v. Weeks, 6 How. Pr. 161, was an action for taking and converting personal property brought by an assignee, and it was held that the assignment was good. Hall v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. 1 Disney (Ohio) 58, was a case that decides that, under the Ohio Code, an assignee of a claim for damages resulting from injuries to personal or real estate may bring an action in his own name. More v. Massini, 32 Cal. 590, was a case wherein it was held that a claim for damages caused by a trespass on land is assignable. Weire v. Davenport, 11 Iowa, 49, 77 Am. Dec. 132, was a case wherein it was held that a damage to realty is assignable. National Exch. Bank v. McLoon, 73 Me. 499, was a case which held good an assignment, by an heir of the owner of a ship destroyed by the Alabama, of his claim against the United States for such destruction. *Fried v. Under Wis. Rev. Stat. § 4235, Amended Laws 1887, chap. 280, providing that in addition to actions which survive at common law, actions for assault and battery or false imprisonment, or other damage to the person, shall also survive, an action for personal injuries from a street-railway car is assignable before judgment so as to defeat a garnishment. Lehmann v. Farwell, 95 Wis. 185, 37 L. R. A. 333.

Prior to this statute it was held that a cause of action for personal injuries from a defective sidewalk is not assignable, and an agreement to give the attorneys one half of the damages recovered, and not to settle the case without their consent, did not prevent a settlement that deprives the attorneys of their claim for compensation from the defendant, although the defendant had notice of such agreement. Kusterer v. Beaver Dam, 56 Wis. 471, 43 Am. Rep. 725.

In Gibson v. Gibson (1877) 43 Wis. 23, 28 Am. Rep. 527, it was said that a cause of action for slander is not assignable.

In St. Joseph Mfg. Co. v. Miller (1887) 69 Wis. 389, it was said that a claim for personal injuries is not assignable. Federal Cases.

In Comegys v. Vasse, 1 Pet. 193, 7 L. ed. 108, it was said that mere personal torts which die with the party, and do not survive to his personal representative, are not capable of passing by assignment in bankruptcy.

In Wright v. First Nat. Bank, 18 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 87, it was said that a right of action for torts to the debtor's person, such as assault and battery, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, libel, and slander, do not pass to the assignee in bankruptcy. English and Irish cases.

Co.* 64 Iowa, 513, was a case in which there was an assignment of the right of action for personal injuries to a resident of Iowa, by a nonresident; and the question arose as to the validity of the assignment, on a motion to transfer the case to the United States court; and the court held such assignment was good, on the strength of Gray v. McCallister, 50 Iowa, 497. Zogbaum v. Parker, 66 Barb. 341, was a case of false imprisonment, where there was an agreement to secure services by the assignment of a verdict, and the agreement was held good. This is under the New York Code, under which champerty and maintenance do not exist. Brady v. Whitney, 24 Mich. 154, was an action in trover, brought by a purchaser of a melodeon after the conversion, and the question was whether this sale constituted an assignment of the right to sue, and the court held that a right of action in trover is assignable. Grant v. Smith, 26 Mich. 201, was a case holding that an action in trover for converting timber is assignable. Finn v. Corbitt, 36 Mich. 318, was a case holding that a right of action for trespass to property is assignable. Final v. Backus, 18 Mich. 218, was a case in which the court holds that a right of action for conversion of logs is assignable. In Brackett v. Griswold, 103 N. Y. 425, the question involved was whether a cause of action growing out of a false annual report by a trustee, affecting a creditor, and giving him an action under the statute, died with the creditor; and it was held that it did. This question was joined with a charge of conspiracy to cheat and defraud, and it was held this affected a property right, and survived. *Stewart v. Houston & T. C. R. In an action by husband and wife on the case for words spoken of the wife, the damages recovered and levied by the sheriff cannot be assigned by the commissioner in bankruptcy before the return of the writ and after the money is levied. Benson v. Flower, W. Jones, 215, Cro. Car. 186 and 176. The court said that the money is not due to the plaintiff until it be paid to him and none may discharge the record but the plaintiff, and it ought to be delivered to him who may acknowledge satisfaction upon the record.

In Hancock v. Caffyn, 8 Bing. 358, 1 Moore & S. 521. It was said that a right of action for an injury to the person does not pass to an assignee in bankruptcy.

In Beckham v. Drake, 8 Mees. & W. 846, it was said that a right of action for damages for torts committed towards the bankrupt's person or reputation clearly does not pass to the assignee.

v. Freeman, 57 Tex. 156, and holds, as there was no survival, there could be no assignment of the action for personal injuries. In Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Freeman, 57 Tex. 156, the question involved was whether a claim against a railroad company for killing and injuring live stock could be assigned in equity, so as to enable the assignee to bring suit in his own name, and the court held that personal torts are not assignable, but that claims growing out of and adhering to property may be assigned. In Chouteau v. Boughton, 100 Mo. 406, the question involved was whether a right of action for trespass to realty was assignable, and the court held that it was, and followed the case of Snyder v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 83 Mo. 613. This latter case was an action brought against the railroad company for killing a hog, which had strayed through a defective fence; and it was held that such a right of action might be assigned, as it would survive the death of the owner under the Code.

All these cases—and many others might be cited—sustain the principle that causes of action for injuries to property, real or personal, by which an estate is diminished, are generally assignable. On grounds of public policy, the sale or assignment of actions for injuries to the person are void. The law will not consider the injuries of a citizen whereby he is injured in his person to be, as a cause of action, a commodity of sale. On other grounds, assignability is not legal. In the discussion of the question of assignability of causes of action for torts, courts have usually based the decisions on the theory that, where a cause of action survived, it was assignable. Is that the sole test? Biapham, Eq. pp. 218, 219, state: "So, too, equity will not recognize assignments of certain species of property which it would be against the policy of the law to allow the owners to part with. These are pensions given as rewards for extraordinary services, pay or half-pay in the army, the salaries of judges, . . . and other revenues and emoluments of a kindred charac-

& L. 383, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 448, 7 Jur. 953. It was said by Abinger, C. B., that an action for assault or for seduction did not pass to the assignee of a bankrupt.

In Druke v. Beckham, 11 Mees. & W. 315, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 486, 7 Jur. 204, it was said that a right of action for assault and battery, or for slander, or for the seduction of a child or servant, or personal injury arising out of breach of contract to marry, does not pass to the assignee of a bankrupt.

In Howard v. Crowther, 8 Mees. & W. 601, 5 Jur. 91, it was said that an assignee in bankruptcy can maintain no action for libel, although the injury occasioned thereby to the man's reputation may have been the sole cause of his bankruptcy.

"The grantee of the King brought writ of ravishment of ward where the ravishment and marriage were before the grant: and so it is agreed by the court, that the King may grant a chose in action, and that the grantee upon this may maintain action. ter, which reasons of state require should remain always for the benefit of the person to whom they were originally given." Yet in all those cases any balance unpaid at the time of death would survive to the personal representative, but the right of assignment is precluded on principles of public policy. Pomeroy, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, says (vol. 3, § 1275): "It becomes important, then, in fixing the scope of the equity jurisdiction, to determine what things in action may thus be legally assigned. The following criterion is universally adopted: All things in action which survive and pass to the personal representatives of a decedent creditor as assets, or continue as liabilities against the representatives of a decedent debtor, are, in general thus assignable. All which do not thus survive, but which die with the person of the creditor or of the debtor, are not assignable. The first of these classes, according to the doctrine prevailing throughout the United States, includes all claims arising from contract, express or implied, with certain well-defined exceptions, and those arising from torts to real or personal property, and from frauds, deceits, and other wrongs, whereby an estate, real or personal, is injured, diminished, or damaged. The second class embraces all torts to the person or character where the injury and damage are confined to the body and the feelings; and also those contracts, often implied, the breach of which produces only direct injury and damage, bodily or mentally, to the person, such as promises to marry, injuries done by the want of skill of a medical practitioner, contrary to his implied undertaking, and the like; and also those contracts, so long as they are executory, which stipulate solely for the special personal services, skill, or knowledge of a contracting party." Here is a distinction clearly drawn between injuries to property and injuries to the person. This distinction rests on a sound principle. If a person receives injury to his person through negligence of another, by our statute (§ 123, chap. 3), the action therefor survives. By chapter 70, where death results from such injuries caused by such negligence of another, the action still survives, but is brought for the exclusive benefit of the widow and the next of kin. The administrator cannot recover damages for the estate, and at the same time recover for the exclusive benefit of the widow. Statutes like chapter 70 are in force in most of the states. May a person injured assign the cause of action immediately after his injury, and thus, in case of his death from that injury, legally bar a recovery by the administrator for the exclusive benefit of the widow and next of kin? The purpose of chapter 70 is to benefit the widow and next of kin. If an assignment on the basis of the survival of the action were the sole test, then, in the case mentioned, the assignment would be valid. But the very purpose of the survival, as created by the statute is for the benefit of the widow and next of kin, which purpose the law would not permit to be defeated. Whether the action be for assault and battery or for injuries caused by the negligence of another, still the same rule obtains and the action is included in the term "actions for injuries to the person." The possible result of the assignment of such an action would be that the purpose of the law might be defeated. Courts have, with one exception, steadily held that an action for injuries to the body is not assignable. These actions did not survive at common law, but statutes providing for such survival have had their birth since the passage of Lord Campbell's act, in 1846, which, by chapter 70 of our Revised Statutes, is substantially adopted. If such actions are held assignable, on the sole ground of survival, then an assignee in bankruptcy or for the benefit of creditors would take the cause of action.

This principle, that actions for personal injuries are not assignable, is well sustained by authority. In Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 566, it was held that an assignment of a claim for personal injuries is void, although made after verdict, but before judgment, in an action to recover damages for such injury. The court says: "Such claims were not assignable at common law. On the contrary, a possibility, right of entry, thing of action, cause of suit, or title for condition broken, could not be granted or assigned over at common law. . . . But this ancient doctrine has been greatly relaxed. Commercial paper was first made assignable to meet the necessities of commerce and trade. Courts of equity also interfered to protect assignments of various choses in action; and, after a while, courts of law recognized the validity of such assignments, and protected them, by allowing the assignee to use the name of the assignor for enforcing the claim assigned. And, at the present day, claims for property and for torts done to property are generally to be regarded as assignable, especially in bankruptcy and insolvency. There may be some exceptions to this doctrine, but they need not be discussed here. But, in respect to all claims for personal injuries, the questions put by Lord Abinger in Howard v. Crowther, 8 Mees. & W. 603, are applicable: 'Has it ever been contended that the assignees of a bankrupt can recover for his wife's adultery, or for an assault? How can they represent his aggravated feelings?' And we may add the broader inquiry—Has any court of law or equity ever sanctioned a claim by an assignee to compensation for wounded feelings, injured reputation, or bodily pain, suffered by an assignor? There were two principal reasons why the assignments above mentioned were held to be invalid at common law. One was to avoid maintenance. In early times, maintenance was regarded as an evil, principally because it would enable the rich and powerful to oppress the poor. This reason has in modern times lost much, but not the whole, of its force. It would still be in the power of litigious persons, whether rich or poor, to harass and annoy others if they were allowed to purchase claims for pain and suffering, and prosecute them in courts as assignees. And as there are no counterbalancing reasons in favor of such purchases, growing out of the convenience of business, there is no good ground for a change of the law in respect to such claims. The other reason is a principle of law applicable to all assignments,—that they are void unless the assignor has either actually or potentially the thing which he attempts to assign. A man cannot grant or charge that which he has not. . . . Most of the cases in which the right to assign this class of claims has been discussed have been assignments, under the statutes of bankruptcy or insolvency. Much of the discussion has therefore related to the construction of these statutes, but the nature of the claims has also been regarded as an objection to their being assignable. In some cases the question has been discussed without reference to such statutes. In Prosser v. Edmonds, 1 Younge & C. Exch. 481, it was held that a bare right to file a bill in equity for fraud was not assignable. Lord Chief Baron Lyndhurst remarked that courts of equity had relaxed the ancient rule as to the assignment of choses in action, but only in the cases where something more than a mere right to litigate has been assigned.' This constitutes a very important limitation." This case was followed in Linton v. Hurley, 104 Mass. 353; in Coughlin v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 446, 27 Am. Rep. 75, one having a claim against a railroad company for personal injuries accepted an offer from certain attorneys to take the claim for collection, and divide the recovery. Afterwards the railroad company, with notice of the attorneys' interest in the cause of action, settled with the claimant, and secured a release. In holding that the release was a bar to the action for negligence, and that the attorneys could not demand that the action proceed so that they might have the benefit of their agreement, the court says: "So, if the cause of action before judgment be in its nature assignable, the owner of it may assign, and, by agreement, create, legal and equitable interests therein; and such agreements may now be made with his attorneys, as well as with other persons; and when such interests have been created, and notice given of them, they must be respected. But . . . when the cause of action is like this, such as by its nature is not assignable, the party owning it cannot, by any agreement, give his attorney or other person any interest therein,"—citing People, Stanton, v. Tioga Common Pleas, 19 Wend. 73, and Pulver v. Harris, 62 Barb. 500, 62 N. Y. 73. To the same effect is Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Maher, 91 Ill. 314. The only exception to this rule is the case of Vimont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 69 Iowa, 296, which has been followed by other cases in that state. We do not think the reasoning on which these decisions are based is sound, and we decline to follow them.

The second proposition to be determined is: Is a contract by which the person in whose name the action is brought, and to whom it belongs, restricted from compromising or settling such claim because of a contract to that effect? In other words, is such a contract valid and binding? The law does not discourage settlements in cases for personal injuries. Whether a cause of action exists, and if so its nature and amount are facts always involved in uncertainty, and a defendant has a right to buy his peace. The plaintiff has a right to compromise and avoid the anxiety, resulting from a cause pending to which he is a party. Any contract whereby a client is prevented from settling or discontinuing his suit is void, as such agreement would foster and encourage litigation. Lewis v. Lewis, 15 Ohio, 715; Ellwood v. Wilson, 21 Iowa, 523; Foster v. Jack, 4 Watts, 334; Boardman v. Thompson, 25 Iowa, 487; Greenhood, Pub. Pol. p. 474; Huber v. Johnson (Minn.) 70 N. W. 805.

We will not extend this opinion by a discussion of other questions raised.

The decree of the Superior Court of Cook County, and the judgment of the Appellate Court of the First District, are each reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill.

Craig, J., dissenting:

As I do not agree with a majority of the court in the opinion. I have concluded to state my views of the case.

When a decree pro confesso has been entered against a party, he cannot, on error, allege the want of testimony or the insufficiency of the evidence the court may have heard; but the party has the right to contest the sufficiency of the allegations of the bill, and insist that the averments of the bill do not justify the decree. Gault v. Hoagland, 25 Ill. 268. By a demurrer all material allegations well pleaded are admitted. The same rule may be applied when there is a default. The question then presented by this record is whether, conceding the averments of the bill to be true, they are sufficient to authorize the decree rendered by the court. It is alleged in the bill that the complainant was an attorney at law; that Mary Butler had received certain personal injuries through the negligence of the defendant, while she was exercising due care, the nature and character of which injuries were fully stated; that Mary Butler had a cause of action against said railroad company, and desired the services of the complainant as an attorney to prosecute her case against the railroad company; that thereupon a written contract was entered into, as follows: "Whereas, on or about the 7th day of July, A. D. 1891, Mrs. Mary Butler received certain personal injuries through an accident caused by the negligence of certain employees of the North Chicago Street-Railroad Company, and desires to enforce payment of damages for said injury, without advancing attorney's fees therefor: It is agreed by and between said Mrs. Mary Butler and L. M. Ackley, attorney at law, that said Ackley shall take exclusive charge of said matter, and prosecute such parties as he may deem liable for said injuries, and begin and prosecute diligently to final settlement such suits or legal proceedings as he may deem necessary, and shall receive for his services, under this contract, a sum equal to one half of the gross amount recovered or received on account of said injuries; and, to secure payment of said fee, the said Mrs.

Mary Butler hereby assigns to said Ackley and his assigns one half of said right of action, and agrees to assign in proper legal form, in writing, upon request, one half of any verdict or judgment which may be had or recovered by reason of said accident and injury, court costs and actual necessary expenses to be advanced by Mrs. Mary Butler, who also agrees not to compromise or settle said claim, or to have any dealings with any person in reference thereto other than said attorney. In the event of a settlement of said claim before the aforesaid case is on trial call, the charge for services shall be less than one half, in proportion to the work done up to the date of such settlement,"—signed and sealed by the parties, September 2, 1891. It is then alleged that on the 3d day of September, 1891, Ackley commenced a suit in the circuit court of Cook county against the railroad company, to recover damages for the injuries sustained, and for a period of two and one half years complainant spent much time and rendered much service in preparing said cause for trial (setting out the services in detail); that finally the cause was reached on the calendar, and complainant caused the same to be set down for trial; that, while on the trial docket, the railroad company, without the knowledge or consent of complainant, settled the cause with Mary Butler, procured the cause to be called up out of its order, and had a judgment entered therein in favor of Mrs. Butler, against the railroad company, for $3,750 and costs, which sum was paid to Mrs. Butler, and she satisfied the judgment of record. That prior to the making of said settlement and payment of $3,750, to said Mary Butler, said North Chicago Street-Railroad Company had full knowledge and notice of said contract in writing of the employment of associate counsel, and of the services rendered as aforesaid, and of complainant's rights under said contract, and that the said settlement was made for the fraudulent purpose of preventing complainant from obtaining compensation for his work in behalf of said Mary Butler: that said North Chicago Street-Railroad Company and said Mary Butler have each refused to pay complainant the amount so due him for services, and said Mary Butler has informed complainant that she has none of the money so paid in settlement; that Mary Butler is, as complainant believes, wholly insolvent.

The rule seems to be quite well established by the authorities, leaving out of view questions of public policy, that all causes of action which, under the law, survive, are assignable. The test, therefore, by which to determine whether things in action are assignable, seems to be to ascertain whether the claim or demand survives upon the death of the party, or dies with him. In North v. Turner, 9 Serg. & R. 244, which was an action of trespass for carrying away goods, the plaintiff was offered as a witness. The objection was interposed that he was interested and incompetent, to which it was replied that he had assigned his claim; and the court held that as the right of action, under the statute, passed to the personal representatives, it was assignable. In the decision of the case the court said: "There are undoubtedly some injuries which so peculiarly adhere to the person of him who has suffered them as to preclude an assignment of his claim to compensation for them so as to make him a witness; such, for instance, as slander, assault and battery, criminal conversation with the party's wife, and many others that might be mentioned. The right to compensation for any of these would not pass by a statute of bankruptcy or an assignment under the insolvent acts, nor could it be transmitted to executors or administrators. But this does not hold with respect to a trespass committed against the party's goods, the remedy for which survives to the personal representative by the statute 4 Edw. III. chap. 7, which clearly shows that such cause of action is separable from the person of the owner. . . . The subject-matter of the demand, therefore, being clearly assignable, the objection on that ground cannot be sustained." Bunker v. Green, 48 Ill. 243, was an action of trespass de bonis asportatis, pending which plaintiff died; and it was held that the cause of action survived under the statute 4 Edw. III. chap. 7, and that the personal representative might be substituted as plaintiff. Moreover, actions for personal injuries survive under paragraph 122 of our statute, entitled "Administration of Estates," which declares: "In addition to the actions which survive by the common law, the following shall also survive: Actions of replevin, actions to recover damages for an injury to the person (except slander and libel), actions to recover damages for an injury to real or personal property, or for the detention or conversion of personal property, and actions against officers for misfeasance, malfeasance, or nonfeasance of themselves or their deputies, and all actions for fraud or deceit." See also Hurd's Rev. Stat. p. 812, chap. 70. In Tyson v. McGuiness, 25 Wis. 656, which was an action of trespass, it was held that all actions of tort which survive may be assigned. The same rule is announced in Jordan v. Gillen, 44 N. H. 424. Pomeroy on Remedies and Remedial Rights (§ 146) says: "Whatever things in action will survive and pass to the personal representatives of a decedent as assets of or liabilities against an estate are assignable by the direct act of the parties; while those things in action which will not thus survive and pass to the personal representatives of a decedent are not assignable." And in § 147: "The criterion, therefore, by which to judge of the assignability of things in action, is to ascertain whether the demand survives upon the decease of the party, or dies with him."

Under the authorities cited, it seems plain that a right of action for personal injuries is assignable. Hawk v. Ament, 28 Ill. App. 392, is a case in point. There, as appears, Hawk had been injured on a railroad, and claimed damages for his injury; and, being anxious to institute an action against the railroad company, he entered into a contract with one Ament, a lawyer, to give him one half of whatever amount might be recovered for his services in commencing and prosecuting the action. Ament commenced a suit against the railroad company, and recovered a judgment in the circuit court for $1,900. The railroad company appealed to the appellate court, where the judgment was affirmed. The company appealed from the judgment of the appellate court to this court, where the judgment was ultimately affirmed. While the cause was pending in this court, Hawk sold and assigned the judgment, in writing, to one O'Connor; and, after the judgment was affirmed in this court, the judgment was paid to the clerk of the circuit court, where it was rendered. O'Connor claimed the money, and the attorney claimed one half of the judgment under the agreement he had with Hawk. The appellate court sustained the agreement Ament made with Hawk, and held that the agreement amounted to an equitable assignment. In Vimont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 69 Iowa, 296, the supreme court of Iowa held that a cause of action for a personal injury was assignable, and the assignee might maintain an action in his own name. It is there said: "It may be conceded for the purposes of this case, we think, that a claim for damages arising out of a personal tort, and having its origin where the common law is in force, is not assignable before being reduced to judgment. The ground upon which it is held that such claim is not assignable is that it is a mere personal claim in favor of the injured party, and that it does not become a part of his estate, or descend to his representatives, but terminates at his death; and consequently it has no value which can be so estimated as to form a consideration for a sale, and there is in it no element of property to make it the subject of a grant or assignment. See Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 566; People, Stanton, v. Tioga Common Pleas, 19 Wend. 73. The contract of assignment of such claims between parties otherwise competent to contract is void at common law, then, not because of any incapacity of the parties to enter into the contract, but because the claim itself is not the subject of contract. Under the statutes of Iowa, however, such claims are given a character entirely different from that sustained by them when arising under the common law. They are not merely personal claims in favor of the parties sustaining the injuries, and they do not terminate with their death, but become a part of their estates and descend to their representatives, and actions thereon may be maintained by the representatives." See also Vimont v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 518. In Final v. Backus, 18 Mich. 218, where trover was brought to recover for logs which the defendant had obtained by trespass, the court, in deciding the case, said: "The position is that the right of action for a tort is not the subject of assignment; and this we understand to be the general rule. [Citing authorities.] But this rule applies only to those torts which are merely personal, and which, on the death of the person wronged, die with him; while torts for taking and converting personal property, or for an injury to one's estate, and generally all such rights of action for tort as would survive to the personal representatives, may, it seems, be assigned, so as to pass an interest to the assignee which he can enforce by suit at law. [Citing North v. Turner, 9 Serg. & R. 244; Butler v. New York & E. R. Co. 22 Barb. 110; and Purple v. Hudson River R. Co. 4 Duer, 79.]"

Numerous cases have been cited by counsel for the railroad company which they claim hold a different view,—that a right of action for personal injuries is not assignable. The first case cited is Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Maher, 91 Ill. 314. In that case one Maher owned certain property on the Chicago river, and, while so owning the property, the railroad company erected a pier in the river opposite his property, upon which a bridge was constructed. Some time after the erection of the pier, Maher sold the property to his wife, and, after she obtained title, she sued to recover damages caused by the erection of the pier. It was held that, as Maher owned the land when the pier was erected which caused the alleged damage, the right of action was in him, and the right to sue for damages was not transferred to his wife by the subsequent conveyance to her. Expressions may be found in the opinion in that case which might seem to sustain the view of the appellant, but the decision in that case has no bearing on the question involved in this. The theory of that case is that the owner, at the time of the damage, is entitled to recover, not only for the present, but all future damages; and a recovery by the owner is a bar to any future action. Norton v. Tuttle, 60 Ill. 130, has also been cited. In that case it was held that the bare right to file a bill in equity, growing out of the perpetration of a fraud on a party, is not assignable. Prosser v. Edmonds, 1 Younge & C. Exch. 481, and Illinois Land & Loan Co. v. Speyer, 138 Ill. 145, lay down the same doctrine. Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 566, has also been cited, and is much relied upon. In that case the supreme court of Massachusetts did hold that at common law a claim for injuries to the person is not assignable. Coughlin v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 444, 27 Am. Rep. 75, has also been cited; but in New York, at the time the case was decided, a right of action to recover damages for personal injuries did not survive. A few other cases have been cited, but it will not be necessary to refer to them here. It may be conceded that there are cases, as Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 566, and People, Stanton, v. Tioga Common Pleas, 19 Wend. 73, which held that a cause of action for personal injuries is not assignable; but I regard the decided weight of authority the other way. If the cause of action in the case under consideration was merely personal,—one which could not survive the party injured, but would die with him,—I would have no hesitation in holding, as was done in Rice v. Stone, 1 Allen, 566, and People, Stanton, v. Tioga Common Pleas, 19 Wend. 73, that the cause of action could not be assigned to a third party. But such is not the case. Under our statute, as has been seen, an action to recover damages for personal injuries survives; and, being possessed of that important element, no reason is perceived why an action of that character may not be assigned in the same way and with like effect as an action of debt, composed of various items, or as an action to recover damages for breach of contract. I do not wish to be understood as saying that an assignee of a cause of action for personal injuries, or any other tort, may maintain an action in his own name; but I do say that the cause of action may be transferred by assignment, so that the assignee may be the equitable owner of the cause of action, with power to prosecute to final judgment in the name of the assignor, and collect and receipt for the judgment when rendered.

It is also claimed that the agreement sought to be enforced violates the rule against maintenance and is champertous. It will be observed that, by the terms of the contract, the attorney, Ackley, was to receive for his services one half of the amount to be recovered; but, by the express terms of the agreement, court costs and necessary expenses were to be advanced by Mary Butler. To make out a case of champerty, it is not sufficient to show that a part of the thing recovered was paid or agreed to be paid as an attorney's fee. It must also be shown that the costs and expenses of the suit, or some part of them, are paid or agreed to be paid by the attorney. West Chicago Park Comrs. v. Coleman, 108 Ill. 601. This is the rule established in the case cited, and also in Thompson v. Reynolds, 73 Ill. 12, and Phillips v. South Park Comrs. 119 Ill. 637. Under the law as declared in these cases, the objection to the contract is, in my opinion, not well taken.

It is said in the argument that the agreement is not an assignment of any part of the fund to be recovered, but is a mere promise to pay a sum equal to one half of the amount recovered. I do not so regard the contract. The contract is one, as I understand it, by which an equitable assignment is made of one half of whatever amount may be recovered. When the judgment was rendered, the railroad company had notice of appellee's rights in the judgment; and having paid over the money to Mary Butler, with notice of appellee's rights, it was, in my opinion, liable to appellee for the amount of his interest in the judgment.

Magruder, J.: I concur in the views expressed by Mr. Justice Craig.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

F. C. DANEHOWER, Appl.,

v.

Jack DAWSON.

(65 Ark. 129.)

1. The right of possession of property sold under foreclosure of a mortgage, during the year allowed by statute for redemption, is in the purchaser, where the mortgage transfers the title leaving only an equity of redemption in the mortgagor, and the statute is silent as to the right of possession after sale.
2. The right of redemption from a sale under foreclosure of a mortgage is given by the Arkansas statute in every case, and is not limited to sales at a second offering required by the statute because a bid of two thirds the appraised value of the property was not received at the first offering.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lee County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Riddick, J.:

This action was brought in the Lee circuit court by appellee, Jack Dawson, against the appellant, F. C. Danehower, to recover possession of 5 acres of land in Lee county. Danehower filed an answer alleging that he was the owner of said land, and denying the right of Dawson to recover possession thereof. The evidence at the trial showed that the land in controversy was in 1888 owned by F. Trunkey, who sold the tract of land, of which that in controversy was a part, to Dawson and certain other parties, and executed a deed conveying the land to them. Dawson and the other vendees agreed to pay $1,361.85 for the land. To secure the payment of this sum, they executed and delivered to R. D. Griffis, as trustee, a deed of trust conveying said land to him, with power of sale, providing that, if default was made in the payment of the debt, the trustee should take immediate possession, and, after advertisement, sell the same to the highest bidder, and execute and deliver to the purchaser proper deeds conveying the land to him. Dawson took possession of the land under his purchase, but paid no portion of the purchase price. F. Trunkey died, and the purchase money not having been paid, the trustee, on the 16th of April, 1895, sold the land under the power contained in the deed; and at the sale it was purchased by the heirs of Trunkey for the sum of $900, leaving a balance of the purchase price amounting to over $600 unpaid. Shortly after the sale the trustee executed his deed conveying said land to the heirs who had purchased; and they sold the land to appellant, Danehower, for the sum of $650, one half of which he paid in cash. They executed a written agreement to convey the land to him upon the payment of the remainder of the purchase money, and authorized him to take possession of the land, and Danehower took possession before the expiration of the year allowed to redeem. There is a conflict in the evidence as to whether he obtained the same peaceably, by consent of Dawson, or forcibly took possession. The court, in effect, instructed the jury that, during the period allowed for redemption, appellee, the grantor in the deed of trust, was entitled to the possession of the mortgaged premises. The finding and judgment were in favor of plaintiff.

Messrs. McCulloch & McCulloch, for appellant:

This is an action of ejectment, and the plaintiff must recover, if at all, on the strength of his own title and right of possession.

The statutes allowing redemption do not change the relations of the parties toward the property or each other, save in the one particular that the mortgagor has the privilege of redemption.

This right cannot be likened to the statutory redemption from an execution sale or a tax sale, for in both of these cases the statutes expressly provide that there shall be no conveyance to the purchaser until the expiration of the period for redemption, and the legal title does not pass until there is a conveyance.

It is analogous—nearer so than any other kind of redemption—to the right of an infant to redeem from tax sale.

The minor's right to redeem is not an estate in the lands, but only a statutory privilege to defeat the purchaser's title within a limited time.

Messrs. Norton & Pewett, amici curiæ.

The statute is as follows: "§ 5111. At all sales of personal or real property under mortgages or deeds of trust in this state, such property shall not sell for less than two thirds of the appraised value thereof. Provided, if the property shall not sell at first offering for two thirds of the amount of the appraisement, then, in case of personal property, another offering may be made sixty days thereafter, and in case of real property, another offering may be made in twelve months thereafter, at which offering the sale shall be to the highest bidder without reference to the appraisement; and, provided, real property sold thereunder may be redeemed by the mortgagor at any time within one year from the sale thereof by payment of the amount for which said property is sold, together with 10 per cent interest thereon and cost of sale."

The language of the enactment furnishes no warrant for putting upon it a construction which would authorize a redemption when the sale was made at the first offering for two thirds.

No word can be found which evinces in the slightest a legislative intent that the purchaser at such a sale should not at once receive his deed, and thereby be vested with title and right of possession.

The right of redemption (from the sale as distinguished from redeeming from mortgage) is a privilege, not an estate.

Powers v. Andrews, 84 Ala. 289; Bender v. Bean, 52 Ark. 132.

Riddick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of ejectment brought by a grantor in a deed of trust against one holding under the purchaser of the premises at a sale made by virtue of the power contained in the deed. The land was purchased at the sale by the heirs of the beneficiary in the trust deed. The trustee executed a deed conveying the land to them, and they sold to the defendant in this case. The grantor has not offered to redeem, and the question presented for our consideration is whether, as against the purchaser under the power contained in the deed, the grantor is entitled to the possession of the mortgaged premises during the statutory period allowed for redemption.

This deed of trust being executed to secure a debt, was, in legal effect, only a mortgage. Turner v. Watkins, 31 Ark. 429. But in this state the legal title passes by the mortgage to the mortgagee, subject to be defeated by the performance of the conditions of the mortgage. Whittington v. Flint, 43 Ark. 504, 51 Am. Rep. 572; Ringo v. Woodruff, 43 Ark. 469; Fitzgerald v. Beebe, 7 Ark. 310, 46 Am. Dec. 285. As the debt secured by the deed in this case was past due and unpaid, if the mortgagee had taken possession of the mortgaged premises without a sale it is plain from the cases just cited that the mortgagor could not maintain ejectment against him, or those holding under him, without first paying or offering to pay the debt secured by the mortgage. And certainly it cannot be said that the sale of the premises made under the power contained in the deed revested the title in the grantor, so as to empower him to bring ejectment, and recover possession of the mortgaged premises, without offering to redeem or pay any portion of the mortgage debt. The purpose of this sale was to cut off the equity of redemption possessed by the grantor, and, but for the statute giving the right of redemption after sale, the grantor after such sale would have had no further interest of any kind in said land. The statute confers upon the grantor the right to redeem at any time within one year after the sale under the mortgage or deed of trust, but upon the question of possession it is silent. It does not confer or attempt to confer upon the grantor any right to the possession of the premises during the period allowed for redemption. Sandels & H. Dig. § 5111. Who, then, had the right to the possession of the premises during the statutory period allowed for redemption? The mortgagee has, after the sale, no lien upon the land by virtue of the mortgage, and no right to take possession for any unpaid balance of the debt; for the mortgage is discharged by the sale, and the rights of the mortgagee, as to the land, pass to the purchaser. After the sale, and during the period allowed for redemption, "the purchaser at the sale takes the place of the mortgagee." Dailey v. Abbott, 40 Ark. 276. But there is this difference between the position of the mortgagee in possession and that of a purchaser: The possession of the purchaser is after the sale, when the foreclosure has already taken place, and when only the statutory right of redemption remains to the mortgagor. In the case of Ruckman v. Astor, 9 Paige, 517, Chancellor Walworth, speaking of the rights of a purchaser at a foreclosure sale when the statute permitted the mortgagor to redeem, said that the purchaser "was in the same situation as a mortgagee in possession after a decree for a strict foreclosure, previous to the expiration of the time allowed by such decree for the redemption of the premises. There in case the mortgage money mentioned in the decree, with the interest thereon, is not paid within the time limited for that purpose, the equity of redemption is forever barred, and the mortgage will be permitted to retain the rents and profits which he has received subsequent to such decree. But if the redemption takes place, as authorized by the decree, the mortgagee must relinquish the possession to the owner of the equity of redemption, and must account to him for the rents and profits, of the premises while he held the possession." Now, without stopping to consider whether this extract from the opinion of the learned chancellor gives a correct view of the law concerning strict foreclosures, we think it illustrates the position of a purchaser holding under a mortgage sale during the year allowed by our statute for redemption. Such a purchaser occupies a double character and may come to be treated either as a mortgagee in possession or as the holder of an absolute title, depending upon whether there has been a redemption or not. To speak more accurately, he holds as purchaser, but if there be a redemption, his rights will be determined by treating him as a mortgagee to the extent of the price paid by him. If the mortgagor redeems, the defeasible title of the purchaser is abrogated. The purchaser will then, for the purpose of redemption, be treated as a mortgagee in possession, and will be entitled to the price paid by him, with interest, and must account for the rents and profits. But, if no redemption is made, then at the end of the period allowed for redemption the title of the purchaser becomes absolute; and when the conveyance is made it relates back to the time of the sale, and he can retain the rents and profits received by him subsequent to the sale. So it seems to us that in order to recover possession, and call the purchaser to account for the rents and profits, the mortgagor must redeem. Ruckman v. Astor, 9 Paige, 517; Lathrop v. Nelson, 4 Dill. 194; Dailey v. Abbott, 40 Ark. 276; Burk v. Bank of Tennessee, 3 Head, 686; Champion v. Hinkle, 45 N. J. Eq. 162; Childress v. Monette, 54 Ala. 317; Powers v. Andrews, 84 Ala. 289.

We do not find any decision of this court in conflict with the conclusion at which we have arrived; but there are expressions in Wood v. Holland, 57 Ark. 198, and in Dailey v. Abbott, 40 Ark. 276, which are cited as sustaining the opposite view. But it must be remembered that those were cases in which redemptions were made. Taking those cases in connection with the facts upon which they were based, and the questions determined, we find very little in either of them from which we should wish to dissent: but we do not feel called upon to discuss those cases, because in each of them a redemption has been made, and the question whether the mortgagor was entitled to the possession when no redemption was made was not before the court. In this case the mortgaged property did not sell for enough to satisfy the mortgage debt, by several hundred dollars. It was purchased by the creditor or beneficiary in the deed of trust, who received a deed from the trustee, and then, in turn, sold to the appellant. If we should hold that the mortgagee, and not the purchaser, had the right to the possession during the period allowed to redeem, the result, so far as this case is concerned, would be the same; for the appellant holds under the mortgagee or trustee. We do not know of any decision by this court in which it is said or intimated, in a case such as we have here, where the mortgaged premises have sold for less than the mortgage debt, and where the mortgagor is not offering to redeem, that he may still take from the mortgagee, or the purchaser from him, the possession of such premises, during the period allowed for redemption, and apply the rents and profits to his own use, and allow his debt to go unpaid. There is nothing in the deed of trust under which the premises were sold in this case that prevents the creditor from subjecting the use of the premises during the year following the sale to the payment of his debt. On the contrary, it grants to the trustee, in the fullest terms, the power to take possession upon default, and to sell and execute a deed conveying the title to the purchaser. Nor do we find in the statute which gives the right to redeem anything that would justify such a ruling. Our statute which defines the rights of a purchaser of land at a sale under execution expressly provides that no conveyance shall be made to the purchaser, or possession delivered, until the time for redemption has expired, but there is no such provision in this statute regulating sales under mortgages and deeds of trust. The bare right to redeem is given, and nothing more. To hold that this statute gives the mortgagor the right to take possession of the premises, and appropriate the rents and profits, during the year allowed to redeem, without redeeming or paying any portion of his debt, would, it seems to us, be putting something in the statute not authorized by its language. Before this statute was passed, a sale and conveyance under the power in a deed such as we have here vested an absolute title in the purchaser; and this effect should still be given to the sale, so far as is consistent with the purpose of the statute to allow a right of redemption. If the sale carries the right to the rents and profits, the purchase price will be enhanced to that extent, and the result will be a benefit to the mortgagee, and no great harm to the mortgagor, as the increased price goes to the payment of his debt, and, if there be an excess, it belongs to him.

It is said that it would put a cloud upon the title of the mortgagor, to have a deed executed to the purchaser before the period of redemption expires. If this were true, the redemption would annul such a deed, and the mortgagor has his remedy to remove the cloud. But we do not see that there is any necessity that a deed should be executed before such period has elapsed. By virtue of the legal title in the mortgagee, the purchaser can, under him, take and hold possession against the mortgagor until the year for redemption has expired. When a deed is executed, it can, we think, by the doctrine of relation, properly be held to take effect from the day of sale. Wagner v. Cohen, 4 Gill. 97, 46 Am. Dec. 660; Lathrop v. Nelson, 4 Dill. 194.

As to the contention of counsel who appear as amici curiæ, that the right of redemption is not given when the property sells at the first offering, but only to a sale at the second offering, when, on account of a failure to bring two thirds of its value at the first offering, the sale has been postponed, we are of the opinion that it cannot be sustained. There may be some ambiguity, but, taking the whole act together, we feel convinced that the right to redeem applies to all sales under mortgages or deeds of trust. If the object of allowing the right to redeem was to prevent an absolute sale of property at less than two thirds of its value, it seems strange that the legislature, when the property fails to bring that amount at the first offering, should postpone the sale for a year, and then, at the sale on the second offering, allow another year in which to redeem, without regard to whether the property at the last sale brought more than two thirds of its value or not. If the legislature did not intend to allow the right to redeem from a sale at the first offering because the land sells for two thirds of its value, we feel certain that it would not have allowed the right to redeem from a sale at the second offering, when the land was sold for two thirds of its value, or over. As no distinction in this respect in regard to the right to redeem from sales at the second offering is made, we conclude that the right to redeem was intended to apply to all sales.

Having concluded that the plaintiff in this case had no right to recover the possession of the mortgaged premises from the defendant without redemption, it follows that the judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, and it is so ordered.

Battle, J., dissenting:

A statute of this state provides that real property sold under a power of sale in deeds of trust and mortgages "may be redeemed by the mortgagor at any time within one year from the sale thereof by payment of the amount for which said property is sold, together with 10 per cent interest thereon and cost of sale." Under this statute, is the purchaser entitled to the possession of the property sold, before the expiration of the time for redemption? I think not. In his bid for the property at the sale, he agrees to pay what he is willing to give for it, provided it is not redeemed, and he gets it at the end of the time allowed for redemption. As a full and complete compensation to him for the money he has paid for the land, the law allows the amount paid, and 10 per cent interest, in the event he fails to acquire title by reason of redemption. Until the time to redeem expires, the land stands as security to him for this amount and interest, in default of the payment of which within the year after the sale he becomes the owner of the land. Until then he has only an inchoate title, and his right to the possession does not accrue until it becomes complete. He is consequently not entitled to the possession within the one year allowed to redeem.

The purchaser does not become subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee against the mortgagor. He is entitled to the land, or the return of his money with interest, and no more. The mortgagee is entitled to recover of the mortgagor the remainder of the mortgage debt left unpaid after the amount received on account of the sale of the lands has been deducted. By reason of this unpaid balance the purchaser acquires no rights. All the rights existing by virtue thereof belong to the mortgagee or his assigns. What those rights are is not necessary for us to determine in this case; for appellant had no right to the land, except that acquired by the sale under the power contained in the deed of trust, and, in taking possession of it, he was not acting in the name of or for the trustee or beneficiaries in the deed of trust, for the purpose of enforcing the collection of the balance due on the mortgage debt, or by virtue thereof, but in his own behalf. This debt had never been assigned to him, and he therefore had no authority by virtue thereof to assert a right to the possession of the land for the purpose of appropriating the rents and profits accruing therefrom to the payment of the debt. He had no more right to do so than a purchaser at a sale under an execution would have, by virtue of such purchase, to collect the balance due on the judgment on which the execution was issued. The appellee was, therefore, during the time allowed for redemption, entitled to the possession of the land, as against appellant.

RESERVATION by the Superior court for Fairfield County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Errors of an information in the nature of a quo warranto to test the validity of defendant's claim to act as street commissioner under an alleged appointment by the board of public works. Judgment of ouster.

Statement by Andrews, Ch. J.:

This was an information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto. It sets forth that the relator was on the 10th day of June, 1898, duly and regularly elected and appointed by the board of public works of the city of Bridgeport to the office of street commissioner of said city; that he accepted said appointment, and on the 18th day of July, 1898, duly qualified, and entered upon the duties of said office; that the defendant on said 15th day of July, 1898, and thence continually hitherto, without legal warrant, claim, or right, has used and exercised, and still does use and exercise, the several powers, duties, and privileges belonging to said office of street commissioner, concerning which said powers, duties, and privileges the defendant has usurped, and still does usurp, at said Bridgeport, to the great damage and prejudice of the rights of the said city of Bridgeport and of the relator. The defendant, not denying the averments of the information, alleged that he had not at any time usurped said office; on the contrary, that he was on the 20th day of May, 1898, duly and regularly elected and appointed by the said board of public works of the said city of Bridgeport to the office of street commissioner for the period of one year from said date, and until his successor should be duly chosen and qualified; that he accepted said election, duly qualified, and entered upon the duties of said office; and that by virtue of the said election and qualification he has from said day continued, and still continues, to act as such street commissioner. And he prayed that, therefore, the said office and its privileges be adjudged to him. There was a hearing. The court made a finding of the facts, and reserved the case for the consideration and advice of this court. The facts necessary to be considered in giving advice in this case (condensed from the finding) are these: The charter of the city of Bridgeport has, since its earliest organization, provided for the existence of several boards, to be appointed by the mayor. One of these was a board of public works, to consist of six members. At the 1805 session of the general assembly the charter was wholly revised. This revised charter went into effect on the 1st day of July, 1895. It provided in its nineteenth section that "there shall continue to be a board of public works, and of charities, each of which shall consist of six members." The members held office for three years. The appointments were so arranged that two members went out of office, and two new ones were appointed, each year. Other boards were also provided for in the charter. The members of all such boards were to be appointed by the mayor. Another section provided that "the mayor shall ex officio be a member of said respective boards, but shall have no vote in any of their proceedings except in case of a tie vote. He shall preside at all meetings of said respective boards at which he may be present. The common council of said city had, pursuant to authority given by the charter, passed an ordinance, "that the board of public works shall keep or cause to be kept an accurate and correct record of all their official proceedings," etc., and that "they shall have power to make needful rules and regulations for the conduct of the business and affairs of said department, and for the control and regulation of the employees thereof." Acting under this ordinance, the board of public works, at a meeting held in May, 1896, adopted a body of rules, one of which was that "the board shall during the month of May in each year elect a president, a clerk, a street commissioner, and other officers; and each of said officers shall hold office for the term of one year from the date of such election, and until his successor is elected." On the 21st day of September, 1897, the board repealed the rules of May, 1896, and adopted a new body of rules, namely:

Sec. 1. The board of public works shall during the month of June in each year elect the following officers, to wit, a president, a clerk, a street commissioner, a superintendent of bridges; and each of said officers shall hold office for the term of one year from the date of his election, and until his successor shall be elected.

"Sec. 2. The clerk of said board shall keep an accurate and correct record of all the official proceedings, orders, contracts," etc., "of said board," etc.

Sections 6 and 7 prescribed the duties of the president of said board, viz., that he shall preside at all meetings, when the mayor is not present. It was his duty, under the rules of the board, to make all appointments of committees of members of said board, to which standing committees was referred the business coming before said board for appropriate action. He was also empowered, under the rules, to call meetings of the board whenever he deemed it necessary.

"Sec. 9. No motion to repeal or amend the foregoing rules shall be entertained by the president or presiding officer of the board of public works, unless notice of such repeal or amendment has been given at the last preceding meeting, unless by unanimous consent of all members present."

For the year following the 1st of June, 1897, the members of said board were Mr. Downer, Mr. Pierce, Mr. Somers, Mr. Ferguson, Mr. Waterhouse, and Mr. Thorne. On the 4th day of June, 1897, Mr. Somers was elected by said board to be its president. He has ever since continued to hold said office. At a meeting of said board duly called and held on the 10th day of May, 1898,—all the members being present,—Mr. Waterhouse gave notice that "at the next meeting of this board he would move to repeal or amend the rules of this board in accordance with such rules." At the next meeting of the board, duly called and held on the 20th day of May, 1898,—all the members being present, and the mayor being present and presiding,—action was taken as follows: "Mr. Waterhouse presented the following: 'According to my notice to this board at the last meeting, I hereby offer the following resolution. Resolved, that the last rules adopted by this board be, and the same are hereby, repealed.' Mayor Taylor ruled that the resolution was not in order, that such action was illegal, and declined to put the motion. Mr. Downer raised the point of order, that the notice given by Mr. Waterhouse at the last meeting was not a legal notice, under the rules, as it was not definite. The mayor sustained this point of order, and declined to put the motion. Mr. Pierce then declared that, as the mayor declined to put the motion, he would do so himself; and he called for a rising vote on the adoption of the motion, which resulted as follows: In the affirmative, Messrs. Pierce, Ferguson, Thorne, and Waterhouse. Mr. Pierce then declared the motion carried. Mr. Downer objected to this action, claiming that it was illegal. Mayor Taylor instructed the clerk not to make any record of this action, as it was illegal. Mr. Ferguson moved that the clerk be directed to record the proceedings. Mr. Pierce called for a rising vote on the motion, which resulted as follows: In the affirmative, Messrs. Pierce, Ferguson, Thorne, and Waterhouse. Mr. Pierce declared the motion carried. The board then, on the motion of Mr. Thorne, proceeded to an informal ballot for street commissioner, by a rising vote, called for by Mr. Pierce, which resulted as follows: Affirmative, Messrs. Pierce, Ferguson, Thorne, and Waterhouse. The clerk was by the same vote directed to count the ballots. Result of ballot, Benjamin F. Lashar, 5. The board then voted, by a rising vote,—the motion being put by Mr. Pierce,—to proceed to a vote by a formal ballot for street commissioner, and it resulted as follows: Affirmative, Messrs. Pierce, Ferguson, Thorne, and Waterhouse. Result of ballot, Benjamin F. Lashar, 3; James Hughes, 1. Mr. Pierce declared that there was no choice, and another ballot was taken, which resulted as follows. Benjamin F. Lashar, 4. Mr. Pierce declared Mr. Lashar elected street commissioner. . . . Mr. Taylor the mayor, desired the clerk to enter on the record his formal protest against all the proceedings in which Mr. Pierce acted as chairman, claiming that all such proceedings were illegal. Mr. Downer also protested on the same ground." It is found that at said meeting Mr. Somers, the president of the said board, was not requested by Mr. Pierce or either member of the board to put said motion, and that said Pierce was not requested by Mr. Somers to put said motions to vote, or to declare said vote, or act in the premises at all.

Messrs. Canfield & Judson, for relator:
The election of respondent in May, 1896, under the rules adopted for that purpose was illegal and void.

If the term contemplated by the charter had not ended in May, 1890, the election of a street commissioner for the incoming board would be illegal.

State, Bownes, v. Meehan, 45 N. J. L. 189; State, Haight, v. Love, 30 N. J. L. 14; People, Williams, v. Reid, 11 Colo. 138.

On May 20, 1898, a meeting of the board was held, and the mayor was present and presiding.

Mr. Waterhouse moved that the whole body of rules be repealed.

Mr. Downer objected, and raised the point of order, that the motion was not in order. Thus, there was, under parliamentary rules, a question pending that required the ruling and decision of the presiding officer. To decide the question pending was a charter duty, as incident to his power and right to preside.

His decision was, that the motion was not in order. No appeal was taken from this ruling, and, until appealed from and reversed by the votes of the board, it was the law for the board.

Cushing, Law & Practice of Legislative Assemblies, § 570.

It was not for Mr. Pierce to arbitrarily decide whether the mayor's ruling was correct, and he had no legal right to assume the functions of the presiding officer.

It was the clearest and baldest kind of usurpation of a charter right for Mr. Pierce to assume that office.

Cushing, Law & Practice of Legislative Assemblies, § 124.

Mr. Pierce was not the de facto presiding officer. He was an intruder, and his acts as such are void.

Messrs. DeForest & Klein and Phelan & Phelan, for respondent:

The city charter of Bridgeport provides that the board of public works shall have power to appoint a street commissioner for the period of "one year and until another is appointed and qualified in his stead."

In no place does it appear in the charter when such appointment is to be made, such appointment may therefore be made at any time in the direction of the board, immemorial custom or usage of preceding boards to the contrary notwithstanding.

The mayor, who was ex officio presiding officer, under § 17 of the charter, failed in his duty, as such, in refusing to place the Waterhouse resolution of repeal before the meeting; he was the servant of the meeting, not its master. His position did not empower him to arbitrarily cast aside any resolutions germane to the powers and duties of 44 L. R. A.

the board. His duty to the board was to be patient and obedient; to be the instrument through which its desires were to be manifested, and to give utterance to its will.

Cushing, Law & Practice of Legislative Assemblies, §§ 294-319; Dingwall v. Detroit, 82 Mich. 568.

There is no rule of law forbidding the majority, in parliamentary bodies, to impliedly suspend or repeal any or all rules of their own making, or of parliamentary usage, by taking action either inconsistent with or forbidden by such rules or usage. Every public body has a right to disregard its own rules when no vested interests are affected thereby.

Mr. Pierce not only had the active consent of a majority of the members of the board to act as chairman repealing the rules, but the passive consent of Mr. Somers, the president of the board, who by his silence throughout the proceedings fully assented to the acts of the majority.

Somers v. Bridgeport, 60 Conn. 527.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The information charges that the defendant has usurped, and that he still does usurp, the office of street commissioner of and for the city of Bridgeport. The defendant admits that he holds and occupies the said office, but he denies that he has at any time usurped the same. On the contrary, he insists that he was duly and legally elected to that office, and that, therefore, he may rightfully have, use, and enjoy the powers, privileges, and duties pertaining to the same. In substance, the question upon which the advice of this court is asked is this: Was the defendant lawfully elected to the office of street commissioner of the city of Bridgeport at the time and by the proceedings which are set forth in the finding? In answering this question, some subsidiary questions must be considered.

"An important feature of the law governing quo warranto informations, and one which most distinguishes this remedy from ordinary civil actions at law, is that the prosecutor is not obliged to show title in himself, to sustain the action, or to put the respondent upon the necessity of proving his title and the principle is well established that the burden rests upon the respondent of showing a good title to the office whose functions he claims to exercise, the state being only obliged to answer the particular claim of title asserted. . . . In proceedings in the nature of a quo warranto, the object being to test the actual right to the office, and not merely a use under color of right, it is incumbent upon the respondent to show a good legal title, and not merely a colorable one, since he must rely wholly on the strength of his own title. If he fails in this requirement, judgment of ouster will be given." High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 629: State, Reiley, v. Chatfield, 71 Conn. 104; People, Judson, v. Thacher, 55 N. Y. 525, 14 Am. Rep. 312; People, Smith, v. Pease, 30 Barb. 501. The city of Bridgeport is a municipal corporation created by its charter. Its charter is its enabling act, and indicates the full measure of its powers. Farrell v. Winchester Ave. R. Co. 61 Conn. 127. It can exert its powers only in the manner authorized by its charter. Head v. Providence Ins. Co. 2 Cranch, 127, 2 L. ed. 229. The city can do no act nor elect any officer, except it is authorized to do so by its charter. If the charter points out a particular way in which any act is to be done, or in which an officer is to be elected, then, unless these forms are pursued in the doing of any act, or in the electing of any officer, the act or the election is not lawful. In all such cases the form of the appointment is essential to its validity. Forma dat esse rei. Farrell v. Bridgeport, 45 Conn. 191; Johnston v. Allis, 71 Conn. 217; New Haven v. Whitney, 36 Conn. 373; District of Columbia v. Bailey, 171 U. S. 178, 43 L. ed. 126.

The charter of the city of Bridgeport provides for certain administrative boards. One of these is the board of public works, to consist of six members named by the mayor. And the charter prescribes that the mayor shall, ex officio, be a member of said board, but shall have no vote, except in case of a tie, and that "he shall preside at all its meetings at which he is present." These provisions of the charter make the mayor an essential constituent of the board, and assign to him by express command, the duty to preside at all its meetings at which he is present. If, being present at any meeting, he does not preside, then the board is not organized in the manner pointed out by the charter: and, although all the members should be present, if the mayor, being present, does not preside, it would be but an irregular assemblage of persons, unknown to the charter, and whose act, however formally gone through with or however carefully written out, would have no validity to bind the city, or to give title to any appointee. That this is the law is made clear by the authorities we have cited. The ordinances and rules made pursuant to the authority given in the charter provide for the office of a street commissioner, to be elected by the board of public works. The proceedings of that board by which the defendant claims to have been elected to the office he holds are set forth at some length in the finding. They show a meeting of the members of the board at which the mayor was present and willing to preside,—indeed, at which he sought to preside,—but that certain members of the board acted irregularly, in open and persistent disobedience to the authority and rights of the mayor as the presiding officer of the meeting, and, against his protest, pretended to pass and to announce the result of certain votes. It was one of the votes of these members while so acting irregularly that was given to the defendant, and by which alone he can claim to be elected. As to these votes, the proceedings recited show that the mayor did not act as presiding officer at all. He did not put the question. He did not declare the result. As to these votes, the persons who took part in them were not acting according to the forms nor within the powers conferred by the charter on the board of public works. In the case of Farrell v. Bridgeport, 45 Conn. 191, this court decided that in the appointment of a policeman, where the forms and steps prescribed by the charter had not been observed, there was no valid appointment. The office of street commissioner is not of less importance than that of policeman. In either case it is a question of charter power. What the charter commands must be obeyed, or the appointment is void. In the claimed election of the defendant the provisions of the charter were not obeyed. It seems to this court that the defendant was not appointed to the office of street commissioner of the city of Bridgeport according to the provisions of the charter of that city.

Counsel for the defendant, in their argument in this court, pass over the charter powers of the board of public works entirely. They treat the case as one depending alone on parliamentary law or parliamentary usage. They say that because the mayor, as the presiding officer of the board, declined to entertain the motion made by Mr. Waterhouse, any member might put the motion and declare the result, and that the action so taken is lawful and binding on the board, to the same extent as if the motion had been put by the presiding officer. They make a somewhat high-sounding talk to the effect that the presiding officer of any deliberative board or assembly is the servant of the body over which he presides, and not its master, and that, if a presiding officer attempts to dominate the assembly or to thwart its will, then any member may act in the place of the president. As an abstract proposition, perhaps no one would care to question it. So far as the facts in this case appear, there is no occasion to admit it or deny it. If such right exists, it is analogous to the right of revolution,—a right to be exercised only when all peaceful and regular methods have been tried and exhausted. Every presumption must be in favor of regular action, and against irregularity. Action which violates the regular rules of law can never be said strictly to be lawful. Such action is acquiesced in when a case of overmastering necessity is shown, or when fundamental rights are endangered. Nothing of that kind appears in the present case. Nothing is shown to indicate that the mayor, as presiding officer, intended or desired to do anything contrary to the will of the board. In declining to entertain the motion made by Mr. Waterhouse, and in sustaining the point of order made by Mr. Downer, he was acting very clearly within the lines of his duty and powers as the presiding officer. His good faith is to be presumed. In every assembly, small or large, which is governed by parliamentary law, there will be questions of order. These must be, in the first instance, decided by the presiding officer. In every such assembly, when a motion is made, it is the duty of the presiding officer to decide whether or not it is in order. If he deems it to be in order, he entertains it, and proceeds to lay it before the assembly in a proper way. If he deems it to be not in order, he declines to entertain it. This is just what the mayor did. He decided the question of order raised by Mr. Downer. Such a decision must be made by the presiding officer, subject to the right of appeal therefrom by any member. "When a question of order is raised, as it may be by any one member, it is not stated from the chair and decided by the assembly, like other questions, but is decided in the first instance by the presiding officer, without any previous debate or discussion by the assembly. If the decision of the presiding officer is not satisfactory, any one member may object to it, and have the question decided by the assembly. This is called 'appealing from the decision of the chair.' The question is then stated by the presiding officer on the appeal, namely, 'Shall the decision of the chair stand as the decision of the assembly?' and it is thereupon debated and decided by the assembly in the same manner as any other question, except that the presiding officer is allowed to take part in the debate, which on ordinary occasions he is prohibited from doing." Cushing, Parl. Law, § 154. In Mr. Cushing's larger work this same parliamentary law is stated in this way: "If the opinion [of the presiding officer] is acquiesced in, it stands as the judgment of the assembly, and is to be enforced or executed accordingly; but any member who obtains the floor for that purpose may appeal from it, and if the appeal is seconded, as it must generally be, and allowed, it then entirely abrogates the decision of the presiding officer, and refers the point of order to the decision of the assembly itself whose decision thereof furnishes the rule to be pursued afterwards." Cushing, Law & Practice of Legislative Assemblies, § 1464. The whole topic is treated in that work (part 6, chap. 6, art. 2, subtitle Questions of Order, §§ 1457-1471). At the meeting of the board of public works of the city of Bridgeport held on the 20th day of May, 1898, the mayor was present and willing to preside. If he did not preside, then the board was not organized as the charter commands. When, at that meeting, the mayor, as the presiding officer, ruled that the motion made by Mr. Waterhouse was not in order, and sustained the point of order raised by Mr. Downer, it was the privilege of Mr. Pierce, if he objected to that ruling, to appeal from it to the assembly. If, as is now contended, a majority of the board was of the same mind as Mr. Pierce, then on an appeal the decision of the presiding officer would have been reversed. Had that been done, it would have become the duty of the presiding officer to put the motion made by Mr. Waterhouse. To appeal would have been regular and lawful. Not to appeal, but to take another course, was irregular and in violation of parliamentary law. It is the duty of the presiding officer of any assembly "to put to vote all questions which are regularly moved or necessarily arise in the course of the proceedings, and to announce the result." Cushing, Parl. Law, § 27. It is this duty which the charter of the city of Bridgeport commands its mayor to perform at every meeting of the board of public works at which he is present. If he does not do this, he does not preside in the manner which the charter prescribes. It is the opinion of this court that all the votes alleged to have been taken at the said meeting of the said board which were not put by the mayor, and the result of which he did not announce, are wholly void. They are void because they violate parliamentary law, and because they violate the commands of the charter of the city. And as the defendant offers no evidence of his election to the office of street commissioner, other than one of the votes so taken, we think he does not show a good title to that office. He is not entitled to exercise its powers or to receive its salary. Farrell v. Bridgeport, 45 Conn. 191.

The Superior Court is advised to render judgment of ouster against the defendant.

The other Judges concur, except Hamersley, J., who dissents.

Hamersley, J., dissenting:

The charter authorized the board of public works to appoint a street commissioner. This appointment could be made at any time after the expiration of one year from the commencement of the term of the last appointee. The rules limiting an appointment to the month of June could not prevent a valid appointment in May. The charter puts no restriction on the mode of appointment, except that it shall be made at a meeting of the board where four members, exclusive of the mayor, are present, and shall receive the active, concurrent vote of four members. It appears by the record that the respondent was appointed street commissioner at a meeting when all the members were present, the mayor presiding, by the active, concurrent vote of four members. This record is not attacked, and is conclusive. It is immaterial, as affecting the validity of this appointment, what improprieties were committed by the presiding officer or other members prior to the action taken. The departure from or suspension of written or unwritten parliamentary rules, by the majority of an executive board, cannot affect its action, otherwise valid, duly ascertained and recorded. I totally dissent from the construction of the charter which gives the mayor power to prevent any action by the board of public works, by attending its meetings, and then refusing to put to vote all motions that may be made. Such power cannot be found in the charter.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS

v.

COMMONWEALTH of Kentucky, ex rel.
Samuel H. STONE, State Auditor, etc.

(.....Ky.....)

Public parks maintained at public expense, and buildings and appliances necessary to meet the demands of the fire department of a city, are within the terms of a constitutional provision exempting from taxation public property used for public purposes.

(Guffy and Whita, JJ., dissent.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Daviess County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding under Kentucky Statutes, § 4241, to have certain property of the defendant assessed for taxation. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. A. Dean, for appellant:

Neither prior to nor since the adoption of the present Constitution was any of the property subject to taxation.

When the decision in the Duvall case was made the legislature had not spoken on the subject, and the decision in that case was based upon the general rule against taxing the instrumentalities of government as a matter of public policy. The rule of construction announced in that case was even then too narrow, and has been criticised by many of the leading courts and law writers of the country.

See Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 773-775, and authorities cited; Cooley, Taxn. pp. 128, 129, 137, 172-174.

The legislature of the state then in session immediately took steps to abrogate the rule announced in that case.

The rule announced in Louisville v. Com. 1 Duv. 205, 85 Am. Dec. 624, is disregarded and in effect overruled by this court in Greenwood v. Louisville, 13 Bush, 226, 26 Am. Rep. 263; and Pollock v. Louisville, 13 Bush, 221, 26 Am. Rep. 260.

This doctrine is approved in Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 265, and 2 Thomp. Neg. p. 735.

The enactment of the present Constitution and the tax laws under it do not change the rule, except, perhaps, to make it broader.

Covington v. Com. 19 Ky. L. Rep. 105.

Public parks were never taxed or any decision or authority holding them subject to taxation. In all decisions and authorities on the subject they are treated as necessary governmental functions for the promotion and protection of the public health and as worthy of encouragement rather than discouragement.

See Dill. Mun. Corp. § 598; Cooley, Taxn. pp. 128, 129, 137, 172-174; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 412; St. Louis v. Gorman, 29 Mo. 593, 27 Am. Rep. 580.

NOTE.—As to what purposes are public for which public moneys may be used, see note to Daggett v. Colgan (Cal.) 14 L. R. A. 474.

Messrs. W. S. Morrison and T. L. Karm for appellee.

Paynter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal involves the question as to the right of the commonwealth to compel the city of Owensboro to pay taxes upon property as follows, to wit: (1) The fire department property, including engine houses and grounds on which situated, fire engines, hose reels, hook and ladder wagons, hose, and necessary horses. (2) A public park of the city.

At the time the case of Louisville v. Com. 1 Duv. 295, 85 Am. Dec. 624, was decided, there was no statute defining what part of the property belonging to municipalities should pay tax, or what part should be exempt from taxation. The language of the statute then in force was so comprehensive as to embrace all property as taxable which belonged to municipalities. The court held that the law constructively applied to persons only, and not at all to public bodies exercising, in different degrees, the sovereignty of the state; and that "the city of Louisville, to the extent of the jurisdiction delegated to it by its charter, is but an effluence from the sovereignty of Kentucky, governs for Kentucky, and its authorized legislation and local administration of law are legislation and administration by Kentucky through the agency of that municipality." The court was of the opinion that the exception specified in the statute did not imply that municipal property, "used for public purposes of local government," was to be taxed, and adjudged that the property of the city of Louisville, "used for carrying on its municipal government," was exempt from taxation. In determining what property was constructively subject to, and what was exempt from, taxation under the statute, it said: "Whatever property, such as court-house, prison, and the like, which became necessary or useful to the administration of the municipal government, and is devoted to that use, is exempt from state taxation: but whatever is not so used, but is owned and used by Louisville in its social or commercial capacity as a private corporation, and for its own profit, such as vacant lots, market houses, fire engines, and the like, is subject to taxation. If, however, as just indicated, the property owned by the city as a private corporation is not used for profit to the city, but is dedicated to charity, it is not constructively subject to taxation under any existing law." The effect of the opinion is that, under the statute, the court could not adjudge any property belonging to the municipality exempt from taxation except such as was used for charity, or used or needed for a governmental purpose, and the court concluded that engine houses were not used or needed for that purpose. The opinion of the court in 1 Duv. 295, 85 Am. Dec. 624, is criticised by Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 774, note 1, wherein it is, in effect, said the exemption by implication should have extended to all the property of the city sought to be taxed. Cooley, Taxn. pp. 173, 174, likewise criticises the opinion by saying it limits the implied exemption unreasonably.

We recognize as just in part the criticism made by the learned authors. The case was decided in February, 1864, and at a time when the general assembly was in session. That body evidently was of the opinion that the court did not give the construction to the statute which the legislative department of the government intended it to have; for on the 22d of February, 1864, an act was approved which provides "that all property belonging to any city or town of this commonwealth, and which is necessary to the carrying on the government of such city or town, viz., police courthouses, mayor's offices, including offices for the various city or town officers in said buildings, fire engine houses, engines and horses belonging thereto, work houses, alms houses, hospitals, pest houses, together with the grounds belonging thereto, be and the same is hereby exempt from all taxation." By the express declaration of the act, engines and engine houses were necessary to carrying on the government of cities. This statute remained in force until the enactment of the "Hewitt Law," in which there was a clause for the exemption of property belonging to counties, cities, and towns in the following language, to wit: "Property owned in its entirety by counties, cities, and towns, which is necessary to carry on the government of such county, city, or town." Gen. Stat. ed. 1888, p. 1036. This provision remained in force until the adoption of the present Constitution, § 170 of which reads as follows: "There shall be exempt from taxation public property used for public purposes." From this section it must be determined whether or not the municipality must pay taxes upon the property mentioned.

It is hardly necessary to observe that a municipality is an arm of the state, an "effluence" from its sovereignty, and is an instrumentality by which the state seeks to give to its citizens the best government possible. The police force of a city is for the protection of the lives and property of the citizens of the state, but especially within the limits of the municipality, and the cost of maintaining it is paid at public expense. The firemen of a municipality are paid out of taxes levied for that purpose, and they are maintained to protect the lives and property of citizens of the commonwealth. The firemen of a city are just as essential to its safety and proper government as is its police force. The fire department can only be effective by having engines, engine houses, and appliances which are usual in meeting the demands on the department. The property of a city used in connection with its fire department is, in our opinion, public property, used for public purposes, and is necessary to its government. Hickman Park is a public park, maintained at public expense, not for profit, but for the public good. It is open to the rich and poor alike, whether they live in or outside the city. The municipal authorities are charged with the duty of maintaining the public health, and, in the judgment of scientific men, it is essential to the public health that cities have and maintain parks, where the people can breathe wholesome air. People of this enlightened age justify the levying of taxes to maintain them. They are just as much public property, used for public purposes, as are the streets, and trees planted therein, and it would be just as proper and reasonable to tax the one as the other. The public have access to and enjoy both. In our opinion, the public park is public property, used for public purposes, and necessary to the proper government of a city. Besides, why should an "effluence" from the sovereignty pay taxes to it on property which is essential to the proper discharge of the duty imposed of maintaining the public health?

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Guffy, J., dissenting (Filed January 27, 1899):

The object of this action was to require the appellant to list certain property for taxation, as set up in the statement and pleadings mentioned. The judgment of the court below held that engine house No. 1, situated on the north side of Fourth street, and fronting 50 feet thereon, and running back by parallel lines about 60 feet, and which lies between St. Ann and Allen streets, in said city, of the value of $1,000 for the years 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896, and 1897; and one lot known as "Engine House Lot No. 2," in the city of Owensboro, of the value of $2,500, for each of said years; and also a parcel of ground situated about 2 miles south of said city of Owensboro, known as "Hickman Park," describing the same, and containing 23.73 acres, for said years, at the value of $2,200 for each of said years; and also five horses, of the value of $75 each, and also four mules, of the value of $50 each, for said years; and two hose reels, of the value of $155, and also one hose, of the value of $500, and also one hook and ladder wagon, of the value of $100, and also one chemical engine, of the value of $500, for each of said years, —were all liable for the taxes claimed; and it was further adjudged that, in addition to the taxes hereinbefore set out, the appellant is liable for 20 per cent on the total amount of said taxes due, and the costs of this proceeding. From the aforesaid judgment this appeal is prosecuted, and the question presented for decision is whether the aforesaid property is liable to taxation under the laws of this commonwealth.

The majority opinion of this court holds that the engine house and the fixtures, and the park property, aforesaid, are all exempt from taxation, and assumes that the same is public property, used for governmental purposes. I dissent entirely from the conclusion reached by the majority opinion. The engine, etc., is nothing more or less than private property, used for the exclusive benefit of the citizens of Owensboro, and is in no sense used for governmental purposes. From the pleadings in this case, it is clear that the park is the exclusive property of the city of Owensboro, and used as a luxury and convenience for the people of Owensboro. It may be that the public have access to the same, but such access is manifestly subject to the will of the city of Owensboro, and, at most, can only be said to be a convenience or luxury to those enjoying the same, and is in no sense property used for public purposes. It seems to me that the majority opinion in this case is in conflict with all the former decisions of this court upon the question under consideration. In the case of Covington v. Com., 19 Ky. L. Rep. 103, this court said: "The commonwealth of Kentucky brought this action to recover possession of a tract of land held and claimed by the city of Covington, upon which had been erected waterworks. The facts upon which the right of recovery is based are, as stated in the petition, that, the city of Covington having failed to pay the state and county taxes due on said property for 1895 at the assessed value, it was, in December, 1895, duly and legally offered for sale by the sheriff, who, no other person bidding, purchased it for the commonwealth at the price of $2,189, sum of taxes unpaid. It is stated in the answer as defense that, for reasons set forth, said property was exempt from all taxation, and consequently the assessment and sale, under which the commonwealth now claims title and right of possession, were illegal and invalid. To that answer a demurrer was sustained, and judgment rendered in favor of the commonwealth for a writ of possession; but, as recited in the judgment, counsel agreed the only question they wished decided is whether the property in question is liable to state tax. The grounds upon which are based the claim of the city of Covington to exemption of the property from taxation are as follows: (1) That a provision is contained in 'An Act to Amend the Charter of the City of Covington,' approved May 1, 1886, in these words: 'Said reservoir or reservoirs, pumping house, machinery, pipes, mains, and appurtenances, with the land upon which they are situated, shall be and remain forever exempt from state, county, and city taxes.' In Louisville v. Com. 1 Duv. 295, 85 Am. Dec. 624, where the question arose as to exemption from taxation of various articles of property owned by that city, a distinction was expressly recognized between property owned and used for public purposes of a local government, or used in carrying on a municipal government, and property used, not for that purpose, but only for the convenience or profit of its citizens, individually or collectively. And in Com. v. Makibben, 90 Ky. 384, where, the question being whether the waterworks property of the city of Newport was, in pursuance of a special act to that effect, exempt from taxation, it was held not to be so, because not necessary or used to carry on the municipal government as a political power, but held and used merely for convenience and profit of its citizens. Immediately following that case is the case of Clark v. Louisville Water Co. 90 Ky. 515, where the same question arose, 44 L. R. A.

and for the same reason it was held an act exempting from taxation the property of the Louisville Water Company was in violation of the Constitution, and, moreover, that the fact that the water company might incidentally protect public buildings of the state and city did not have the effect to validate the statute. (2) It is argued that as upon the faith and in pursuance of the special statute of May 1, 1886, the city of Covington, by taxation of the property of its citizens, purchased the land, and erected thereon the waterworks in question, at great expense, it has acquired a contract right to the exemption now claimed; but it seems to us, if the general assembly was, as we think, without constitutional authority to make the contract, assuming one was made, it is not nor could be valid or enforceable. Besides, by general statute enacted February 14, 1856, and continued in force to the present time, the special act under which the exemption is now claimed, and all others like it, were rendered subject to repeal at the will of the general assembly. And thus we come to consider the third ground upon which the exemption is claimed and that involves the inquiry whether § 170 of the present Constitution, and the statute passed in pursuance of it, operated to repeal or continue in force that part of the special act of May 1, 1886, which exempts said waterworks property from taxation. The subject of § 170 is 'Revenue and Taxation,' and so much of it as applies to this case is in these words: 'There shall be exempt from taxation public property used for public purposes.' It was followed by necessary statutory enactments, which, however, could neither curtail nor enlarge exemption from taxation as prescribed by the Constitution. And accordingly, in § 4026, Ky. Stat. adopted for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of § 170, is the identical language we have quoted. As it was manifestly intended, by both the Constitution and statute, to make subject to taxation all property not thereby, in express terms, exempted, it results that, unless the waterworks property of the city of Covington be, in language or meaning of § 170, 'public property used for public purposes,' it must be held, like similar property in other cities, subject to taxation, and the special act of May 1, 1886, stands repealed. Assuming, as a reasonable and beneficial rule of construction requires done, that the phrase 'for public purposes' was intended to be construed and understood according to previous judicial interpretation and usage, there can be no doubt of the proper meaning and application of it; for in the cases cited, and others where the question of subjecting particular property of cities to taxation arose, the words 'for public purposes' had been held by this court to mean, in that connection, the same as the words 'for governmental purposes'; and so property used by a city for public or governmental purposes was held to be exempt, while that adapted and used for profit or convenience of the citizens, individually or collectively, was held to be subject to taxation; and, recognizing and applying that distinction, waterworks property of a city had been invariably treated by this court as belonging to the latter class, and, consequently, subject to state and county taxation."

It is perfectly manifest that the engine house and appurtenances are for the exclusive benefit of the citizens of Owensboro, and in no sense used for governmental purposes, any more than the appliances or conveniences, resorted to by an individual citizen of any county or neighborhood, which he might procure to protect his property from destruction by fire; and it would hardly be contended that an engine house, and the necessary appurtenances, which add to the value of a farm, were exempt from taxation.

So far as the park is concerned, it is exclusively for the social and personal convenience and enjoyment of the parties entitled thereto, and cannot, in any sense, be said to be for governmental purposes, and, so far as this record shows, is the absolute property of the municipality of Owensboro, subject to be sold for any purpose that the municipality may desire to sell it, and is no more entitled to exemption from taxation than a park or pleasure ground of any other citizen of the state. The fact that it may be said to be owned by several thousand people can no more exempt it from taxation than the property of a number of farmers, which in like manner is owned by them. The effect of the majority opinion is to require the citizens of the state at large to pay for a park to be enjoyed by the citizens of Owensboro and such other persons as may be allowed access thereto; because the exemption of that property from taxation necessarily requires an increase of taxation upon the other property of the state that is held liable for taxes. It seems to me that the majority opinion is in direct conflict with the decisions of this court in the following cases, to wit: Louisville v. Com. 1 Duv. 295, 85 Am. Dec. 624; Com. v. Makibben, 90 Ky. 384; Clark v. Louisville Water Co. 90 Ky. 515; Cooley, Taxn. p. 482; Com. v. Masonic Temple Co. 87 Ky. 349; Louisville v. Louisville Bd. of Trade, 90 Ky. 409; 9 L. R. A. 629; Barbour v. Louisville Bd. of Trade, 82 Ky. 645; Covington v. Com. 19 Ky. L. Rep. 105; Roberts v. Louisville, 92 Ky. 95, 13 L. R. A. 844.

The question of streets or sidewalks is not at all analogous to the property in question. Public streets and public passways are well known to be essential to governmental purposes, as affording means of ingress and egress to and from public places; and it has ever been the law that a street or public highway is alike dedicated to public use, and beyond the power of any corporation or municipality to restrict the use of the same, or to deprive anyone from access to and from the same. But in the case at bar the engine house and the appurtenances and the park are the exclusive property of the municipality of Owensboro, and of necessity are under the exclusive control of the municipality, which is, in effect, a corporation. They are not used, and cannot be used, for the suppression of crime, nor the punishment for a violation of any statute law, nor the redress of any individual grievance, nor the enforcement of individual rights or remedies. "Governmental purposes" can only mean, in its most extensive sense, the punishment for crime, for prevention of wrong, the enforcement of a private right, or in some manner preventing wrong from being inflicted upon the public, or upon an individual, or redressing some grievance, or in some way enforcing a legal right, or redressing or preventing a public or individual injury. I am utterly unable to see that the engine house or the park is necessary to accomplish any of the foregoing objects. In fact, it is palpable that they do not contribute in any degree thereto. Section 170 of the Constitution only exempts "public property" from taxation, and, as I understand that term, has always been construed by this court to mean such property as is used necessarily "for governmental purposes." If we are to construe the word "public" to mean all property that the public have unrestricted access to, without charge, then every railroad depot must be exempt from taxation, because depots are used for public purposes, the public having free access to the same without any charge therefor; and the same may be said of various other articles of property that are owned by corporations, but are free to the public. The majority opinion makes no reference as to whether the mules involved in the action should be taxed or not, and I am unable to determine, from the opinion in this case, what is now the status of the mules in reference to taxation, and, inasmuch as they are "without pride of ancestry or hope of posterity," I will leave them as I find them; but I earnestly dissent from all that part of the majority opinion which holds the engine house and appurtenances thereto and the park property exempt from taxation.

McSherry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is another savings bank deposit case, but it is unlike any of the numerous ones that have preceded it. The facts are few and simple. Elizabeth O'Neill, on the 24th day of April, 1895, opened an account in the Metropolitan Savings Bank. In the pass-book which she then received, the following entry appears: "Metropolitan Savings Bank, in account with Miss Elizabeth O'Neill. In trust for herself and Mrs. Mary Whalen, widow, joint owners, subject to the order of either; the balance at the death of either to belong to the survivor." This entry was made at the instance and upon the request of Miss O'Neill, and the teller of the bank testified that "the entry as it appears in this book carried out . . . and embodies the instructions given . . . at the time the account was opened."

There is a by-law of the bank which provides that "every deposit made by one person for the benefit of another person shall be expressed to be 'in trust,' and no deposit shall be received, or to be expressed to be received, from one person 'by' another person, or by one person 'for' another person." The bank-book was retained by Miss O'Neill. The aggregate of the deposits foots up to $2,323.40. There was drawn out by Miss O'Neill in varying amounts, during her life, the sum of $520; and, after the death of Miss O'Neill, Mrs. Whalen withdrew $125. There are two claimants of the balance now on deposit, viz.: Mrs. Whalen and Miss O'Neill's executor. Upon a bill filed by the bank they have been required to interplead. On this state of facts the law is well settled.

"Where a person intends to give property to another, and vests that property in trustees, and declares a trust upon it in favor of the subject of his bounty, by such acts the gift is perfected, and the author of the trust loses all dominion over it; and in such gifts of mere personal estate the declaration of trust may be made and proved by parol, without the aid of writing. And the cases go the length of maintaining that where the author of the gift retains the legal dominion over the subject of the gift in himself, but fully and completely declares himself to be trustee of the property for the purposes indicated, there he will be treated as trustee, and the object of his bounty will be given the benefit of the trust. In all such cases the declaration of trust is considered in a court of equity as equivalent to an actual transfer of the legal interest in a court of law; and if the transaction by which the trust is created be complete, it will not be treated as invalid for want of consideration." Taylor v. Henry, 48 Md. 559; Kilpin v. Kilpin, 1 Mvl. & K. 520; M'Fadden v. Jenkins, 1 Phil. Ch. 163; Cox v. Hill, 6 Md. 274; Smith v. Darby, 30 Md. 268.

In Jones v. Lock, L. R. 1 Ch. 25, Lord Cranworth observed: if a man chooses to give away anything which passes by delivery he may do so, and there is no doubt, in the absence of fraud, a parol declaration of trust may be perfectly good, even though it be voluntary. If I give any chattel that, of course, passes by delivery, and if I expressly or impliedly say I constitute myself trustee of such and such personal property for a person, that is a trust executed, and this court will enforce it, in the absence of fraud, even in favor of a volunteer. . . . The authorities all turn upon the question whether what took place was a declaration of trust or merely an imperfect attempt to make a legal transfer of the property. In the latter case the court will afford no assistance to volunteers; but when the court considers that there has been a declaration of trust, it is a trust executed, and the court will enforce it whether with or without consideration.

There are many cases to be found in the reports where these familiar principles have been applied to deposits in savings banks. We will allude to some of them, not because they make the principles any more obvious, but because they furnish illustrations of the application of those principles to just such contentions as this litigation presents.

It will be observed that the bank is not, by the terms of the deposit, made the trustee, and we have, therefore, no question confronting us as to the power of a corporation to act in that capacity. The contract between Miss O'Neill and the bank as evidenced by the words of the entry and as understood by her, according to the testimony in the record, constituted Miss O'Neill the trustee; and, if effective at all, operated to divest the title to the money out of her individually, and to vest it in her as trustee for the purposes expressed.

According to all the cases, if she intended to accomplish this result, it was perfectly competent to her to do it, and to do it in that way; and when done it constituted a complete change in the ownership of the money. Her intention to do precisely what was done is not left in doubt, for the testimony of the bank's teller is clear and emphatic that the entry represents exactly and literally what Miss O'Neill desired to consummate. Such a declaration of trust differs widely from a gift inter vivos and from a donatio mortis causa. These, to be effective at all, require a delivery of the thing itself, and must pass the whole title, so that the donor can have no further dominion or control over it; but a gift in trust withholds the legal title from the donee. The legal title may be transmitted to a third person, or it may be retained by the donor, but in either case the equitable title has gone from him, and unless the declaration of trust contains a power of revocation it leaves him powerless to extinguish the trust. Bath Sav. Inst. v. Hathorn, 88 Me. 122, 32 L. R. A. 377.

In the application of the principles we have just stated to deposits in savings banks there have been some divergence of views, but no dispute as to the principles themselves. There is one line of cases which holds that to perfect the trust knowledge of the deposit must be communicated to the beneficiary; whilst the opposite line holds the deposit to be sufficient of itself, as a declaration of trust, to vest the beneficial interest in the cestui que trust, if that was the intention of the depositor. But it can, upon principle, make no possible difference whether the depositor communicates the fact of the deposit to the beneficiary or not (except in so far as the communication may be evidence of the intention with which the deposit was made) for the validity of the trust does not depend on the assent of the cestui que trust, but wholly upon the intention of the depositor and apt declaration of the trust.

The distinction between these two lines of cases is not a difference of principle. The cases of the first group hold that notice of the fact of the deposit to the beneficiary is necessary evidence of the creation of the trust, as contradistinguished from an act necessary to be done to create the trust; whilst the other cases treat the entry itself, or any other competent evidence of the existence of the intention to establish a trust, as sufficient, even though the beneficiary be in total ignorance of it. It is, at most, a difference as to the quality of the evidence needed to prove the trust, not a difference as to the method by which such a trust may be created. In Maryland it is not requisite that the cestui que trust should be notified of the declaration or establishment of the trust. Smith v. Darby, 39 Md. 278. It is the donor's act which originates the trust, and it is the intention with which he does the act that is material. The entry unexplained is a sufficient declaration of trust, because it indicates an intention to establish a trust; but this may be rebutted.

Possession by the depositor of the bank book in no way detracts from the force of the entry; because it is a possession by the trustee, and does not denote that no beneficial interest had been given to the cestui que trust. Minor v. Rogers, 40 Conn. 512, 16 Am. Rep. 69. If the delivery of the money to a bank to be placed to the credit of the depositor in trust for another, and the declaration of the trust as evidenced by the entry made pursuant to the settlor's instructions, constitute and evidence a valid trust, then no act of the depositor in subsequently withdrawing the money can affect the rights of the cestui que trust, unless the power to withdraw be reserved.

In Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 134, 31 Am. Rep. 446, the account as opened was: "The Citizens' Savings Bank in account with Susan Boone, in trust for Tillie Willard." The account was opened in 1866 and the depositor retained possession of the bank-book until her death in 1875. The beneficiary was not informed of the existence of the account. It was held that such a transaction, unexplained, and followed by the death of the depositor with the account still open, created a valid trust. And so in Willis v. Smyth, 91 N. Y. 297. In Savre v. Weil, 94 Ala. 460, 15 L. R. A. 545, it was held that a trust is complete and irrevocable where a person makes a deposit of money in bank to the credit of himself as trustee for certain children named, and that nothing remained to him but a mere naked legal title.

In Re Gaffney, 146 Pa. 49, the facts were that Hugh Gaffney deposited $560 in the Johnstown Savings Bank in his name in trust for Polly McKim, and the supreme court of Pennsylvania said: "We have, then, the case of a deposit on the books of the bank of a sum of money in the name of Hugh Gaffney, trustee for Polly McKim. This makes out at least a prima facie case for the appellant. Upon the face of the bank book the money belonged to Polly McKim and there is not sufficient upon the record to rebut this presumption." In Gerrish v. New Bedford Inst. for Sav. 128 Mass. 159, the facts were as follows: A, after depositing the maximum amount allowed by the bank, placed other sums in the name of himself, as trustee for his son and his granddaughter. He retained the pass books and during his life collected the interest.

The son and granddaughters offered to prove that A had said to them at various times "that he had put this money in the bank for them, but he wanted to draw the interest during his lifetime, and after he was gone they were to have the money." It was held that the evidence was admissible, and that upon all the evidence a jury would be justified in finding that A had fully constituted himself a trustee for the claimants. See the very full notes to Ounningham v. Davenport, 147 N. Y. 43, 32 L. R. A. 373; and 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 735; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 61, and the numerous cases in note 2, 18 Am. Law Rev. 379.

Without multiplying illustrations, or overburdening this opinion with further references, those just given suffice to show that such a deposit as we are now dealing with constitutes a valid declaration of trust, in the absence of contravening proof; and that when a trust is thus created the rights of the beneficiary become fixed, even though the settlor retains the bank book in his possession. Nor does the circumstance that the depositor makes himself a beneficiary jointly with another prevent the trust from attaching to the fund. A trust is not rendered void by the appointment of a beneficiary as trustee. 1 Perry, Tr. § 297; Woods v. Woods, 1 Myl. & C. 401; Crockett v. Crockett, 1 Hare, 451, 2 Phill. Ch. 553; Hill, Trusts & Trustees, p. 65, note 1; Story v. Palmer, 46 N. J. Eq. 1; Rogers v. Rogers, 18 Hun, 409.

We have, then, a valid declaration of trust impressed upon the funds in bank, and the bank holding them, not as trustees, but for the trustee, with knowledge of the conditions of the trust. The trustee was seized of the money for the use of herself and her sister, as joint owners of the equitable interest; and both were authorized to draw the funds upon producing the bank book. This is not all. The declaration of trust transferred to the trustee the legal title for the benefit of the survivor of the two cestuis que trust, as to the balance of the fund remaining in bank at the death of either. By the terms of the declaration of trust, upon the death of Miss O'Neill, the balance on deposit became Mrs. Whalen's property, not by a gift and delivery of the bank book, nor by the right of survivorship as one of two joint owners, nor by a gift of the funds, inter vivos; but purely and exclusively because the trust as declared in 1895, stripped Miss O'Neill of her individual ownership of the money, and vested the money in her in trust, as to this balance, for Mrs. Whalen, if the latter happened to outlive Miss O'Neill. The statute of uses, 27 Henry VIII., chap. 10, has no application to this case, and the title to the funds is unaffected by the operation of that enactment. "When a trust has been created in personalty, and all the purposes of the trust have ceased, or are at an end, the absolute estate is in the person entitled to the last use." Denton v. Denton, 17 Md. 407.

What obligations or liabilities, if any, the bank, as custodian of the fund, assumed by accepting the deposit upon the trusts declared; or how far it would be accountable to the cestui que trust, if it knowingly participated in the disposition or waste of the trust funds, or an appropriation of them to a purpose foreign to the trust, are questions not now before us, and a discussion of them is not required in disposing of the conflicting claims of the parties to this controversy.

Miss O'Neill had the power to fasten a trust on her own property for the benefit of herself and another where the rights of creditors were not interfered with; and she could lawfully do this and retain in her own possession the evidence of her having done it. Carson v. Phelps, 40 Md. 73. That she knowingly, and with a full appreciation of 44 L. R. A.

what she was about, did create and declare this trust, is confessedly clear; and there is no rule of law which forbids its enforcement when thus satisfactorily established, and when no superior claims of creditors are invaded.

Our conclusion, founded on well-recognized legal principles and on carefully considered judicial precedents, is that Mary Whalen, as cestui que trust, is entitled to the fund on deposit in the Metropolitan Savings Bank; and as the decree appealed from awarded that fund to her, it will be affirmed.

Decree affirmed, with costs in this court and in the court below to be paid by the executor of Miss O'Neill out of her estate.

Elizabeth O'Neill, Deceased.

(.....Md.....)

1. No perfected gift is made of a savings-bank deposit by depositing it in the names of donor and donee, making it payable to the order of either or to the survivor, and by the words "Joint owners" stamped on the pass book, where the donor continues in possession of the pass book, and therefore retains dominion over the funds, with the right at any moment to withdraw the whole of it.
2. A gift of savings-bank deposits is made by delivery of the pass book from the donor to the donee, describing them as joint owners, and making the money payable to the order of either, or the survivor, when it is done with the intention of donating the fund and preserving no control over it.
3. The evidence to establish a gift must be explicit and convincing in support of every element needed to constitute a valid donation.

APPEAL by the alleged donee from a decree of the Circuit Court of Baltimore City awarding to the executor of the donor a fund consisting of a savings-bank deposit alleged to have been given to the donee, which was rendered upon an interpleader bill by the bank to settle the respective rights of the claimants. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Willis & Homer, for appellant:

The money is deposited so as to give both to the decedent and to the appellant absolute power over the funds deposited, according as one or the other had actual possession of the book of deposit, and when, therefore, the depositor of the money, Elizabeth O'Neill, the decedent, transferred and delivered to the appellant the possession of said books, she completed beyond the power of recall the gift to her of the funds deposited.

Messrs. James McColgan and Charles W. Milholland for appellee.

McSherry, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The controversy in this case grows out of a savings bank deposit. There are two claimants of the fund. The savings bank filed a bill of interpleader making them parties. The contest is, consequently, confined to them.

It is undisputed that on and prior to May 6, 1891, Elizabeth O'Neill had on deposit to her own credit in the Savings Bank of Baltimore the sum of $2,100.42. And it is equally beyond contention that this money belonged to her and to no one else. On that day she closed the account, and the same money was, at once, entered to the credit of Elizabeth O'Neill and her sister, Mary Whalen. Whether the money was really drawn and redeposited does not appear; but as such a course was wholly unnecessary to effect the change actually made, it is highly probable that it was not resorted to. The entry as it now stands in the deposit or pass book is in these words: "Elizabeth O'Neill and Mary Whalen. Joint owners. Payable to the order of either or the survivor." When this account was opened on May 6, it read: "Elizabeth O'Neill and Mary Whalen. Payable to the order of either or the survivor," but later on the words "Joint owners" were added, when that form was adopted by the bank.

Both of these entries were placed on the deposit or pass book by a stamp. There is nothing whatever in the record to show when the words "Joint owners" were stamped upon the pass book, and not the slightest suggestion that they were placed there with Miss O'Neill's knowledge or consent. She could not read and there is no evidence tending to show that she knew the words "Joint owners" were there. After the account was opened she added by deposits and accrued interest the sum of $1,003.36 and she drew out amounts aggregating $636.05. She retained possession of the pass book from the opening of the account up to the time of her decease, unless the contention of Mrs. Whalen that it was delivered to her a few hours before her sister's death, is well founded.

Miss O'Neill died in September, 1897, leaving a last will and testament. Mr. A. V. Milholland is named as the executor therein. Mary Whalen claims the funds in dispute, and she claims them under the terms of the deposit and by virtue of an alleged delivery of the pass book, whilst, on the other hand, the executor of Miss O'Neill insists that they are payable as assets of her estate.

Starting with the concession, or if not with the concession with the indisputable fact, that prior to the deposit of May 6 the money in controversy was the property of Miss O'Neill, there is no escape from the conclusion that it continued to be hers, and now forms part of her estate if she did not act by which she parted with that ownership. There is no pretense that anything evidences a surrender by Miss O'Neill of her interest and estate in this money, other than the entry in the pass book and the alleged delivery of that book, or both combined.

This court has frequently had occasion to consider cases growing out of similar deposits. There ought not now to be, even if there ever was, any uncertainty about the legal principles which should control the decision of such a controversy. The money being the property of the depositor, the fundamental question always is: Has a valid and effective gift been made of it to another? To make a gift perfect and complete, there must be an actual transfer by the donor of all right and dominion over the thing given; and there must be an acceptance by the donee or by some competent person for him. In addition to this it is essential to the validity of such gift, that it should go into effect, or, in other words, transfer the property, at once and completely; for if it has reference to a future time when it is to operate as a transfer, it is nothing more than a promise without consideration, and cannot be enforced either in law or in equity. Until the gift is legally perfect and complete, a locus penitentiae remains, and the owner may make any other disposition of the property that he or she may think proper. Taylor v. Henry, 48 Md. 557, 30 Am. Rep. 486; Gorman v. Gorman, 87 Md. 338; Pennington v. Gittings, 2 Gill & J. 208; Murray v. Cannon, 41 Md. 476; Dougherty v. Moore, 71 Md. 249. "There is no case," said Gibbs, Ch. J., "which decides that the donor may resume the possession and the donation continue." Bunn v. Markham, 7 Taunt. 224.

It needs no discussion, especially since the decision of the cases of Taylor v. Henry, 48 Md. 557, 30 Am. Rep. 486, and Dougherty v. Moore, 71 Md. 249, to show that the entry as originally made, viz.: "Elizabeth O'Neill and Mary Whalen, payable to the order of either or the survivor," is wholly insufficient to effect a transfer and delivery of the funds to Mrs. Whalen, or to place them beyond the power of Miss O'Neill to reclaim. The deposit in the names of Miss O'Neill and Mrs. Whalen, was payable to the order of either or the survivor. Miss O'Neill having by this form of entry retained undoubted power to draw the money out of the bank whenever she pleased obviously did not divest herself of dominion over it. There was nothing to prevent her from checking out every cent of the fund immediately, or at any time, after the deposit in the two names had been made. If this be true—and it cannot be questioned—there was no perfected gift to Mrs. Whalen, and she consequently acquired no interest in the fund by the form of the entry as it then stood.

The form of the entry in the Taylor Case was: "Joseph Henry, Margaret Taylor, and the survivor of them, subject to the order of either:" and in the Moore Case it was: "Lawrence McDonald, Sarah McDonald, and the survivor, subject to the order of either." These are identical in legal effect with the entry we are now dealing with (for we are excluding, for the present, the words "joint owners") and both were held to be insufficient to transfer the funds to the survivor.

But much stress was laid on the words "Joint owners" which were subsequently stamped on the pass book. Of themselves these two words, as we said in Gorman v. Gorman, 87 Md. 338, are not sufficient in a deposit made in a savings bank to transfer title to the fund—that is, they are not sufficient to convert the fund from being the property of the person to whom it belongs into the property of the original owner and another individual.

Whatever their technical import may be when employed in other instruments, they cannot operate to vest an ownership to the extent of one half of the fund in someone else, when, under the terms and according to the legal effect of the very paper in which they are used, the depositor retains such a dominion over the fund deposited that he may at any moment withdraw the whole of it. If these two words do not restrict the authority of the depositor to draw the money, they do not limit or curtail his control over it; and if his control over it is not limited or curtailed there is obviously left to him a locus penitentiae, and there is, consequently, no perfected donation.

That the words "Joint owners" do not, and were not intended to, restrain the depositor from forthwith drawing out of bank the whole fund deposited, is apparent; because, in spite of their use, the other words of the entry expressly declare that the fund shall be payable to either of the parties named, and therefore to the one to whom it originally belonged and who caused the entry to be made in that particular form. Always bearing in mind that the fund belonged to only one of the parties named as joint owners, and that you are searching for evidence tending to show a gift of that fund, or a part of it, to a person who confessedly in the first instance owned none of it, the control retained over the whole of it by the original owner, under the very terms of the deposit which he makes, is of great significance in repelling any inference that he intended to part with his ownership in any way whatever. Particularly is this so when the original owner retains possession of the pass book, and when the deposit is made in a savings bank by the rules of which the book must be produced before the deposit can be withdrawn.

There is, however, another reason why the addition of the words "joint owners" cannot, in this case, enlarge or change in any way the original entry to the credit of Miss O'Neill and her sister. Those words were placed on the book, not because Miss O'Neill requested the bank officers to do so, and not because she thought they would, or designed they should, vest an indefeasible interest in her sister, but merely because the bank had adopted that form, as testified by the assistant treasurer, "to make it uniform," though uniform with what he did not say. The words were put there, not as expressing Miss O'Neill's intentions or as limiting her control over the funds, but manifestly to carry out some policy or theory of the savings bank. They represent and stand for no voluntary, deliberate act of hers at all. In the face of these facts, whatever the import of the words might be had they been consciously and purposely used by Miss O'Neill, they certainly can be given no weight or potency.

Whilst it may be conceded that Miss O'Neill intended this fund to belong to her sister should the latter survive her,—and there are quite a number of her declarations in the record indicating that she did,—still, the method resorted to by her for the accomplishment of that end cannot, so far as the entry in the book is concerned, be treated as efficacious. The entry did not constitute a valid gift inter vivos, as we have already pointed out; and it cannot, for obvious reasons which need not even be suggested, operate as a testamentary disposition of the fund. The money, therefore, belonged to the original owner at the time of her death, unless the delivery of the book to Mrs. Whalen, or the entry and the delivery together, constituted a valid donation.

If we assume for the moment that the evidence satisfactorily establishes a delivery of the bank book to Mrs. Whalen by Miss O'Neill, the question is then presented as to whether the gift and delivery of a bank book containing the entry that this one embodies, including the words "Joint owners," amounts to, and is, in law, a delivery of the money credited in the book. In Murray v. Cannon, 41 Md. 476, where the entry was "James Cannon, subject to his order, or to the order of Mary E. Cannon," the possession of the book by the claimant, the alleged donee Mary E. Cannon, did not effect a transfer of the fund to her.

"Its delivery to her," said the court, "cannot be said to operate as a delivery to her of the money in question, or to deprive James Cannon of dominion and control over it. This branch of the case," the opinion goes on to declare, "is within the principle decided in Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. Sr. 431. There the bill was to obtain a transfer of South Sea Annuities, upon the ground that the receipts for them had been delivered to the complainant's testator, the donor saying: 'I give you these papers, which are receipts for South Sea Annuities, and will serve you after I am dead.' This was held not to be perfected gift, because the delivery of the receipts was not a delivery of the annuities, as they could only be delivered by a transfer or something equivalent. So in this case the delivery of the book of deposit did not constitute a delivery of the money, which it is claimed was the thing intended to be given, because its delivery could not be effected in that way."

To change the fund from the name of James Cannon to that of the alleged donee required a check drawn by the depositor, or by his agent, Mary Cannon, during his life; because upon his death her agency terminated. She was not named in the deposit book as a joint owner of the fund. The possession of the book may be a circumstance to be considered in determining the ownership of the fund, "but when the ownership is fixed beyond dispute by the entry, or in some other way, then the mere possession of the bank book is not to be taken as conclusive of the ownership of the person in whose possession it may be found." Gorman v. Gorman, 87 Md. 338.

In Dougherty v. Moore, 71 Md. 249, we said: "We shall not stop to consider whether an assignment in writing and delivery to a donee of a pass book of a savings bank by the donor, with the intention to give and vest in the donee the immediate right and interest in the money held on deposit, will constitute a valid gift of such deposits. In some states it has been held that such an assignment and delivery will vest in the donee a valid title to the money." We have cited these cases, the only ones in this state that we now recall, bearing on this precise question, to show, first, that in an instance where the terms of the deposit did not purport to create an interest as donee in the claimant, the delivery of the book did not transfer the ownership of the money on deposit; secondly, that mere possession of the book, worded precisely as is the one in this proceeding and issued by the same bank which gave to Miss O'Neill the book we are now considering, while a fact to be weighed in deciding the question as to who owns the funds, was held not to be conclusive evidence of ownership; and thirdly, that where the necessities of the particular case did not require a decision of the point we refrained from determining whether a written assignment and delivery of a deposit book would constitute a valid gift of the deposit. Possession is distinguishable from delivery.

There may be possession where there has been no delivery; but there can be no valid delivery unless possession, actual or constructive, accompanies it. Where, however, it appears that the original owner purposely deposited the fund to his and another's credit as joint owners, retaining the pass book so as to continue his dominion over the money; a distinct, unequivocal delivery of the book to the other person named as co-owner, with the intention to part with the ownership and to make an irrevocable gift of the fund and an acceptance of it by the donee, would pass the whole interest therein to the donee; because there would then be no inconsistency between the legal effect of the entry on the book and the right in which the donee of the book could claim the deposit, and there would no longer be a locus penitentiae in the original owner. Every element of a perfected gift would then be present. In Cannon's case the legal effect of the entry was simply to make Mary E. Cannon an agent to draw the money for the owner, James Cannon, and the delivery of the book to her was a delivery to her in her capacity as agent. We are not discussing a gift mortis causa as in Conser v. Snowden, 54 Md. 175, 39 Am. Rep. 368. In that case there was no delivery of the book and the plaintiff failed to prove that the donor died of the disorder of which she was suffering when the gift was made and that there had been no intervening recovery. Apart from the circumstances that the gift is made with a view to death, and that it is upon condition, express or implied, that it shall take effect only on the death of the donor, by a disorder from which he is then suffering, a delivery that is sufficient to perfect a gift mortis causa will be equally good to constitute a valid gift inter vivos.

By the terms of the deposit Mary Whalen was authorized to draw the money upon presentation of the book. The delivery to and acceptance by her of this book as a gift—if in point of fact there was such a delivery and acceptance—clothed her with complete dominion over the money, even as against Miss O'Neill, and of course, therefore, as against the latter's personal representatives, and left nothing further to be done to consummate the donation. The entry in the book placed the fund to her credit jointly with her sister—though vesting no interest in her—but the ownership of the book by gift conferred upon her authority to draw the whole fund for her own use, thus differing radically from Cannon's Case and Snowden's Case. The great weight of authority supports the proposition that a gift of savings bank deposits by delivery of the pass book is a valid and complete gift of the money. Ridden v. Thrall, 125 N. Y. 572, 11 L. R. A. 684, and notes; Pierce v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 129 Mass. 425, 37 Am. Rep. 371; Hill v. Stevenson, 63 Me. 364, 18 Am. Rep. 231; Tillinghast v. Wheaton, 8 R. I. 536, 5 Am. Rep. 621, 94 Am. Dec. 126; Camp's Appeal, 36 Conn. 88, 4 Am. Rep. 39; Penfield v. Thayer, 2 E. D. Smith, 305; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1st ed. p. 1326, note 3, and the numerous cases there collected.

A savings bank book has a peculiar character. It is not a mere pass book, or the statement of an account; it is issued to the person in whose name the deposit is made, and with whom the bank has made its contract; it is his voucher, and the only security he has as evidence of his debt. The book is the instrument by which alone the money can be obtained, and its possession is thus some evidence of title in the person presenting it at the bank. "We can have no doubt," says the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, "that a purchaser, to whom such a book is delivered without assignment obtains an equitable title to the fund it represents; and a title by gift, when the claims of creditors do not affect its validity, stands on the same footing as a title by sale." Pierce v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 129 Mass. 425, 37 Am. Rep. 371. A deposit in a bank of issue, discount, and deposit cannot be transferred by a delivery of the pass book, because wherever the book may be the depositor may withdraw the fund by check.

Possession of a deposit book in such a bank does not give a dominion or control over the fund and hence cannot operate, by delivery, to transfer ownership of the money deposited. Jones v. Weakley, 99 Ala. 441, 19 L. R. A. 100. Many of the cases cited or referred to above go to a very much greater extent than we think necessary, and we are not to be understood as adopting them without qualification. So far as they support the doctrine that a gift of a savings bank book worded as this one is, constitutes a valid donation of the deposit, we accept and approve them, but no further.

We hold, then, that if this deposit had been made by Miss O'Neill in her own and her sister's names as joint owners, payable to the order of either or the survivor, though all the money was in fact the property of Miss O'Neill; and if thereafter she had deliberately given the book to her sister with the intention of donating the fund to her and had reserved no control over it herself,—upon the acceptance of that gift by Mrs. Whalen there would have been a perfected gift of the money, vesting the ownership thereof in Mrs. Whalen and entitling her to the possession of it.

Though the delivery of the pass book would have been a delivery of the fund, the circumstances developed in the testimony fail to show a delivery of the book by Miss O'Neill to Mrs. Whalen. There is but a single witness who undertakes to prove the asserted delivery of the book, besides Mrs. Whalen. Their testimony, when weighed in connection with other facts, falls far short of establishing either an actual or a constructive delivery of the book. The witness, Mrs. Rhatigan, thus describes the gift: "Miss Elizabeth O'Neill told Mary that she never gave her anything while she lived, and that her two bank books was in the washstand drawer, and she could have the money, and to take care of it as well as she did."

She further stated that this occurred on Friday afternoon, September 24, and Miss O'Neill died Saturday morning about one o'clock. This witness also testified that the washstand drawer was locked and that Mrs. Whalen had the keys. Miss O'Neill became unconscious about four or five o'clock Friday afternoon, and continued so until her death. Mrs. Whalen testified that she hunted for her sister's keys and found them between the two mattresses and the bolster of the bed upon which Miss O'Neill was lying. She was then asked; "How long had your sister been dead when this search was made?" and she replied: "She was not over two hours dead; the undertaker was there; I just raised her up from the mattress and got them and put them in my pocket."

At this point her counsel interposed and remarked, "You started to say, 'I did not go right away when she told me,' and I did not hear the balance; please complete it." And she then went on: "I asked her where the keys were, and she did not know, and I raised up the mattress and got them; she, said, 'Have you got them?' and I said 'Yes,' and she said, 'Those books in that washstand drawer are yours; take good care of them'; that is what I thought she said; that is the very words she said." This is all the evidence there is of a delivery of the bank book. Mrs. Whalen first explicitly stated that she did not get possession of the keys until two hours after her sister's death, and in the very next breath she asserts that she got them from under the mattress whilst her sister was still living. She got the bank book the Monday following Miss O'Neill's death.

Mrs. Rhatigan places the delivery of the books—such as she described it—in the afternoon, but it is quite apparent she left the house about noon and did not return until Miss O'Neill was unconscious. Mr. Milholland testified that Mrs. Whalen and other relatives of the deceased called at his office to hear the will read two days after the funeral. He then asked Mrs. Whalen if she had any papers or books belonging to her sister; she replied that she had some papers but no bank books, whereupon a niece who was present insisted that Mrs. Whalen had two bank books belonging to Miss O'Neill, but Mrs. Whalen stoutly denied that she had any bank books whatever. The day following Mrs. Whalen called again upon Mr. Milholland and handed him two bank books—the one in controversy and another. Mr. Milholland thereupon asked her if any of the money in the bank was hers, and "she answered, no, that none of it was hers—that none of it belonged to her." The gift set up and relied on was made, if at all, when the owner of the money was in extremis.

The claimant's version of the transaction is exceedingly unsatisfactory; and her distinct and emphatic assertion to Mr. Milholland that the money did not belong to her, spoken so recently after the alleged gift had been made that she could not well have forgotten that the money was hers if it had been in fact given to her but a few days previously, make it highly probable that loose and incoherent expressions of a dying woman have, as time wore on, grown, perhaps unconsciously, into the shape and form they now present through the testimony of these two witnesses. These death-bed donations to be upheld ought to be above question or suspicion at all times, but more especially when they render inoperative, as they would in this case, the provisions of a will made at a calmer and more collected moment.

The evidence to support them ought to be clear and free from uncertainty, for the temptation to seize upon disjointed sentences uttered when the physical frame is prostrated and the mental faculties are failing, and to convert them into a deliberate gift of the bulk of a dying person's estate, might be too often yielded to under the influence of interest or the promptings of avarice, and produce most grievous wrongs. The facility with which such gifts sometimes are proved is suggestive of great caution in weighing the evidence adduced to sustain them. To doubt them ought to be to deny them. "Around every other disposition of the property of the dead the legislative power has thrown safeguards against fraud and perjury. Around this mode [donatio mortis causa] the requirement of actual delivery is the only substantial protection, and the courts should not weaken it by permitting the substitution of convenient and easily proved devices." Keepers v. Fidelity Title & Deposit Co. 56 N. J. L. 303, 23 L. R. A. 184.

Mindful of the facility with which, after the alleged donor is dead, fraudulent claims of ownership may be founded on pretended gifts of his property, asserted to have been made while he was living, it is but a salutary precaution which demands explicit and convincing evidence of every element needed to constitute a valid donation, whether it be a donation inter vivos or mortis causa. Even then fraudulent claims may prevail, but the rigid requirement of the clearest proof will at least diminish the number.

In our judgment, the evidence adduced to prove the gift of the bank book is too inconclusive and vague to support the appellant's claim. For this and the other reasons we have assigned, the decree awarding the fund in this case to the executor of Miss O'Neill must be affirmed with costs.

Decree affirmed, with costs in this court, the costs below to be paid as directed in the decree appealed from.

NEW JERSEY SUPREME COURT.

TRENTON PASSENGER RAILWAY COMPANY

v.

GUARANTORS' LIABILITY INDEMNITY COMPANY.

(60 N. J. L. 246.)

*A contract to indemnify a common carrier of passengers against losses occurring from injuries to passengers carried by it is not invalid as against public policy because it covers losses resulting from its negligence or the negligence of its servants.

(June 3, 1897.)

PRESERVATION by the Circuit Court for Mercer County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of an action brought to enforce a policy of guaranty insurance against liability for losses incurred by plaintiff through injuries to passengers upon its road. Judgment for plaintiff.

Statement by Magie, Ch. J.:

The declaration in this case is founded upon a written contract, whereby the Guarantors' Liability Indemnity Company indemnifies the Trenton Passenger Railroad Company against legal liability for injury to or death of persons arising by reason of casualty occurring in, upon, about, or by reason of the street railroad of the Trenton Passenger Railway Company or its equipment, to an amount not exceeding $5,000 for the injury to or death of any one employee, not to exceed $5,000 for the injury to or death of any person other than an employee, and not to exceed $20,000 in respect to any one casualty whereby several may be injured or killed. It further sets out various actions against the Trenton Passenger Railway Company for injuries which it claims fell within the contract of indemnity of the Guarantors' Liability Indemnity Company and that those actions had been prosecuted to judgment, but that the Guarantors' Liability Indemnity Company, although requested, had not paid them in accordance with the terms of their contract. The plea was the general issue. The issue joined was tried by the court, a jury being waived. The trial judge found that the Guarantors' Liability Indemnity Company had made the contract declared upon, and that, while such contract was in force, two judgments were obtained against the Trenton Passenger Railway Company for casualties and injuries falling within the terms of that contract, which judgments the latter company had paid. Thereupon the trial judge reserved for the determination of the supreme court the following question of law, namely: Whether the said contract of indemnity is a valid contract, or is void as against public policy, as being a contract to indemnify the said Trenton Passenger Railway Company, Consolidated, against losses resulting from its negligence, or from the negligence of its agents and employees.

Messrs. Robert S. Woodruff and Carroll Robbins for plaintiff.

Magie, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question reserved in this case is one of great interest, and is presented for determination for the first time in this court. The proof of the execution by the defendant company of the instrument on which the action is brought, which instrument contains plain stipulations for indemnifying the plaintiff company for losses arising from injuries done by it to its employees or the passengers carried by it, and the proof that such losses had occurred as were thus intended to be indemnified against, sufficiently established plaintiff's right to recover the stipulated indemnity, unless the instrument is not, in the eye of the law, a valid contract. It is obvious that the trial judge entertained doubts of the validity of the instrument in question, for, although no objection appears to have been made on the part of the defendant upon that point, he has deemed it necessary to submit it for determination to the full bench. The attitude of the defendant at the trial has been maintained in this court, for its counsel has presented no argument and made no claim that the instrument is not a binding and enforceable contract. The result is that our examination of the question has not been aided by the researches of counsel supporting its negative, but only of counsel supporting its affirmative. For this reason, I have given the question as close an examination as time would permit, lest something bearing thereon might be overlooked.

NOTE.—For other cases as to public policy in respect to insurance, see Fidelity & C. Co. v. Elckhoff (Mich.) 30 L. R. A. 586; and Erb v. German-American Ins. Co. (Iowa) 40 L. R. A. 845, and note.

The proposition which one would assert who contested the validity of such a contract would obviously be this, namely, that a contract whereby a common carrier of passengers is to be indemnified against damages which he was required to pay for personal injuries occasioned by his negligence, or by the negligence of his agent, is contrary to public policy, and therefore unenforceable. It is admittedly difficult, if not impossible, to formulate a satisfactory statement of what is meant by the words "public policy." Mr. Justice Kekewich declared that it does not admit of definition, and cannot be easily explained. Davies v. Davies, L. R. 36 Ch. Div. 359. That the law has recognized one sort of public policy as a foundation for its judgment at one period, and another sort at another period, is undoubted. It is amusingly shown by Lord St. Leonards in Egerton v. Brownlow, 4 H. L. Cas. 1. Speaking of a case from the Year Books, he says (at p. 238): "It was an obligation with a condition that, if a man did not exercise his craft of a dyer within a certain town,—that is, where he carried on his business,—for six months, then the obligation was to be void; and it was averred that he had used his art there within the time limited, upon which Mr. Justice Hull, being uncommonly angry at such a violation of all law, said, according to the book: 'Per Deum, if he were here, to prison he should go until he made fine to the King, because he had dared to restrain the liberty of a subject.' Angry as the learned judge was at that infraction of the law, what has been the result of that very rule, without any statute intervening? That the common law, as it is called, has adapted itself upon grounds of public policy to a totally different and limited rule that would guide us at this day, and the condition which was then so strongly denounced is just as good a condition now as any that was ever inserted in a contract, because a partial restraint created in that way with a particular object is now perfectly legal." Another illustration occurs with respect to the obligations imposed by law founded on public policy on common carriers of goods. Originally, they were insurers of the safety of the goods against every loss, except such as occurred by the act of God or the public enemy, and any contract relieving them of any part of that obligation was held to be void. Gradually they have been permitted to contract for exemption from some of their liability, and public policy seems now effective only to the extent of prohibiting their exemption by contract from any losses occurring by reason of their negligence and the negligence of their servants. For such losses the law founded on public policy still holds them bound. New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397, 32 L. ed. 788.

From these varying applications of the principle called "public policy," I think it obvious that no accurate definition of that phrase can be devised in respect to any particular matter. In my judgment, the best that can be done is to say that, since the law abhors conduct injurious to the public interest or antagonistic to the public good, the courts will decline to enforce contracts which, at the time they are presented for consideration, require or involve conduct against public interest and public good. Such is the result of my consideration of the matter after examining many cases which exhibit the variant views taken by courts upon this subject, which variance is no more strikingly indicated than in the case of Egerton v. Brownlow, before cited. My researches have not been rewarded with the discovery of many expressions of judicial opinion or by many adjudications on the question reserved in this case. Obvious reasons exist why the judicial consideration of such a question would be infrequent. In actions upon contracts of indemnity, such as that on which this action is founded, the insured raises no question as to the validity of the contract. The insurer, if, as usually it is, a company engaged in seeking profit by making such contracts of insurance, is equally adverse to setting up or maintaining that the contracts by which its profits are made are, in the eye of the law, void. Adjudications and judicial opinions upon a class of contracts which seem to me to bear a strict analogy to those contracts, one of which is before us, are not infrequent. As before stated, common carriers of goods may, by contract with their employers, limit their liability for all losses from all peril except those arising from their negligence or the negligence of their servants. When the liability is so limited, the common carrier of goods stands answerable only for his negligence and that of his servants. The common carrier of passengers has never been deemed an insurer of their safety during carriage, but the law has imposed upon him a duty to take the highest care for the safety of the passenger. He is therefore liable for injuries done to the passenger only where they result from his negligence; that is, the failure to take the care for the safety of the passenger which the law enjoins. Both classes of carriers are therefore liable under such circumstances upon precisely the same grounds. Their liability arises from negligence which is a failure to bestow the care and skill which the situation of the parties and the subject-matter require. The negligence which will render them respectively liable may possibly differ in degree, but, although the distinction between what has been called gross negligence and ordinary negligence is now generally and with great reason repudiated (New York O. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627), it is identical in kind.

The only reason which I find possible to conceive to be capable of being urged in support of the proposition that the contract before us in this case is contrary to public policy is that the indemnity thereby provided for a common carrier of passengers may tend to render him less careful in the performance of his duty to his passengers than he otherwise would be. It is obvious that such is not the purpose of the contract for indemnity. The insurer does not contemplate the relaxation of the carrier's vigilance, which would tend to throw additional liability upon him. The insurer is held to the performance of his duty of vigilance both by his liability notwithstanding the indemnity, and by the fact that the vigilant carrier would obtain better terms in making the contracts of insurance. It is further obvious that, if a contract indemnifying the common carrier of passengers against liability arising from his negligence tends to a relaxation of vigilance inimical to the public interest, so a contract indemnifying a common carrier of goods against the consequences of his negligence must have the same effect, and be obnoxious to the rule avoiding contracts contrary to public policy. Yet it now seems well settled that a common carrier of goods may enforce contracts of insurance on goods carried against all losses including those occasioned by his negligence or the negligence of his servants. In an action upon such a contract of insurance which came before the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Justice Gray thus dealt with the claim that such contracts were void. He said: "No rule of law or of public policy is violated by allowing the common carrier, like any other person having either the general property or a peculiar interest in goods, to have them insured against the usual perils, and to recover for any loss from such perils, though occasioned by the negligence of his own servants. By obtaining insurance, he does not diminish his own responsibility to the owners of the goods, but rather increases his means of meeting that responsibility. If it were true that a shipowner, obtaining insurance by general description upon his ship and the goods carried by her, could, in case of the loss of both ship and goods by perils insured against, and through the negligence of the master and crew, recover of the insurers for the loss of the ship only, and not for the loss of the goods, some trace of the distinction would be found in the books. But the learning and research of counsel have failed to furnish any such precedent." Phœnia Ins. Co. v. Erie & W. Transp. Co. 117 U. S. 312, 29 L. ed. 873. The doctrine in that case was referred to with approval in Orient Ins. Co. v. Adams, 123 U. S. 67, 31 L. ed. 63, and Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phœnia Ins. Co. 129 U. S. 397, 32 L. ed. 788. Afterwards the court was urged to review the doctrine of Mr. Justice Gray, and to declare that the insurance was an insurance against negligence, and contrary to public policy, and void; but the court, speaking by Mr. Justice Blatchford, reaffirmed the doctrine, on the grounds stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice Gray. California Ins. Co. v. Union Compress Co. 133 U. S. 389, 33 L. ed. 732.

Various kinds of insurance against loss by fire or loss by perils of the sea would seem to be open to a like charge of a tendency to encourage negligence, which, at least when the policies are held (as they so frequently are) as collateral security for obligations of the insured, may be well argued to be against the public interest, and therefore void as against public policy. But no trace of any such claim can be found in text-books or adjudications. With respect to such contracts of insurance as that with which we are dealing, I have found but two expressions of judicial opinion in the books and reports. In the case of Delanoy v. Robson, 5 Taunt. 605, upon a motion to settle the venue, it incidentally appeared that the action was upon a contract of somewhat such character; and the reporter states a quære as to whether an insurance against damages that a shipowner might be liable to pay in consequence of his ship running down another be not illegal; and it is said per curiam: "It would be an illegal insurance to insure against what might be the consequences of the wrongful acts of the assured." This case affords no aid in the solution of the question, both because the question was not directly presented, but only incidentally considered, and because what the courts said may well be deemed limited to acts of the insured which were actively wrongful in distinction from being merely negligent. There is, however, an adjudication precisely in point in which the question thus arose: An incorporated company, authorized, among other things, to issue contracts of indemnity of the same character as that before us, became insolvent. Its business had not been confined to making such contracts but had extended to other contracts of indemnity; and the court, in distributing the assets, had before it creditors whose claims arose from other forms of contracts than those arising upon such contracts of insurance. In behalf of the other creditors, the court was urged to declare that the creditors who claimed upon such contracts of insurance should not be admitted to partake in the distribution of the assets, upon the ground that such contracts of insurance were obnoxious to public policy, and unenforceable and void. The opinion of the court was written by Chief Justice McSherry, and contains an admirable discussion of the question, reaching the conclusion that public policy does not avoid these contracts. In respect to the claim that the possession of such indemnity tends to beget negligence, he says: "Nor can we assume, as an unvarying rule, of which judicial notice will be taken, that a carrier of passengers, who has secured an indemnity to reimburse himself for losses which his own negligence may produce, will, merely because and solely in consequence of having such indemnity,—which at best, is but limited and partial,—necessarily disregard the duty to exercise the highest degree of care. And, unless it be assumed as a postulate that the mere possession of an indemnity will of itself necessarily and invariably produce negligence, it does not logically follow that such a policy or indemnity is even incidentally or indirectly repugnant to public policy. The indemnity in no way affects the liability of the carrier to the person injured. The utmost that it does, precisely as in the case of a carrier of goods, is to afford him a fund out of which he may be reimbursed, and that, too, perhaps, but partially; for in all these policies the liability of the insurer is always limited and confined to a specifically designated sum." American Casualty Ins. Co.'s Case, 82 Md. 535, 35 L. R. A. 97.

The result is that the reserved question must be answered in favor of the validity of the contract upon which this action is founded, and, as the special finding of the trial judge shows that he had assessed the damages of the plaintiff at the sum of $978.36 judgment should be ordered entered for the plaintiff for that sum.

It is proper to observe that the decisions of this court in Kinney v. Central R. Co. 32 N. J. L. 407, 90 Am. Dec. 675, and of the court of errors in the same case (34 N. J. L. 513, 3 Am. Rep. 265), are not at all antagonistic to the views above expressed. It was held in both courts that, when a common carrier of passengers agreed to carry a passenger gratuitously, a valid contract might be made between the carrier and such a passenger, exempting the carrier from all liability even for injuries resulting from its negligence or the negligence of its servants. But this was distinctly put upon the ground that in such case the ordinary relation of a passenger and common carrier did not arise, but rather a relation (as the learned chief justice pointed out) analogous to that of a bailor and a gratuitous bailee. Assuming that it may be inferred from those decisions that, when the ordinary relation of common carrier and passenger has arisen, a contract exempting the former from liability to the latter for injuries resulting from its negligence or the negligence of its servants would be invalid, it only results that the common carrier of passengers is left invariably liable for the consequences of its negligence, precisely as is above shown the common carrier of goods is liable.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

William R. LAIDLAW, Respt.,
v.

(158 N. Y. 78.)

1. The party relying on the exception in a statute permitting appeal from judgments or orders finally determining actions excepting unanimous decisions that there is evidence to sustain a finding of fact must show from the record that the decision was unanimous.
2. A statute limiting the right of appeal in cases of personal injury has no application to judgments rendered before its passage.
3. For the purpose of showing that a person's act in the face of an impending explosion was voluntary his admission that everything he did was intentional cannot be submitted to the jury without his qualifying statements denying the commission of the act with which he is charged.
4. A charge that defendant drew plaintiff in front of him to serve as a shield from an impending explosion is not supported by the uncorroborated evidence of plaintiff whose memory was seriously affected by the accident so as to justify submission of the case to the jury where this testimony is contradicted by defendant, several disinterested witnesses, and by well-known and recognized physical facts about which there is no conflict.

NOTE.—The above case is a remarkable one and unique in its facts.

On the general question of intent as an element of simple assault or assault and battery, see note to Vosburg v. Putney (Wis.) 14 L. R. A. 226.

5. One who draws another in front of him to serve as a shield from an impending explosion cannot be held liable for injuries received by the latter from the explosion if it is not shown that the injuries were increased by such act.
6. An action for injuries caused by being drawn in front of another to serve as a shield from an impending explosion should not be submitted to the jury in the absence of any evidence beyond mere conjecture tending to show that plaintiff's injuries were thereby increased.
7. The explosion, and not the act of one in drawing another in front of him to act as a shield when an explosion of dynamite by a third person is impending, is the proximate cause of such other's injuries which are not shown to have been increased by such act.
8. Upon the question whether or not one person held another in front of him as a shield from an impending explosion evidence is not admissible that one whom witness took to be the former had said he was not injured because protected from the explosion.
9. One accused of holding another in front of him as a shield from an impending explosion cannot, on cross-examination, in a suit for damages for the injuries, be shown not to have exhibited proper sympathy or paid proper attention to plaintiff after the injury.
10. Evidence of defendant's wealth, property, and business is not admissible in a suit for negligent injuries.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York County Circuit Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's using plaintiff as a shield from an impending explosion. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John F. Dillon, Edward O. James, and Rush Taggart, for appellant:

The provisions of the Constitution, and of § 191 of the Code, have no application to this appeal, because the judgment and order appealed from does not state that the decision was unanimous, and that fact does not appear of record.

Kaplan v. New York Biscuit Co. 151 N. Y. 171.

This court has always exercised jurisdiction to determine whether the evidence was sufficient to justify the submission of the case to the jury, or to sustain their verdict, when that question has been properly presented on appeal by an exception.

This is not a jurisdiction which usurps the prerogative of the general term. But it is a jurisdiction which will reverse a judgment upon a verdict found upon insufficient evidence, which, in the eye of the law, is no evidence.

Upon this question of proximate cause there is no real distinction between a wrongful act and a negligent act. In either case the party in fault is liable if the injury is caused by his act; but if it is caused by the wholly independent act of some third person, he is not liable.

As it does not appear from this record that the justices of the court below were divided upon the question as to whether there was evidence supporting or tending to support the verdict that question cannot be considered by this court.

Even if this court can in any way consider the question where there is evidence supporting the verdict, it can only reverse the decision of the court below in case it should find that the verdict and the decision are either against the undisputed testimony or without any testimony whatever to support it.

The laying of hands upon the plaintiff by Mr. Sage for the purpose of shielding himself from an injury (which he alone knew was threatened) by changing plaintiff's position so as to interpose plaintiff between himself and such danger was an unlawful interference with plaintiff's person, and the carrying out of such intent by the actual removal of plaintiff without his consent renders defendant liable for the injury plaintiff suffered in consequence of the wrongful and unlawful act.

As the plaintiff has shown that the specific injuries he received were due to the act of the defendant, the defendant cannot escape liability for such injuries by claiming that similar injuries might have been received by the plaintiff if he had not been moved.

Slater v. Mersereau, 64 N. Y. 138; Meade v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 68 Mo. App. 92.

Martin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced May 26, 1892. Its purpose was to recover for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of an explosion which occurred in the defendant's office, in the city of New York, on the 4th day of December, 1891. There is no allegation in the complaint, nor was there any proof upon the trial, which even tended to show that the defendant was in any way responsible for the explosion which was the cause of the plaintiff's injury. The evidence disclosed that a stranger, whose name was subsequently found to be Norcross, called at the defendant's office December 4, 1891, at about 10 minutes past 12 o'clock, said he desired to see the defendant in relation to some railroad bonds, and had a letter of introduction from Mr. Rockefeller. When asked to send it to the defendant, he stated that he preferred to present it in person, and that he only wanted to say two or three words. Upon receiving this message the defendant stepped from his private office into the anteroom, went to the window, and looked into the lobby, where he saw Norcross sitting upon a settee. At that time the defendant met the plaintiff, who said he had a message from Mr. Bloodgood, and the defendant thereupon turned the knob of the door, and the plaintiff passed into the anteroom of the office. The former then spoke to Norcross, who instantly arose, took his carpet bag in his left hand, and, approaching him, handed him a letter which was supposed to be from Mr. Rockefeller, which he took, opened, and read. It was a typewritten communication, the substance of which was: "The bag I hold in my hand contains ten pounds of dynamite. If I drop this bag on the floor, the dynamite will explode, and destroy this building in ruins, and kill every human being in the building. I demand $1,200,000, or I will drop the bag. Will you give it? Yes or no?" The defendant read the letter twice, folded it, handed it back to Norcross, and then commenced parleying with him, stating that he had an engagement with two gentlemen, that he was short of time, and, if it was going to take much time, he wanted him to come later in the day. Norcross, after a second, said "Then do I understand you to refuse my offer?" to which the defendant replied, "Oh, no, I don't refuse your offer. I have an appointment with two gentlemen. I think I can get through with them in about two minutes, and then I will see you." Norcross held the bag at the end of his fingers, walked backward towards the door through which he came, and when he reached the threshold, he stopped, and looked at the defendant. The defendant stepped back a little towards the desk that was in the anteroom, while Norcross was going the other way. As he reached the threshold, he looked at the defendant, and said, "I rather infer from your answers that you refuse my offer," to which the defendant answered, "Is there anything in my appearance that would cause you to think that I would not do as I say I would?" and repeated that he had an appointment with two gentlemen, and that he could get through in about two minutes, and would then see him. Norcross then gave one look, stepped to one side, when the flash came, and it was all over in two seconds. In backing down the room, the defendant came to the desk, and was partially sitting upon the edge of it when the explosion occurred. After the explosion it was found that everything in the office was wrecked. The partitions, floors, joists, plaster, desks, tables, chairs, and other furniture were destroyed, the window sashes and window frames were blown out, even in the private office. Norcross was blown to pieces, and Norton, one of the clerks in the defendant's office, was hurled through the window to the street below, where he met his death. A steel safe which was locked and stood in an adjoining room was blown open, its contents scattered upon the floor with other débris, and every person who was in the room was either killed or seriously injured. Indeed, the explosion was so violent, so general, and so destructive in its effect that it seems little less than miraculous that any person who was present should have escaped with his life. This portion of the transaction is undisputed in any essential or material particular.

The plaintiff claims that, upon entering the office, he passed the defendant and Norcross, who were conversing in the lobby near the door of the anteroom; that he entered the anteroom, which was about 8 by 16 feet, went to a table or desk near the center of the room, where he stood waiting for the defendant, with his back to the door, looking towards Mr. Norton, who stood by the ticker at the window, looking out on Rector street; that, while he stood there, he once or twice glanced over his shoulder, saw that the defendant was inside the anteroom door, and that Norcross was just outside; that he heard nothing said, said nothing himself, and saw no paper in the defendant's hand; that he turned, and looked towards the window, with his back to the defendant, when the latter suddenly came in range of his vision on his left side, came over, and placed his hand on his shoulder; that afterwards he dropped his left hand, and took the plaintiff's right hand in his, and gently moved him over towards the direction in which he stood, which was from the plaintiff's right to his left, and that he gently moved him about the width of his body, about 15 inches, or probably more. He then testified: "I changed my position towards Mr. Sage about 15 inches. I changed my position in his general direction, but in front of us. I still kept my position as far as Rector street was concerned and the door of the entry. I had my back to the door all the time. I was in a line between Mr. Sage and Mr. Norcross.

... Mr. Sage rested one thigh on the corner of the table, and then said over my shoulder, to this stranger, 'If I trust you, why can you not trust me?' or, 'If you cannot trust me, I cannot trust you,' or words in that general line and to that effect, and 44 L. R. A.

then the explosion immediately followed." Upon cross-examination he testified: "I saw him [Mr. Sage] come within the range of my vision to my left. I can safely say that without looking at me he put his hand on my left shoulder, put his left hand on my left arm, and took my left hand in his left hand. It was not quite at that moment that he sat down on the corner of the desk. He did not let go of my left hand with his left hand after taking my left hand. He did not take my left hand in both hands at that moment. He did a moment later, and then he sat down on the corner of the desk with my left hand in both his hands. My hand was not held specially tight. It was covered by both his hands. At that time my position was changed from where I stood when he put his left hand on my shoulder. I was conscious at the time of force being used upon me sufficient to move me. I was conscious of force being used upon me to a certain extent. In a sense it was imperceptible, and in a sense it was not. I spoke of it as being a very gentle movement. I don't think I said it was so gentle as to be imperceptible. I didn't say that. I said it was gentle. It was not violent. I don't think I said it was imperceptible. The whole change of my position was about the width of my body; should think 18 inches towards my left." He also gave evidence to the effect that he had previously testified that the defendant did not use any force upon him, and he never thought of such a thing as that until after the explosion; that he did not think he was conscious that the defendant was pulling him at the time, and he could not say that he was exactly conscious of any force of Mr. Sage's hands in moving him; that he was moved easily and without resistance; that he moved voluntarily because he offered no resistance; that he did not think he was conscious of being pulled at the time; and that that testimony was true.

As to this part of the transaction, the defendant testified that, when he reached the corner of the table, the plaintiff was about 4 feet from him towards the partition, and that they were in that position when the explosion occurred. He denied that he ever had his hands upon the person of the plaintiff in any manner whatever until after the explosion; testified that at the time the plaintiff was not between him and Norcross for an instant, and that he did not at any time intend or design interposing the body of the plaintiff between himself and Norcross; that he did not put himself behind the plaintiff and that no portion of his body was behind the plaintiff; that he did not touch him at all, and made no such statement to Norcross as was testified to by the plaintiff; that, after the explosion, they were found thrown together, and that he lifted the plaintiff, which was the first time he had his hand upon him. The evidence of the defendant was corroborated in most of its essential particulars by the testimony of Frank Robertson, who was in the office at the time. There was also other proof which tended to corroborate him, and which was in conflict with the theory and testimony of the plaintiff.

This case has been tried four times, and passed upon three times by the intermediate appellate tribunal. The history of this litigation has shown an evolution in the law held to be applicable to it which is somewhat unusual. Upon the first trial, the complaint was dismissed by the trial court upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to establish any proper connection between the act of the defendant and the independent act of Norcross which caused the injury. In other words, it held that, under the principles of law applicable to the subject, the acts of the defendant were not shown to be the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. That judgment was reversed by the general term of the supreme court which in effect held that no question of proximate cause was involved; that if the defendant put his hand upon or touched the plaintiff and caused him to change his position with an intent to shield himself, he was guilty of a wrongful act towards him; that, if the plaintiff was injured by the happening of the catastrophe, the burden of proof was upon the defendant to establish the fact that his wrongful act did not in the slightest degree contribute to any part of the injury which the plaintiff sustained by reason of the explosion; and that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to show that he would not have been so severely injured if he had been left standing in his original position. Upon the second trial the plaintiff had a verdict. The court seems to have charged the jury in accordance with the principles laid down by the general term upon the first appeal. Upon that trial, however, the defendant's counsel requested the court to charge: "If the jury find from the evidence that the defendant did take the plaintiff, and use him as a shield, but that this action was involuntary, or such as would instinctively result from a sudden and irresistible impulse in the presence of a terrible danger, he is not liable to the plaintiff for the consequences of it." That request the court refused, but added: "I will charge it; that the essence of the liability must be a voluntary act." Upon the second appeal, that question having been thus sharply presented, the general term again reversed the judgment, upon the ground that the court erred in refusing to charge that request. Upon the third trial the jury disagreed. Upon the last trial, which is now under review, the trial court disregarded the former decisions of the general term, and charged that the measure of the plaintiff's damages was the difference between those he actually sustained, and such as he would have received if he had not been interfered with, and that the burden of proving such damages was upon the plaintiff. It also charged that if the defendant involuntarily put his hands upon the plaintiff in a moment of great excitement confronted with immediate and serious danger, without meaning to interfere with him, he would not be responsible. But it submitted the question whether the act of the defendant was deliberate and intentional to the jury, calling its attention to the fact that the defendant testified that "he was in perfect possession of his senses, recollected everything that was done, that everything he did there was done intentionally," and then charged that if, under those circumstances, he voluntarily put out his hand, and touched the plaintiff, a cause of action was made out, and the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict. In this portion of its charge, the court assumed, and stated to the jury, that the defendant testified that everything he did was done intentionally, as proof of his having intentionally interfered with the person of the plaintiff. The propriety of this portion of the charge will be subsequently considered.

On the trial George Baillard was called as a witness, and testified to having seen someone in O'Connell's drug store whom he believed to be the defendant; that someone stepped up to him, and asked if he was injured very much; that he answered that he was not; that he understood him to say something about being protected, or a protection that he had had from the explosion. This evidence was objected to; the objection was overruled; and the defendant excepted. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, and again when the entire evidence was closed, the defendant moved that this testimony be stricken out. He also asked that the jury be instructed to disregard it. These motions were denied, and the defendant excepted. When the plaintiff's evidence was closed, the defendant moved for a nonsuit. Again, at the close of all the testimony, he moved for a nonsuit, that the plaintiff's complaint be dismissed, and that a verdict be directed in his favor upon sufficient grounds; so that the exceptions of the defendant to the denial of those motions fully raise all the questions which are involved or have been discussed upon this appeal. At the conclusion of the charge, the defendant excepted to portions of it, requested the court to charge certain propositions which were refused, and by exceptions to those rulings again raised the questions involved. Therefore, in the consideration of the legal questions presented, it must be assumed that they were properly raised, not only by a motion to nonsuit and to dismiss the complaint, but also by motions to direct a verdict for the defendant, and by exceptions to the charge and the refusal of the court to charge as requested.

Upon an appeal from the judgment entered upon the verdict rendered at the last trial, the appellate division obviously intended to follow the previous decisions of the general term so far as they related to the plaintiff's right of recovery, to the end that the question of the liability of the defendant, under the facts and circumstances proved, might be properly presented to this court, and did not assume the responsibility of passing upon the correctness of the previous decisions in that respect. It, however, discussed many of the questions raised by the defendant's counsel, and, among other things, attempted to show that there was sufficient evidence to justify a jury in finding that there were two ascertained lines of direction which the explosion followed, and that one of them was in the direction where the plaintiff claims that he and the defendant stood.

But when we refer to the evidence bearing upon that question, and which is said to justify that conclusion, we are unable to discover its existence in the record. Indeed, in the discussion following, which involved the improbability of the plaintiff's theory that the defendant drew him in front of himself as a shield, when examined in the light of the injuries to the defendant and their location upon his person, the learned judge delivering the opinion advanced as an argument that it was not impossible that, "in the titanic whirlwind of the explosion," those injuries might have occurred. He said that there was nothing more extraordinary in that incident than in the circumstance that the force of the explosion blew open a large steel safe, and scattered its contents about the room, adding: "No one can account for the eccentricities of such an occurrence. If there were known and provable unvarying incidents of such phenomenal events, some ascertained physical law acting uniformly and equally on all such occasions, we might be able to say what was or what was not impossible within the operation of such law, but we have no such guides or criteria." We think the last suggestions made by the learned judge are entitled to much more weight, and are much more probable, than the theory which precedes them, and with which the latter are utterly inconsistent. Indeed, the whole discussion seems to be based upon the idea that the defendant was bound to establish the impossibility of the theory upon which the plaintiff relied; and in its argument that court did not seem to consider that any burden rested upon the plaintiff to prove his theory with any certainty, notwithstanding the lack of substantial proof to show its correctness or existence. That opinion can hardly be read without reaching the conclusion that the learned judge was wrestling with inconsistencies impossible to harmonize, and yet that the purpose of the court was to place the case in a position where the questions of law relating to the right of the plaintiff to a recovery in this action should be presented to, and determined by, the court of appeals.

There are certain questions of law involved, which were discussed upon the argument, that we are called upon to decide. We have deemed it necessary to state the facts and history of this protracted litigation somewhat fully, to the end that the legal questions may be plainly presented and clearly understood in their connection with them.

The first question of law presented relates to our jurisdiction to hear and determine this appeal. The respondent contends that, inasmuch as the record does not show affirmatively that the justices of the appellate division were divided upon the question as to whether there was evidence supporting or tending to sustain the verdict, that question, at least, cannot be considered by this court, and relies upon § 1337 of the Code of Civil Procedure as sustaining his position. In examining the question of the appealability of this case, and the questions which may be determined upon this appeal, it becomes necessary to consider the provisions of the Constitution and statutes, as well as the decisions of the court relating to the subject. Section 9 of article 6 of the Constitution declares: "No unanimous decision of the appellate division of the supreme court that there is evidence supporting or tending to sustain a finding of fact or a verdict not directed by the court, shall be reviewed by the court of appeals." After the adoption of that provision, the legislature amended § 190 of the Code of Civil Procedure so as to provide: "From and after the last day of December, eighteen hundred and ninety-five, the jurisdiction of the court of appeals shall, in civil actions and proceedings, be confined to the review upon appeal of the actual determinations made by the appellate division of the supreme court in either of the following cases and no others: (1) Appeals may be taken as of right to said court, from judgments or orders finally determining actions or special proceedings, and from orders granting new trials on exceptions, where the appellants stipulate that, upon affirmation, judgment absolute shall be rendered against them." The second subdivision of that section provides for the certification by the appellate division of questions of law for determination by the court of appeals. Then follows § 191, which contains certain limitations, exceptions, and conditions to the provisions of § 190; and in that section is found a provision in which the same language is employed as in the provision of the Constitution above cited. It also provides that no appeal shall be taken from a judgment of affirmation hereafter rendered in an action to recover damages for a personal injury, when the decision of the appellate division is unanimous unless that court shall certify that in his opinion a question of law is involved which ought to be reviewed by the court of appeals, or unless, in case of its refusal to so certify, an appeal is allowed by a judge of a court of appeals. It likewise provides that the jurisdiction of the court is limited to the review of questions of law.

Here, then, we find that both the Constitution and the statutes provide that no unanimous decision of the appellate division that there is evidence supporting or tending to sustain a finding or verdict not directed shall be reviewed by this court. But the provisions of § 190 are general, and declare that appeals may be taken as of right to this court from judgments or orders finally determining actions or special proceedings. This confers upon a party the absolute right to appeal in those cases, unless it falls within some of the limitations contained in the subsequent section. The question here presented is how or in what manner the fact that the case falls within some limitation, if it does, is to be made to appear. Inasmuch as § 190 in general terms confers the right of appeal, the question is, If it is limited by some other provision of the statute, upon whom is the burden of showing that fact? It would seem that, inasmuch as the appellant in this case was given the right of appeal in express terms, he might rely upon that general provision, and if it fell within any of the limitations of the statute, and the respondent claimed that the appeal was not well taken, the burden of showing that fact rested upon him. In Kaplan v. New York Biscuit Co. 151 N. Y. 171, this court held that the burden of showing that a judgment of affirmance in an action for a personal injury was by a unanimous decision of the appellate division rested upon the party asserting it, and that, in order to deprive the court of appeals of the power to review the case under § 191 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the fact should be established by the party claiming it, either by the judgment or by a certificate of the court appearing in the record. It is true that question arose under the amendment of § 191, made in 1896, and not under subdivision 4. Nor were the provisions of § 1337 passed upon in determining that case. Still, we think the principle of that decision is applicable here; that we should hold now, as we held there, that the judgment is reviewable in this court, unless the affirmance was by the unanimous decision of the appellate division; and that the burden of showing that fact rests upon the party asserting it, and should appear in the record. We think that § 1337 does not in any way interfere with the principle of the decision in that case, but that the provision that, where the justices of the appellate division from which the appeal is taken are divided as to whether there is evidence supporting or tending to sustain a finding or verdict not directed by the court, a question for review is presented, is but another way of stating what is contained in subdivision 4 of § 191 of the Code, and in no way relieves the party who asserts it from the burden of establishing the unanimity of the decision. Hence, we are of the opinion that the contention of the respondent in this respect cannot be sustained, and that the question whether there is evidence supporting or tending to sustain the verdict may be reviewed upon this appeal. We think we should so hold, especially when we consider the fact that the appellate division refused to certify that its decision was unanimous, and has so plainly indicated a desire and purpose to have the questions involved decided by this court. Manifestly, the amendment to § 191 passed in 1896, limiting appeals in cases of personal injury, has no application, because the judgment appealed from was rendered March 12, 1896, before the passage of that act. Croveno v. Atlantic Ave. R. Co. 150 N. Y. 225.

As bearing upon the contention of the respondent as to the appealability of this case, it may be properly added that here every point or question upon which the appellant relies was raised by an exception to the denial of a proper motion to direct a verdict for the defendant, by an exception to the charge of the court, to its refusal to charge as requested, or by some other ruling upon the trial to which a proper exception was taken. Therefore, in its further examination, all the questions of law which are presented by the appellant must be regarded as properly before us for consideration.

The primary question which lies at the foundation of the respondent's right of recovery is whether there was sufficient evidence to justify the court in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant, or in submitting to the jury the question of the defendant's liability. This general question seems to depend for its solution upon several subordinate ones. These questions are: First. Was there sufficient evidence that the defendant performed any act or was guilty of any omission which rendered him even technically liable to the plaintiff? Second. If so, was the proof sufficient to justify the court in submitting to the jury the question of substantial damages. And, third, were the alleged acts of the defendant the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury? A consideration of these questions in the order in which they are stated seems necessary to a proper determination of the original one.

1. That, at the time of the occurrence which was the subject of this action, the defendant suddenly and unexpectedly found himself confronted by a terrible and impending danger, which would naturally, if not necessarily, terrify and appall the most intrepid, is shown by the undisputed evidence. If, with this awful peril before him, he maintained any great degree of self-control, it indicated a strength of nerve and personal bravery quite rare, indeed. That the duties and responsibilities of a person confronted with such a danger are different and unlike those which follow his actions in performing the ordinary duties of life under other conditions is a well-established principle of law. The rule applicable to such a condition is stated in Moak's Underhill on Torts (p. 14), as follows: "The law presumes that an act or omission done or neglected under the influence of pressing danger was done or neglected involuntarily. It is there said that this rule seems to be founded upon the maxim that self-preservation is the first law of nature, and that, where it is a question whether one of two men shall suffer, each is justified in doing the best he can for himself. This principle of pressing danger, and an act or omission in its presence, was discussed in the Squib Case (Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 894), and in the Wine Case (Vandenburg v. Truax, 4 Denio, 464, 47 Am. Dec. 260). That principle has been many times affirmed by the decisions of the courts of this state as well as others. Indeed, the trial court recognized this doctrine in its charge, but submitted to the jury the question whether the act of the defendant was involuntary, and induced by impending danger, adding that the testimony of the defendant that everything he did, he did intentionally, was sufficient to justify it in finding that he voluntarily moved the plaintiff in the manner claimed by him. But, when we examine the defendant's evidence we find he testified that he never had his hands on the person of the plaintiff in any manner whatever until after the explosion, and that he did not at any time have any intent or design of interposing the body of the plaintiff between himself and the stranger. The testimony of the defendant, to which the court referred in its charge, seems to have been substantially that he was as cool and collected as any man could well be with the intimation made by Norcross; that he exercised his best judgment under the circumstances; that he did nothing unconsciously, spontaneously, or without deliberation, but did the best he could, and exercised the best judgment he could, to avoid any accident; that he did nothing by impulse; and that what he did he did as deliberately as he could under the circumstances. This evidence seems to fall short of justifying the statement of the court that he testified he was in perfect possession of his senses, recollected everything that was done, and that everything he did there was intentional, as it very materially differed from and essentially modified the statement contained in the charge. The statement of the court as to the admission of the defendant can hardly be said to be a fair deduction from his evidence. Nor is the justice of eliminating from its statement to the jury the fact that the admissions he did make were accompanied by evidence that he in no way touched the plaintiff, and had no intention of doing so, quite appreciated. If the court desired to use the admission of the defendant as evidence of such a fact, the evidence should have been correctly stated, and the attention of the jury called to the entire admission, and not to a part alone. Here, as where there is an introduction of any other conversation or admission by a party, the remainder which tends to qualify or explain the portion relied upon should be considered as a part of it, especially where it is a qualification of the other, and rebuts or destroys the inference to be drawn or the use to be made of the portion put in evidence or relied upon. While it is doubtless true that a portion of the testimony of a witness may be credited to a jury, and a portion discredited, still, when a part of the evidence is modified or qualified by another portion, it is far from clear that one portion may be rejected, and the other given credit. But, be that as it may, it is extremely difficult, upon a consideration of all the evidence in the record relating to this subject, to see how a jury was justified in finding that the defendant voluntarily interfered with the person of the plaintiff.

The only witness whose testimony is relied upon to show any interference with the plaintiff by the defendant was the plaintiff himself. He not only had all the interest of a party to the action, but the undisputed proof disclosed that his memory had been very seriously impaired, and to such an extent that he was unable to remember from day to day or hour to hour what he was told to do, and that this condition of his mind continued from the time of the accident until the last trial of this case. Upon the other hand, the defendant clearly and positively denied that he interfered with his person at all, and he is corroborated by at least one unbiased witness upon that subject, and in many of the details of the transaction by the witnesses Osborne, James, and Hummel, whose evidence was in direct conflict with that given by the plaintiff. Moreover, 41 L. R. A.

when the testimony of the plaintiff is read, it is quite manifest that it does not clearly disclose any movement of his body, if any occurred, that was not his own voluntary act, uncontrolled by any force upon the part of the defendant. There were also certain physical facts established by the proof, and uncontradicted, which tend to show that the plaintiff's theory that he was in front of the defendant was impossible. If, as is claimed by the plaintiff, the defendant employed his body as a shield, and it was between him and the place of the explosion, it is quite difficult to comprehend how the missiles which were found in the defendant's body in front, and near the median line could have reached him, especially if, as is the plaintiff's theory, the explosion followed two straight lines. Nor can we quite understand how, if, when the explosion occurred, the plaintiff's left hand was in both of the defendant's, resting upon the defendant's left thigh, the defendant's hands could have been so seriously injured and wounded by flying substances as the proof shows they were. With this condition of the proof, it is quite difficult to say that there was any such evidence of the defendant's intentional interference with the plaintiff as would entitle him to recover in this action, or have the question submitted to a jury. The evidence which appears to be in conflict with the position of the defendant, to say the most, is nothing more than a mere scintilla, and was met, not only by the positive testimony of disinterested witnesses, but also by well-known and recognized physical facts, about which there is no conflict. Therefore it would seem that the plaintiff was not entitled to even nominal damages, and that it was the duty of the court to have directed a verdict for the defendant.

2. Was there sufficient evidence to justify the court in submitting to the jury the question of substantial damages? If, for the purpose of this discussion, it be admitted that the plaintiff was moved as testified to by him, and that the act of the defendant was voluntary and intentional, yet we are unable to find any sufficient evidence in the record to justify the court in submitting to the jury the question whether the plaintiff's injuries arose in consequence of the act of the defendant in moving him. The court in effect charged the jury that if the defendant interfered with the body of the plaintiff, and his injuries were inflicted because of a change in his position, then it might allow the plaintiff for the injuries which he sustained in consequence of the wounds which it found were caused by his change of position; and the jury was permitted to pass upon the question whether he sustained more or different injuries than he would if he had not been moved. The contention of the respondent is that the evidence disclosed that there were two straight and well-defined lines of explosion, and that it tended to show that the plaintiff was drawn into one of them. But we find no proof either that the lines of explosion claimed did not include the place where the plaintiff originally stood, or that a wave of explosion did not pass over that portion of the room, which was as forceful and destructive as that passing in any other direction.

The evidence relied upon by the plaintiff to show that there were these two defined lines was the location of the wounds upon the body of the plaintiff and the testimony of the witness Reeves. When we examine the evidence bearing upon the character and location of the plaintiff's wounds, it falls far short of establishing any well-defined line of explosion. Nor do we think any such inference can be drawn from the situation as described by the plaintiff and other witnesses. And, when we examine the evidence of the witness Reeves, we find in it nothing to sustain the contention of the plaintiff. He testified that there were thirty-five to forty joists or beams, which ran north and south, which were injured, and that the breakage ran through the joists in a northeasterly direction. He was then asked whether there were fractures in any other direction in the beams or joists from that hole, to which he answered that he had put in new beams on the Rector street side of the partition leading into Mr. Sage's office; that he put in about twenty-eight or thirty new ones; and that the balance were not so badly fractured, so that they were reinforced without taking the old beams out. We find nothing in this evidence to indicate that there was any distinct line of explosion in any other direction than northeasterly. That the splitting of the joists, if it occurred, would naturally extend lengthwise of them, there can be little doubt. But the plaintiff's claim that there is anything in this evidence which shows a second distinct line of explosion within which he was drawn, even if he was moved as he testified, surely cannot be sustained. Consequently, there was nothing but the merest conjecture upon which the jury could base any finding that he was more severely injured by being moved. That he was bound to establish some wrongful act upon the part of the defendant, and that that act was the cause of the injury for which he sought to recover, there can be no doubt. Nor is there any doubt that the burden of proof upon both of those questions rested upon him. The courts below have so held, but, notwithstanding their views of the law, they have submitted those questions to the jury.

In Baulec v. New York & H. R. Co. 59 N. Y. 356, 366, 17 Am. Rep. 325, Judge Allen said: "It is not enough to authorize the submission of a question, as one of fact, to a jury, that there is some evidence. A scintilla of evidence, or a mere surmise, . . . would not justify the judge in leaving the case to the jury." And in that case it was held that as "at most, the jury could only conjecture that the defendant might have been wanting in the care and caution proper to be exercised in such a case, . . . the case was properly withheld from the jury." In Pollock v. Pollock, 71 N. Y. 137, 153, Folger, J., said: "Insufficient evidence is, in the eye of the law, no evidence;" and then cited the language of Maule, J., in Jewell v. Parr, 13 C. B. 916, where he said: "When 44 L. R. A.

we say that there is no evidence to go to a jury, we do not mean that there is literally none, but that there is none that ought reasonably to satisfy a jury that the fact sought to be proved is established." Again, in Bond v. Smith, 113 N. Y. 378, 385, Earl, J., stated the duties of the court in considering such a question as follows: "We have no right to guess that he was free from fault. It was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show it by a preponderance of evidence. She furnished the jury with nothing from which they could infer the freedom of the intestate from fault. She simply furnished them food for speculation, and that will not do for the basis of a verdict. The law demands proof, and not mere surmises. The authorities are ample to show in such a case the plaintiff should have been nonsuited,"—citing Cordell v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 75 N. Y. 330; Dubois v. Kingston, 102 N. Y. 219. In Pauley v. Steam Gauge & Lantern Co. 131 N. Y. 90, 98, 15 L. R. A. 194, which was an action for negligence by which it was claimed that the plaintiff's intestate lost his life, Judge Finch, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "But the respondent and the general term insist that some other theory may be adopted, and, in order to do so, enter upon the realm of conjecture, and ask that a jury, in the utter absence of proof, may be allowed to guess that there was some negligence on the part of the defendant which might have tended to cause the death of the intestate. . . . What is claimed is that there is proof that some of the operatives fled to this escape, but could not use it on account of the blinds; and we are asked to permit a jury to guess or conjecture that Pauley was one of these, without any proof of the fact, and in the face of the evidence that no one who did use it or approach it saw him at all," and then adds: "We think the duty imposed by the statute was fairly and fully performed, and, even if it was not, that we are not to resort to conjecture, and permit a verdict to be based on bare possibilities alone. . . . A mere conjecture, built upon a bare possibility, will not suffice to transfer the money or property of one man to the possession and profit of another. As we said in Bond v. Smith, 113 N. Y. 378, food for speculation will not serve as the basis of a verdict." Again, in discussing this question in Linkauf v. Lombard, 137 N. Y. 417, 425, 20 L. R. A. 43, Judge Gray, writing for this court, declared: "To permit a jury to speculate and surmise upon a question of responsibility is to withdraw from the litigant a safeguard intended for the protection of his rights. He is entitled to the judgment of the court upon questions to which the character of the evidence admits of but one answer. No such possibilities of a failure of justice should be countenanced,"—and then quotes from the opinion of Justice Clifford in Schuylicill & D. Improv. Co. v. Munson, 14 Wall. 442, 20 L. ed. 867, the following: "Nor are judges any longer required to submit a question to a jury merely because some evidence has been introduced by the party having the burden of proof unless the evidence be of such a character that it would warrant the jury in finding a verdict in favor of that party. Formerly it was held that, if there was what was called a scintilla of evidence in support of a case, the judge was bound to leave it to the jury; but recent decisions of high authority have established a more reasonable rule, that in every case, before the evidence is left to the jury, there is a preliminary question for the judge, nor whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly proceed to find a verdict for the party producing it, upon whom the onus of proof is imposed; and adds: "The rule should be regarded as settled, under all the authorities, as well by the decisions of the courts of this state as by those of England, that, where there is no evidence upon an issue before the jury, or the weight of the evidence is so decidedly preponderating in favor of one side that a verdict contrary to it would be set aside, it is the duty of the trial judge to nonsuit, or to direct the verdict as the case may require." In the case of Hemmens v. Nelson, 138 N. Y. 517, 20 L. R. A. 440, this court again asserted the doctrine so clearly stated in the Linkauf Case. In discussing that question in Hudson v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 145 N. Y. 408, 412, Haight, J., said: "But where the evidence, which appears to be in conflict, is nothing more than a mere scintilla, or where it is met by well-known and recognized scientific facts, about which there is no conflict, this court will still exercise jurisdiction to review and reverse if justice requires."—citing People, Coyle, v. Martin, 142 N. Y. 352, Hemmens v. Nelson, 138 N. Y. 517, 20 L. R. A. 440, and Linkauf v. Lombard, 137 N. Y. 417, 425, 20 L. R. A. 48. See also Cadwell v. Arnheim, 152 N. Y. 182; Hannigan v. Lehigh & H. River R. Co. 157 N. Y. 244.

Thus, we see that this court has, in a long line of decisions, uniformly held that, to justify the submission to the jury of any issue, there must be sufficient proof to sustain the claim of the party upon whom the onus rests, and that mere conjecture, surmise, speculation, bare possibility, or a mere scintilla of evidence is not enough. When the principle of these cases is applied, it becomes obvious that the court was not justified in submitting to the jury the question whether the plaintiff suffered any substantial damages by reason of his having been moved in the manner claimed, even though it should find that the defendant moved him. No one can read the evidence in the record as to the nature, power, and effect of the explosion, and the results that followed, without reaching the conclusion that it utterly failed to show that the plaintiff was more seriously injured than he would have been if he had remained where he claims to have first stood. Indeed, we can find no proof sufficient to justify the conclusion that there was any place of safety, or comparative safety, in any of the rooms occupied by the defendant. The explosion swept with terrific force over them all, destroying or seriously injuring every person or thing with which it came in contact. Under such circumstances, to permit a jury to guess or conjecture that the plaintiff's injuries were more serious or severe than they would have been if his position had not been changed, is, in the language of Judge Gray, "to withdraw from the litigant a safeguard intended for the protection of his rights." We think the court erred in not directing a verdict for the defendant, at least so far as substantial damages were concerned, upon the ground that there was no sufficient proof that the plaintiff sustained any injury in consequence of the alleged conduct of the defendant.

3. We are next brought to the consideration of the question whether the alleged acts of the defendant were the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. As has already been suggested, there is no allegation or proof which tends to show that the defendant was in any way responsible for the explosion, or that there was any connection whatever between the defendant's acts and the explosion which followed. Indeed, the counsel for the respondent frankly states in his brief: "It has never been claimed, either in the pleadings or in the argument, that Mr. Sage's liability can be predicated on the fact that any act of his caused or invited a catastrophe, or that he used defiant or injudicious language." Nor does the respondent claim that the defendant was in any way responsible, directly or indirectly, for the explosion itself. Therefore, if the explosion was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, the defendant cannot be held responsible. While the learned general term stated that there was no question of proximate cause in this case, we are unable to indorse that statement, or to understand the basis for it. The doctrine of proximate cause is a fundamental rule of the law of damages, to the effect that damages are to be allowed in general only for the proximate consequences of the wrong, although sometimes the question of proximate cause is applied to consequential damages for the breach of a contract, as well as to damages for negligence or tort. That the principle of proximate cause is applicable in an action for tort seems to be established by all the authorities, and we find none holding a contrary doctrine. While there may be a degree of uncertainty as to the plain signification of the term "proximate cause," or rather in its application to various cases, still in this case there can be no question as to what was the proximate and immediate cause of the plaintiff's injury. Bishop, in his work on Noncontract Law (§ 42), in discussing this question, after remarking as to the uncertainty with which the term "proximate cause" may have been used and applied, and after defining the terms "proximate" and "remote" cause, says: "If, after the cause in question has been in operation, some independent force comes in, and produces an injury not its natural or probable effect, the author of the cause is not responsible." In Shearman & Redfield, Neg. § 26, it is said: "The breach of duty upon which an action is brought must be not only the cause, but the proximate cause, of the damage to the plaintiff. . . . The proximate cause of an event must be understood to be that which, in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new, independent cause, produces that event, and without which that event would not have occurred." Wharton thus discusses the question: "Supposing that, if it had not been for the intervention of a responsible third party, the defendant's negligence would have produced no damage to the plaintiff, is the defendant liable to the plaintiff? This question must be answered in the negative, for the general reason that causal connection between negligence and damage is broken by the interposition of independent responsible human action. I am negligent on a particular subject-matter [as to which I am not contractually bound]. Another person, moving independently, comes in, and either negligently or maliciously so acts as to make my negligence injurious to a third person. If so, the person so intervening acts as a nonconductor, and insulates my negligence, so that I cannot be sued for the mischief which the person so intervening directly produces. He is the one who is liable to the person injured." Wharton, Neg. § 134.

As has been said in an anonymous article in the American Law Review: "A proximate cause is one in which is involved the idea of necessity. It is one the connection between which and the effect is plain and intelligible; it is one which can be used as a term by which a proposition can be demonstrated, that is, one which can be reasoned from conclusively. A remote cause is one which is inconclusive in reasoning, because from it no certain conclusion can be legitimately drawn. In other words, a remote cause is a cause the connection between which and the effect is uncertain, vague, or indeterminate. It does not contain in itself the element of necessity between it and its effect. Marsilius Ficinus says: "From the remote cause the effect does not necessarily follow. This idea of necessity—the necessary connection between the cause and the effect—is the prime distinction between a proximate and a remote cause. The proximate cause being given, the effect must follow. But, although the existence of the remote cause is necessary for the existence of the effect (for, unless there has been a remote cause, there can be no effect), still the existence of the remote cause does not necessarily imply the existence of the effect. The remote cause being given, the effect may or may not follow." 4 Am. L. Rev. pp. 201, 205. In Marble v. Worcester, 4 Gray, 396, Chief Justice Shaw said: "On account of the difficulty in unraveling a combination of causes, and of tracing each result, as a matter of fact, to its true, real, and efficient cause, the law has adopted the rule before stated, of regarding the proximate, and not the remote, cause of the occurrence, which is the subject of inquiry." In Crain v. Petrie, 6 Hill, 522, 524, 41 Am. Dec. 765, the question of special damages was involved, and, consequently, the question of proximate cause; that is, whether the special damages were the legal and natural consequences of the wrong complained of. Nelson, Ch. J., 44 L. R. A.

in that case said: "To maintain a claim for special damages, they must appear to be the legal and natural consequences arising from the tort, and not from the wrongful act of a third party remotely induced thereby. In other words, the damages must proceed wholly and exclusively from the injury complained of." In Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 475, 24 L. ed. 250, it was said: "The inquiry must therefore always be whether there was any intermediate cause disconnected from the primary fault, and self-operating, which produced the injury." In Hofnagle v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 55 N. Y. 612, it was held that the act of one person cannot be said to be the proximate cause of an injury when the act of another person has intervened and directly inflicted it.

Another principle of proximate cause which seems to be well established is that an accident or injury cannot be attributed to a cause unless, without its operation, it would not have happened. Ring v. Cohoes, 77 N. Y. 83, 33 Am. Rep. 574; Taylor v. Yonkers, 105 N. Y. 202, 59 Am. Rep. 492; Ayres v. Hammondsport, 130 N. Y. 665; Grant v. Pennsylvania & N. Y. Canal & R. Co. 133 N. Y. 657. When damages claimed in an action are occasioned by one of two causes, for one of which the defendant is responsible, and for the other of which he is not responsible, the plaintiff must fail if his evidence does not show that the damage was produced by the former cause, and the jury must not be left to mere conjecture, and a bare possibility that the damage was caused in consequence of the act of the defendant is not sufficient. Searles v. Manhattan R. Co. 101 N. Y. 662. The plaintiff must fail if the evidence does not show that the injury was the result of some cause for which the defendant is responsible; and, where the proof is by circumstances, the circumstances themselves must be shown, and not left to rest in conjecture; and, when shown, it must appear that the inference sought is the only one which can fairly and reasonably be drawn from the facts. Ruppert v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 154 N. Y. 94.

When we apply to the undisputed facts of this case these rules relating to proximate cause, it becomes quite manifest that the judgment in this action cannot be upheld. All the injuries which the plaintiff sustained were caused directly and immediately by the act of Norcross in exploding the dynamite. That was clearly the proximate, and we think the only, cause of the plaintiff's injury. It was the only efficient cause, as, confessedly, without the explosion the plaintiff would not have been injured; and under no circumstances can it be properly said that the act of the defendant in changing the plaintiff's position a few inches to the left of where he previously stood caused the explosion or occasioned the catastrophe. Surely, that was not an act without which the explosion would not have occurred, nor can it be held to have been the proximate cause of the explosion. The most that can be said is that it produced a situation which existed at the moment it occurred. Obviously, the explosion would have occurred if the defendant had moved the plaintiff in an opposite direction, or had not moved him at all. Nothing which the defendant did could have produced the injury sustained by the plaintiff without another independent intervening cause. There was no evidence in the case of any unnecessary relation of cause and effect between the act of which the plaintiff complains and the explosion which caused the injury. Under the proof, we think the question whether the defendant's act was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury was a question of law, and that the court erred in not directing a verdict on that ground.

Another ground upon which the defendant seeks to sustain this appeal is that the court erred in refusing to strike out, and in not instructing the jury to disregard, the evidence of George Baillard, to which we have already referred. While it is possible that there was sufficient proof to justify the jury in finding that the "elderly stranger" to whom the witness referred was the defendant, still, it is obvious that the evidence admitted was so general and inconclusive as to render it only conjectural as to whether it related to the subject at issue at all. It was that the witness understood this "elderly stranger" to say something about being protected,—about a protection he had had from the explosion. As to the nature of the protection, its extent, whether by physical matter or an overruling Providence, or a protection of some other character, nothing was attempted to be shown. It seems to us quite clear that no such uncertain statement should have been submitted to a jury or permitted to become the basis of a verdict involving the rights of parties. It was too uncertain, indefinite, and vague to be permitted to serve any such purpose.

Our attention is also called to various rulings of the trial court which arose upon the cross-examination of the defendant. His cross-examination was a severe and rigorous one. While, perhaps, it was not objectionable upon that ground alone, we think the plaintiff's counsel was permitted to go beyond the legitimate bounds of a proper cross-examination in several respects, to which we cannot call attention in detail within the proper limits of this opinion. Counsel was permitted to prove upon the cross-examination of the defendant, or at least to attempt to do so, that the defendant had not shown proper sympathy or paid proper attention to the plaintiff after he was injured. How that evidence could properly bear upon the legal rights of the parties it is extremely difficult to understand. The only purpose it could serve was to prejudice and excite the passions of the jury.

Again, we find rulings which were made on the cross-examination of the defendant in regard to the article in the New York World, which we think cannot be upheld.

It has ever been the theory of our government, and a cardinal principle of our jurisprudence, that the rich and poor stand alike in courts of justice, and that neither the wealth of the one nor the poverty of the other shall be permitted to affect the administration of the law. Evidence of the wealth of a party is never admissible, directly or otherwise, unless in those exceptional cases, where position or wealth is necessarily involved in determining the damages sustained. As to this general proposition there can be no doubt, and no authorities need be cited. Notwithstanding this well-established principle, the plaintiff was permitted to show by the defendant, upon his cross-examination, substantially, or at least to a great extent, the amount of property possessed by him, its character, and his business. He was permitted to show the number of railroads the defendant operated, the banks in which he was a director, that he dealt in stocks, that he loaned money, and other details of his affairs. We think much of this evidence was improperly received, and that the exceptions were valid. But we deem it both unnecessary and unwise to extend this necessarily protracted opinion by either discussing those questions or considering the various other exceptions contained in the record which present questions that are serious, if not fatal, to this judgment. No good purpose could be served by such a course, as the judgment must be reversed upon the more substantial grounds which have been fully discussed.

It is impossible to consider the plaintiff's injuries without a feeling of profound sympathy. His misfortune was a severe one, but sympathy, although one of the noblest sentiments of our nature, which brings its reward to both the subject and actor, has no proper place in the administration of the law. It is properly based upon moral or charitable considerations alone, and neither courts nor juries are justified in yielding to its influence in the discharge of their important and responsible duties. If permitted to make it the basis of transferring the property of one party to another, great injustice would be done, the foundation of the law disturbed, and anarchy result. Hence, every proper consideration requires us to disregard our sympathy, and decide the questions of law presented according to the well-established rules governing them.

The judgments of the Appellate Division and of the Trial Court should be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

of an award under an arbitration agreement becomes forfeited upon revocation of the arbitration and subject to payment of the damages allowed by statute against one who revokes an arbitration, although made by a third person who committed no breach of the agreement and had no control over the one who did so.

2. That an arbitration agreement provides that the costs shall not become part of the amount for which a deposit made to secure payment of the award shall be liable, will not, in case the deposit is forfeited by revocation of the award, prevent the deposit from becoming chargeable with the costs which the statute casts upon the one who revokes an arbitration.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of a General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for New York County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enforce a lien on a deposit made to secure compliance with the award to be made upon a submission to arbitration. Affirmed.

Statement by VANB, J.:

On the 10th of October, 1885, a quadripartite agreement was entered into between the Union Insurance Company, party of the first part, the Insurance Company of the state of Pennsylvania, party of the second part, the Continental Insurance Company, party of the third part, and Lorenz Dimick, party of the fourth part, which, after reciting the existence of certain controversies between the parties of the first and second parts and the parties of the third and fourth parts, arising chiefly out of the dealings of said Dimick and his firm in the affairs of said parties, and that certain civil actions were pending between the parties of the first and second parts, respectively, and the parties of the third and fourth parts, provided that all the matters embraced in said actions, as well as all other actions or causes of action pending or existing between the parties of the first and second parts, or either of them, and the party of the third part and the party of the fourth part, individually or as a member of the firm of Crosby & Dimick, or either of them, and all claims of the party of the third part and the party of the fourth part, respectively, against the party of the first part and the party of the second part, respectively, and of the party of the third part against the party of the fourth part, and vice versa, should be submitted to three arbitrators, two of whom were named and authorized to appoint the third. It was further agreed that a judgment might be entered in the supreme court upon the award, and that such award should be final and without right of review by appeal or otherwise by either of the parties, who expressly waived "any and all right under the statute or otherwise to apply to the court in any manner or on any ground to stay or prevent entry of an order of confirmation or entry of judgment upon such award." It was further provided that neither of the parties should "have the right to revoke the submission to arbitrators herein provided for, or this agreement, or any part thereof, and such arbitration shall not terminate or be revoked by the dissolution or death of either or any of the parties hereto." In case of the dissolution or death of any party, proceedings under the submission were to continue against the personal representatives or successors, "and any revocation by operation of law, and any and all right of revocation given or permitted by statute or otherwise," was "expressly waived and abandoned." The compensation and expenses of the arbitrators and the expenses of witnesses were to be borne equally by the parties, each paying one fourth thereof, "the same to be advanced from time to time in the proportion above mentioned, upon the certificate of the arbitrators or a majority of them; the expenses of witnesses to be adjusted and allowed by the arbitrators or a majority of them." The compensation of the arbitrators was fixed at $50 a day, but was not to exceed the sum of $5,000 to each, in the aggregate. No part of the costs or expenses of the arbitration or of the witnesses was to be recovered by the prevailing party or parties, or entered in the judgment, and any limitation by statute as to the rate of such compensation was waived. The agreement further provided "that, at or before the execution and delivery of this agreement, there shall be deposited with the Central Trust Company of the city of New York security satisfactory to the parties of the first and second parts, to the amount of $50,000, to secure the payment, performance, and satisfaction of any award in favor of said parties of the first and second parts, or either of them, that may be made against said Dimick in said arbitration by said arbitrators, or a majority of them; payment and satisfaction of said award, up to said amount of $50,000, to be paid upon demand by said Central Trust Company of New York, in accordance with any judgment that may be entered upon such award." The parties of the first and second parts each agreed to discontinue all civil actions pending in their favor, or in favor of either of them, against the parties of the third and fourth parts, or either of them; and it was provided that, if said actions were not thus discontinued, said security might at once be withdrawn. This agreement was executed in quadruplicate, by said Dimick, October 10, 1885; by the Union and State Companies, respectively, October 14, 1885; and by the Continental, October 17, 1885. On the 13th of October, 1885, the Continental Company deposited with the Central Trust Company a certificate for 500 shares of Harlem Railroad stock, which was accepted instead of the $50,000 in cash required by the agreement, and the trust company gave a receipt to the plaintiffs, dated on the same day, stating that said shares were to be held in accordance with the terms of said agreement. On the 18th of October, 1887, after the arbitration had proceeded for about two years, and before it was closed or the matters in controversy submitted to the arbitrators for decision, said Dimick revoked the arbitration, and such revocation was subsequently adjudged to be in all respects valid and conclusive. People, Union Ins. Co., v. Nash, 111 N. Y. 310, 2 L. R. A. 180.

The complaint, after setting forth the foregoing facts in substance, further alleged that the plaintiffs had incurred costs and expenses, and had suffered damages, in preparing for the arbitration, and in conducting the proceedings thereunder to the time of the revocation, exceeding the sum of $50,000. The wife and executrix of said Dimick was made a party to the action, he having died on the 29th of February, 1888. The Central Trust Company was not a party to the agreement, but is a party to the action. The relief demanded was that the said stock should be sold, the rights and interests of the parties therein determined, and that the plaintiffs be paid, out of the proceeds, "the amount of their costs, expenses, and damages incurred and suffered as aforesaid." Upon the trial of the action at special term, it was held that the plaintiffs' costs, expenses, and damages incurred in preparing for the arbitration should be allowed to the amount of $40,178.45; that the shares of stock in question were subject to a charge in favor of the plaintiffs for the payment to them of that sum; that the Central Trust Company should sell the stock, and out of the proceeds pay said sum to the plaintiffs, with leave to the Continental Company, or its assigns, at any time prior to the sale, to redeem said stock by the payment of said sum to the plaintiffs. The judgment entered accordingly was affirmed on appeal to the general term, and the defendants came here.

Messrs. William Allen Butler, John Notman, and William C. Trull, for appellants:

The rights of the several parties were fixed by the agreement of submission, dated October 10, 1885, and must be determined according to its terms.

By the plain terms of the agreement of submission the required deposit of $50,000 was solely to secure payment, performance, and satisfaction of any award in favor of the plaintiffs against Dimick in accordance with any judgment that might be entered upon such award. The words employed convey a definite meaning which must be regarded as the one intended.

Schoonmaker v. Hoyt, 148 N. Y. 425.

Fairly construed according to its plain meaning and the rule of interpretation applicable to the agreement, an award by the arbitrators in favor of the plaintiffs against Dimick, and a judgment entered thereon, were conditions precedent to any claim by the plaintiffs to the fund deposited with the Central Trust Company under the terms of the agreement.

Moore v. Cockcroft, 4 Duer, 133.

The case at bar falls within the rule that where, under a contract, payment is to be made upon certain specified conditions, those conditions must be shown to have been performed or to exist as prescribed by the contract, before any claim or cause of action arises for the recovery of the stipulated payment.

Coal Co. 50 N. Y. 250; Sweet v. Morrison, 116 N. Y. 19; Oakley v. Morton, 11 N. Y. 25, 62 Am. Dec. 49.

While the revocation by Dimick was a breach of the agreement of submission, it entailed no other consequence than to give the aggrieved parties an action for damages against him, and gave plaintiffs no claim on the fund deposited to secure payment of any award and judgment.

People, Union Ins. Co., v. Nash, 111 N. Y. 310, 2 L. R. A. 180.

Though a party may be able to revoke the authority of the arbitrator he cannot revoke the instrument of submission, but will be liable to an action on such instrument. The remedy for revocation of a submission when not under seal is by action for breach of agreement.

Brown v. Tanner, M'Clel. & Y. 464; Warburton v. Storr, 6 Dowl. & R. 213.

When the submission is by deed, the revoking party is liable to an action on the covenant.

Milne v. Gratrix, 7 East, 608; King v. Joseph, 5 Taunt. 452.

The deposit clause of the agreement of submission is not affected by § 2384 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The contention that whether the deposit clause in the agreement of submission is treated as a part of that instrument, or as collateral thereto, or by way of suretyship, it is, in any case, the equivalent of a bond to perform the award, the penalty of which was recoverable in case of revocation of the submission, is untenable.

A contract for suretyship must be strictly construed, and most favorably to the surety, since such a contract is always strictissimi juris.

Messrs. William V. Rowe, Hood Gilpin, and Treadwell Cleveland, for respondents:

The security deposited is, in law, and so far as the liability in question is concerned, the precise equivalent of a personal surety, or of the penalty of a bond, to secure performance of the award.

Where a submission to arbitration has been revoked, the penalty is forfeited; but the plaintiff can recover no more than the actual damages sustained.

Allen v. Watson, 16 Johns. 205.

The revisers proceeded so to declare the law in the Revised Statutes.

Revisers' Notes, 3 Rev. Stat. 2d ed. 775; 5 Edmonds, Stat. 763.

So far as concerns the right of action, the present Code is merely affirmative and declaratory.

A cause of action or a remedy may be justified and maintained, at a party's option, either under the Code or under the principles of the common law, which the Code thus declares, the amount of the recovery being alone limited by the negative words of the statute.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 202; Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. pp. 29, 30; 2 Coke, Inst. p. 200; Bishop, Written Laws, § 164.

The revocation of a submission, by making performance of an award impossible, creates a cause of action against the party revoking, for breach of contract, and forfeits all penalties conditioned to secure performance of the award.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Each party to the submission agreement, which was quadripartite in character, was bound only to the extent of the promises, express or implied, made by them respectively. Berry Harvester Co. v. Walter A. Wood Mowing & R. Mach. Co. 152 N. Y. 540. While the contract required a deposit to be made in behalf of Dimick for the benefit of the plaintiffs, it did not expressly provide by whom it was to be made. The object of the deposit was to secure performance of any award against Dimick in favor of the plaintiffs, or either of them. It was not to secure performance by him of the arbitration agreement, generally, but simply of that part relating to payment of the award. Every other covenant, by whomsoever made, stood without security. The deposit bore no relation to any part of the agreement other than 44 L. R. A.

that pertaining to satisfaction of the award by Dimick, except the provision that, unless the pending actions were discontinued, the security might be withdrawn. In making the deposit, therefore, the Continental Company pledged its property for the purpose of securing payment by Dimick of any award made against him in favor of the Union and State Companies, which thereupon became the pledgees, the Continental Company the pledgor, and the trust company the holder of the pledge, in trust for the purpose aforesaid. As the object of the pledge was to secure performance of a certain act by Dimick, while the subject of the pledge belonged to the Continental Company, the latter became entitled to the rights of a surety with reference to the thing pledged, although it was not subject to the affirmative obligations of a surety; for it made no promise to perform for another, but simply deposited its property to secure fulfillment of a specified act by another upon a contingency named for the benefit of third parties. It was not a surety in the sense of one who had engaged to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, and it was not sued as a surety. No affirmative relief was asked, and no personal claim made against it. This action, therefore, is, in effect, a proceeding in rem to foreclose the pledge by securing a sale of the thing pledged for the benefit of the plaintiffs.

It is claimed by the defendants that the submission agreement furnishes no basis for such an action, because the condition of the pledge has not been broken. As the condition of the pledge was the payment of the award, they insist that an actual award was a condition precedent to the right to foreclose; and as there has been no award, and none can now be made, the agreement to pledge is functus officio, and the trust company is under an implied obligation to return the thing pledged to its owner. On the other hand, the plaintiffs claim that this action can be maintained under § 2384 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "in connection with well-settled common-law principles, as one based either upon the terms of the submission as a whole," or that part thereof which provided for the deposit. The section referred to is found in that part of the Code relating to arbitrations, and is as follows: "Liability of Party Who Revokes. Where a party expressly revokes a submission, made either as prescribed in this title or otherwise, any other party to the submission may maintain an action against him, and also against his sureties, if any, upon the submission, or any instrument collateral thereto, in which action the plaintiff may recover all the costs and other expenses, and all the damages, which he has incurred in preparing for the arbitration, and in conducting the proceedings to the time of the revocation. Either of the arbitrators may recover, in an action against the revoking party, his reasonable fees and expenses." Section 2384. The next section provides that "a sum, penalty, forfeiture, or damages, shall not be recovered for a revocation of a submission to arbitration, made either as prescribed in this title or otherwise, except as prescribed in the last section; notwithstanding any stipulated damages, penalty, or forfeiture, expressed in the submission, or in any instrument collateral thereto." The 1st section quoted authorizes an action against one who revokes a submission, and also against his sureties upon the submission, as well as against his sureties upon any instrument collateral to the submission, to recover all the costs and other expenses, and all the damages incurred in preparing for and conducting the proceedings to the time of revocation; and the 2d section limits the recovery to such costs, expenses, and damages, even if the submission provides for a more extended recovery. These sections reproduce, in substance, similar provisions contained in the Revised Statutes. 2 Rev. Stat. pp. 544, 545, §§ 23, 25. Before the passage of the Revised Statutes, it had been held in Allen v. Watson, 16 Johns. 205, that a party could revoke the powers conferred by an arbitration bond, but the consequence was a forfeiture of the penalty, although the other party could recover no more than the actual damages sustained. The revisers, in their notes, refer to this case, and state that it was deemed useful to finally settle "the much agitated question respecting stipulated damages which are frequently inserted in submissions to avoid the general rule of law concerning penalties"; otherwise, a resort to equity would have been necessary to obtain relief from the forfeiture. We think this is what the Code accomplishes, and that it does not place a limitation upon the right of action at common law to recover damages for revocation, except by limiting the amount of the recovery. It creates no new or exclusive remedy, but confirms an old one, and fixes the measure of damages. The act of revocation by Dimick made the condition upon which the deposit was made impossible of performance. He thereupon became liable, not for an award, but for the expenses incurred in the effort to secure an award, which were rendered of no effect by his act. He voluntarily disabled himself from performing his covenant to pay the award, and that, according to the authorities, was in itself a breach of the covenant.

The earliest authority upon the subject is the celebrated Vynior's Case, 8 Coke, 81b, where the condition of an arbitration bond was "to stand to, abide by, and perform an award." The only breach by the defendant was a revocation of the authority of the arbitrators. It was resolved that the defendant, by his own act, "made the condition of the bond impossible . . . to be performed, and, by consequence, his bond is become single, and without the benefit or help of any condition, because he has disabled himself to perform the condition." This has been followed for many years, and has been made the basis of a multitude of judgments, both in England and in this country. Thus, in Warburton v. Storr, 4 Barn. & C. 103, 108, the defendant agreed, under a penalty, to perform an award, and, by revocation of the submission, prevented himself from doing so; but he was held to have broken his agreement, and thereby to have subjected himself to an action for the penalty. Vynior's Case is the only one cited, and the court, relying upon it, said "that if a party covenants to do a certain thing, and afterwards, by his own act, disables himself from performing it, that is in itself a breach of the covenant." So, in Brown v. Tanner, M'Clel. & Y. 464, it was held that the defendant's revocation of his submission, whereby the performance of his agreement to stand to, obey, abide, and fulfil the award, became impossible, was a breach of that agreement. In Craftsbury v. Hill, 28 Vt. 763, the condition of an arbitration bond was that, if the principle should "well and truly observe, perform, and keep the award and determination which the said arbitrators shall make and publish," the obligation was to be void. The only breach of the condition alleged was a revocation of the submission; and it was held on demurrer that it was a breach of the submission, because the principal had deprived the arbitrators of the power to make an award, as well as himself of the power to observe, perform, and keep it, and that this, in legal effect, was a forfeiture of the bond, and a breach of the condition, rendering both principal and surety liable. Where a defendant, by preventing one of three referees from acting with the others, defeated any valid award, it was held to be a sufficient breach of an agreement for having and perfecting a reference. Quimby v. Melvin, 28 N. H. 250. In Brown v. Leavitt, 26 Me. 251, 256, the court said: "It is a general rule that any party or any one of a party may revoke his submission before award made, giving notice thereof to the arbitrators. But then he forfeits his obligation he has given to abide the award. 1 Dane, Abr. 277, chap. 13, art. 14, § 15; Milne v. Gratria, 7 East, 608; King v. Joseph, 5 Taunt. 452. . . . It is a well-established rule of law that if a party covenants to do a certain thing, and afterwards, by his own act, disables himself from doing it, or declines doing it when he was able, it is a breach of the covenant,"—citing Vynior's Case and Warburton v. Storr. The principle is not confined to agreements of submission, but is applied to contracts generally; and the rule is universally recognized that where a party, before the time of performance arrives, puts it out of his power to keep his contract, there is an immediate right of action for a breach of that contract by anticipation. Hochster v. De La Tour, 2 El. & Bl. 678; Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Exch. 11, 114; Synge v. Synge [1894] 1 Q. B. 466; Johnstone v. Mil-ling, L. R. 16 Q. B. Div. 460; Orist v. Armour, 34 Barb. 378; Burtis v. Thompson, 42 N. Y. 246, 1 Am. Rep. 516; Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362, 375, 19 Am. Rep. 285; Ferris v. Spooner, 102 N. Y. 10; Nichols v. Scranton Steel Co. 137 N. Y. 471, 485. In Frets v. Frets, 1 Cow. 335, 341, a bond in fact given for the performance of an award contained no condition. One of the parties revoked, and it was declared that, "by the revocation, the penalty of the bond is forfeited, and an action lies upon it to recover the damages actually sustained." In Russell, Arbitration & Awards, p. 100, it is laid down that "every submission contains some words expressing or implying the agreement of the parties to abide by and perform the award of the arbitrator. Preventing the award being made is a breach of this agreement as much as not performing it when made, and, when the submission is by bond, is a forfeiture of the penalty."

In the case before us the pledge was made to secure performance by Dimick, and, as he failed to perform by depriving himself of the power to perform, he broke the condition upon which the pledge was made. As was said in Ferris v. Spooner, 102 N. Y. 10, where property was pledged for performance by a party, "when therefore he repudiated the further performance of the contract, the plaintiff was . . . set at liberty to enforce his securities." If he had furnished sureties for the performance of an award, they would have been liable, because revocation prevented an award, and constituted a breach of the promise to perform. This would be true even if the promise of the sureties was limited to payment of the award, and did not apply to any other part of the agreement of submission, because, by voluntarily preventing an award, he virtually broke the agreement to perform the award. He was "bound to stand to the award," and when he made an award impossible, and disabled himself from performing the condition of the pledge, he thereby broke the condition itself. We have a pledge as security in place of personal sureties. The pledge is to secure performance of an award when made. If there had been no revocation, and an award had been made to the plaintiffs of $50,000, they could have proceeded against the subject of the pledge by an action to foreclose their lien thereon, to procure a sale thereof, and payment of their claim out of the proceeds. We have not that exact case before us, which would be an actual breach of the condition on which the pledge was made; but we have its equivalent, in an implied breach of that condition, because Dimick intentionally rendered an award impossible. If the 500 shares of stock could have been sold by proceedings in rem founded on an actual award, the same proceedings may be maintained, founded upon that which the authorities regard as having the same effect as a breach of the condition to pay the award. The pledge was to be forfeited upon the making of an award and nonpayment thereof, and the pledge was forfeited by the act of Dimick in making an award impossible. Here the statute comes in and limits the amount of the damages to those caused by the fruitless effort to prepare and try the case, and submit it to the arbitrators, so that they could pass upon it. We base our decision upon the agreement and the pledge made to secure performance of a part thereof, and the legal consequences resulting upon common-law principles from the disabling act of Dimick in preventing an award, giving effect to the statute as both sanctioning the action and limiting the amount of the recovery.

It is, however, insisted that none of the damages claimed are recoverable in any event, because the agreement of submission prevents it. The items of damages were fixed as to amount by the stipulation of the parties, with no admission, however, of any liability; and the defendants duly objected to the allowance of anything for fees of arbitrators, counsel, or witnesses. This position is founded upon the provision of the agreement of submission that the fees of arbitrators and witnesses should be paid equally by the parties, and that no part of the costs of the arbitration or the expenses of witnesses should be recovered by the prevailing party, or entered in the judgment. This simply settled what should follow an award when made, and what should be included in the judgment to be entered upon the award. It does not deal with the consequences of revocation, nor prevent the recovery of expenses incurred in preparing for the arbitration, as allowed by statute, where an award is prevented by revocation. That wrongful act was not under contemplation by the parties when they provided that costs and expenses should not become part of the judgment, for they had all promised not to revoke in another part of the agreement. They were dealing simply with the award and the judgment to be rendered thereon; and, as was said by one of the learned justices below, "the stipulation relied upon was predicated upon a continuance and completed execution of the agreement. It was, in effect, inconsistent with revocation, and was therefore destroyed by revocation." In covenanting against the recovery of expenses, they proceeded upon the theory that the arbitration agreement was to be performed, and not revoked; and the argument already made as to breach of the condition through a deliberate act rendering performance impossible applies with equal force to the position taken by the appellants with reference to the allowance of these items of damage. The contingency of a revocation was not provided for by the agreement to submit, but the statute and the common law take care of it. The cause of action arises through the submission, the deposit, the act of revocation, and the statute. By revoking, Dimick prevented an award, and thereby broke his promise to pay the award. At common law he would have been liable for all damages resulting from the breach, including the amount for which an award should have been made; but the statute intervening prevents that result, and allows a recovery for the expenses of the arbitration, which it substitutes in the place of all other damages. By preventing an award, Dimick became liable for the expenses incurred in trying the case before the arbitrators, because the pledge made to secure the award was forfeited by the act that made an award impossible. By violating his agreement, he not only made himself liable, but also the property pledged for him. Instead of allowing an absolute forfeiture, however, the statute, which was a part of the contract, and is referred to therein, measures the damages as already mentioned. If an award had been made, the expenses could not have been recovered; but the plaintiffs would have had the value thereof in an award settling all controversies between the parties. The agreement would then have been enforced as made, and any award in favor of the plaintiffs would have been paid out of the proceeds of the pledge, not exceeding the limit named. They incurred legitimate expenses in the effort to secure an award, but that effort was defeated by the act of a party, which, as the courts hold, was equivalent to a violation of the condition upon which the pledge was made. The pledge secured the award, and Dimick prevented an award, and thereby forfeited the pledge, and made it, under the statute, liable for the expenses incurred in trying to get an award, the same as it would have been liable for an award if made. Nonpayment of an award would have violated the condition of the pledge no more than a revocation of the submission violated it, and the pledge is liable for all the direct and natural consequences of such violation except as limited by the statute.

Without further discussion, we think the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

O'Brien, J., dissenting:

The judgment in this case appropriates over $50,000 of the defendant's property to satisfy a claim for damages by the plaintiff for the breach of an agreement by one Dimick to arbitrate certain claims, and to pay the award. It is admitted that the breach was the act of Dimick, and of him alone, in revoking the submission after the arbitration had been pending over two years. The plaintiff's claim is for the damages sustained by the payment of its expenses of the arbitration while pending, and nothing else. It is not claimed, or even suggested, that the defendant had any power or right to prevent Dimick from revoking the agreement, or that it had any control over his action in that regard. The decision contains another curious, but perfectly correct, admission, and that is that the defendant committed no breach of the agreement itself, and was not the surety of the one who did.

With these facts conceded at the outset, the mind is at once directed to the inquiry whether the judgment has any support in law, reason, or authority, since, if it has not, the decree which transfers such a large portion of the defendant's property to the plaintiff is but an arbitrary edict, and little better than downright confiscation. The discussion of the case up to this time has produced at least five judicial opinions by as many different judges, including the opinion of this court now before us. After reading them all, it is not too much to say that no two of them are at entire agreement upon any clear or definite theory of liability. This discord in opinion and theory is, perhaps, not at all surprising. While the case would be a very simple one, involving no difficulties whatever, if we would only aim to give effect to the plain and clear language of the agreement which the parties made, it becomes very difficult when we attempt to make a new one, based, not upon the language which the parties employed, but upon reasoning processes so subtle and artificial that it is difficult for an ordinary mind to grasp them, and quite impossible for any two persons to state them in the same way. Courts are often astute to defeat fraud and prevent injustice, and sometimes go to the extreme limits of construction in order to compel a party to pay a claim which is just and which, in the forum of conscience, he ought to pay. With all that, there need be no complaint, but it would require a very acute mind to discover in the plaintiff's claim any such element of equity as would warrant any court in putting a strain upon law, or upon the language in which the parties have carefully expressed their mutual rights and obligations.

It appears upon the face of the agreement that, when it was executed, various suits at law, in behalf of the plaintiff, were pending in the courts, and, by the terms of the submission, these suits were to be discontinued, and the claims involved therein submitted to the arbitrators. When the arbitration was revoked by the sole act of Dimick, the right to prosecute these actions was revived, and it was admitted at the argument that they had been prosecuted, and the claims recovered, as we may assume, with the cost of prosecution. So that, while the plaintiff lost the right to have an award of arbitrators, it gained the right to have the judgment of the courts upon the claims. In legal theory, it could have lost nothing but the expenses of the arbitration, and, in fact, it may have gained more than that in the recovery. But nothing can more clearly reveal the want of any strong equity in the plaintiff's claim than the agreement itself. There the plaintiff expressly stipulates that it will pay all of its own expenses, and that the defendant shall not, under any circumstances, be liable for them, since they could not be made any part of the award, or included in it. The only purpose of this action is to collect from the defendant's property the very expenses which, by the agreement, the plaintiff was to bear itself, and which it is conceded the defendant never agreed to pay. The parties virtually stipulated with each other that, in the event of revocation by one, none of the others not participating in that act should claim damages as against each other, but should pay their own costs. They bound each other so far as words could do it, not to revoke and in any event, to pay their own costs. The railroad stock, which is the subject of this action, was pledged for one purpose, and one only, and that was to pay an award when made, and the expenses which the plaintiff now seeks to have declared a lien upon it could never by any possibility become a part of that award. It is conceded that, had the plaintiff recovered an award of $10,000, it could not collect a dollar of the expenses of the arbitration from this property, although as large then as now, for the plain reason that it was not pledged for any such purpose. The plaintiff has no more right to appropriate this property for its expenses now than it would then, unless we are to hold that the agreement under which the pledge was made means one thing in case an award was made and another thing in case it was not made, or one thing before revocation and something else after. We must hold that, although the purpose of the pledge was clearly expressed in writing, yet that purpose was subject to be enlarged and changed without the consent of the owner, by future events and contingencies not within the contemplation of the parties when the writing was made, and in which the owner was in no manner concerned. The plaintiff is seeking to do, now that there is no award, what it could not do if one had been made, thus profiting by the act of Dimick, since by that act it must have acquired some right against the defendant's property that it did not possess before; or, to state it in another way, the plaintiff's claim is and must be that by the act of Dimick it gained the right to demand costs against this property and the defendant lost the right to object to that demand. When the judgment in this case is carefully analyzed, it virtually declares that, during the two years that the arbitration was pending, the defendant's property was pledged to pay an award, since that is the only purpose expressed in the writing; but at the end of that period, by Dimick's act of revocation, it became pledged for something else,—that is to say, for the plaintiff's costs and expenses, although the plaintiff agreed to bear them itself, and the defendant who owned the pledge never gave its consent in any form that it should be devoted to any such purpose. When the terms of the instrument under which the defendant's property was deposited are placed in contrast with the provisions of the judgment, it will be difficult to resist the conclusion that the court must have made for the parties a new and different contract.

(1) By the terms of the instrument, there was no obligation upon the defendant to deposit its property in pledge for any purpose, but it volunteered to make the deposit for a particular purpose only, and that was to pay any award made against Dimick. There was no award made, and it is said that, at the end of two years, Dimick rendered it impossible by revoking the arbitration. The decision therefore is that the defendant's property pledged to pay an award which was never made is forfeited to the plaintiff for another purpose, namely, to pay the costs of the arbitration. But it is said that the plaintiff lost the right to procure an award, and should be compensated for that loss. The answer to that is that the loss of a prospective award is not, since the statute, a legitimate element in the estimation of damages for the breach of an agreement to arbitrate.

(2) Not only were these costs by the terms of the agreement to be excluded from the award, but the plaintiff stipulated to bear and pay them itself. The courts have discharged the plaintiff from the obligation of the agreement to pay its own costs, by ordering them to be paid out of the defendant's property.

(3) The most favorable award that the 44 L. R. A.

plaintiff could possibly obtain against Dimick was secured by the pledge of the 500 shares of stock, and nothing more. The claims that it had against Dimick, when reduced to the form of an award, were to be paid out of that as far as it would go; but, under the judgment, the plaintiff, without any award whatever, gets the stock or its proceeds, not to pay the claims, but to pay the costs of an arbitration, frustrated by the act of Dimick; and it has the judgment upon the claims and costs besides, or the money collected under them.

No review of this case would be fair or just that does not take careful note of the grounds upon which these conclusions rest, and the reasoning process from which they have been deduced. It has been often said, upon high authority, that law was the perfection of human reason, and that whatever is contrary to reason is generally contrary to law. If, therefore, it can be shown by any fair reasoning process that the defendant's property has been forfeited to the plaintiff by the act or default of Dimick, then any hasty views or impressions concerning the propositions above stated must at once disappear. It is claimed that these conclusions all rest upon sound reason and well-established legal principles.

1. In the first place, it is said that the judgment rests well upon a statute; that is upon § 2384 of the Code. The section provides that, where a party revokes an arbitration, any other party to the submission may maintain an action against him and his sureties upon the agreement, or any instrument collateral thereto, to recover the costs and damages incurred in preparing for the arbitration. Inasmuch as the defendant owning the stock in question did not revoke the arbitration, and was not surety for Dimick, who did, and since there is not any instrument collateral to the agreement of submission, it is very difficult to perceive how this statute can have any application to the case. Dimick was the only one who revoked, but he gave no sureties or collateral instrument. The plaintiff can doubtless proceed against him for breach of his agreement, and then the statute measures the damages. It is admitted on all sides that Dimick or his estate is liable. But the fact that one who broke his agreement is liable in damages for the breach does not prove that another, who kept the agreement to the letter, is also liable, or that his property can be taken to pay the costs preceding the revocation. It is quite impossible to say from the various opinions in the case how much or how little of a part this statute is supposed to play in the case. None of the learned judges who have discussed the questions have been willing to rest the case upon it, while it is equally apparent that none of them have felt entirely safe without it. But it is quite obvious that it can give the plaintiff no aid if the stock was not pledged for the damages arising from Dimick's revocation, then the statute cannot and does not enlarge or change the purpose of the pledge. On the other hand, if it was pledged for that purpose by the agreement, then the plaintiff needs no statute, but may stand upon the instrument itself. The theory of the action is that the plaintiff has a lien upon the stock. Of course, it never got any lien except such as arises from the terms of the agreement. That agreement might confer a lien for an award, without costs, when made, but what the plaintiff now claims is a lien for costs alone, without any award whatever. Whatever lien the plaintiff had, attached immediately on the execution and delivery of the agreement; and the purpose of the pledge was specific and definite. The lien now claimed is one arising from the act of Dimick, committed two years afterwards, and which clearly was not within the contemplation of any of the parties. When and how a lien to pay an award without any costs was transmuted into a lien to pay costs alone, as damages for the act of Dimick, is a problem in the case that no one has yet attempted to solve. This is the critical point in the discussion, and, when we reach it, mere assertion and generalization will not answer. We must stop to inquire just how the plaintiff has acquired a lien on this property for the damages arising from Dimick's act in defeating an arbitration that might or might not result in an award against him. No man can get a lien upon or an interest in his neighbor's property except through some contract. Did the defendant ever agree to charge this property with the costs incurred by plaintiff in the arbitration? If so, how and in what language? When the defendant bound the plaintiff to bear these very costs, and excluded them entirely as an element in the controversy, did it intend or contemplate any such thing as making them a charge on its own property? When the plaintiff covenanted to bear these costs itself, did it then intend or contemplate any such thing as their collection out of the defendant's property? These questions admit of but one answer, and that must prove that agreement of the defendant, express or implied, a lien upon the property that the parties never created or intended to create. Obviously, the plaintiff got no lien from any agreement of the defendant, express or implied. It got no lien through Dimick, since he never owned it, or had it in his possession or under his control, or even made the deposit. There is no legal privity or connection of any kind between Dimick's act of revocation and the defendant, or the property in question; and so it seems to me that the plaintiff has no lien at all.

The only object of a bond in a submission to arbitration is to secure someone against damages arising from the exercise of the right of revocation, and there can now be no damages but the costs and expenses incurred. In all such cases there is, of course, a privity of contract between the sureties and the injured party. But here we have a wholly different situation, since the parties intended to make, and supposed they had made an irrevocable agreement of submission, in which damages would be impossible; and then they proceeded to covenant with each other that the costs—now the only element that can constitute damages—should be eliminated from the submission entirely, and each party should bear and pay its own costs, and, consequently, that neither party should claim damages of the other in case they were mistaken as to the irrevocable character of the contract. It is plain, therefore, that the lien for costs and expenses as damages which the plaintiff claims upon the property in question does not and cannot arise from any contract between the parties. It is a purely artificial development by reasoning processes upon principles derived from what are supposed to be analogous cases, but which really have no application to the special and peculiar agreement under which the defendant pledged its property. When it made the pledge for a single specified purpose, the appropriation of it to another and different purpose is a plain violation of its legal rights.

2. In the opinion of my learned associate now before us it is stated that the plaintiff's stipulation to pay its own costs did not contemplate a revocation of the arbitration, and, since that unexpected event happened, the stipulation is no longer in the plaintiff's way. That is a very candid admission that the stock in question is to be devoted by the judgment to a purpose not within the intention or contemplation of the parties when they made the agreement. It reveals the fundamental error that has pervaded the case from the beginning. It is perfectly true that the contingency of revocation was not contemplated. The parties were pledged and became bound hand and foot against the happening of any such event, and not until this court held that the binding was of no avail did anyone attempt to give to the agreement a construction which the parties never intended it should have. The construction now is that the defendant pledged its property to secure a claim by the plaintiff for damages arising from the act of Dimick in revoking the arbitration,—something that was not within their intention at all. Of course, if that act was not within the contemplation of the plaintiff when it agreed to pay its own costs, neither was it within the contemplation of the defendant when it pledged its property to pay the award. While the intention of the parties was, of course, the same, yet the decision in the case discharges the plaintiff from its stipulation as to costs, which now mean damages, and at the same time changes and enlarges that of the defendant in regard to the purpose for which it made the pledge, by imposing upon its property a lien for a purpose never contemplated.

3. But it is said that the defendant's stock is surety for Dimick, and can be proceeded against in rem upon breach by him of his agreement. There is nothing whatever in the agreement or the transaction that creates any relations of suretyship for Dimick. There is no legal privity between them, such as must always exist between principal and surety. The defendant voluntarily deposited the stock for a specific purpose, and that was to pay an award when made. When that event happened, the plaintiff could appropriate the stock for that purpose, without any regard to Dimick, and as upon an original promise and pledge by the defendant. But, even if the property stood as surety to pay the award when made, then, surely, the owner may protect it by invoking all the rules of law applicable to the liability of sureties. The surety cannot be held beyond the very terms of his agreement, since it is strictissimi juris. His undertaking cannot be enlarged by construction or implication, and, when it is sought to make him answer for the act or default of another, it is sufficient for him to show that he has not expressly agreed to be answerable for such act or default. Page v. Krekey, 137 N. Y. 307, 21 L. R. A. 409; Smith v. Molleson, 148 N. Y. 241. The plaintiff can point to no agreement by which this property was to be devoted to the payment of damages arising from Dimick's act, but, on the contrary, it is conceded that no such purpose was in contemplation when the agreement was executed.

4. It is asserted that very ancient and some modern authorities sustain this judgment. The oldest case relied on is Vynior's Case, 8 Coke, 81b. That contains all that any of the others contains, and is quite as favorable to the plaintiff as any of them. All that case or any of the others holds that has any application to this case is that an agreement to perform an award is broken by a revocation of the arbitration. No one, I think, will question that. The cases are good authority against Dimick, the only one who committed the breach. They were all actions against the party who violated his covenant, and not, as in this case, against an innocent party that has kept it. None of them support or give any color of support to the proposition upon which this judgment rests. The right to maintain an action against the party guilty of a breach of his agreement to arbitrate, and who has rendered an award impossible by revocation, or against his sureties in legal privity with him, upon written instruments, should not be confounded with the right which the plaintiff asserts in this case. That is nothing less than the right to maintain an action against one who has never revoked, and who is not a surety, or in legal privity with another who did revoke, to appropriate property voluntarily pledged only to pay an award, under an agreement which excludes the right to damages in the form of costs, and casts that burden on the party who complains. Moreover, the decisions in these cases are supported by an element of right and justice conspicuously absent in this case, since it is plain that in all of them the plaintiff lost by the revocation the right to collect his costs by including them in the award, whereas in this case the plaintiff lost no such right, it having been excluded by its own agreement. It is perfectly plain that, in the special and peculiar agreement now under consideration, the parties undertook to protect the property in question from all consequences of a revocation by Dimick. It was for that purpose and to that end that the pledge was restricted to the payment of an award when made; that all parties renounced the right to revoke; that the right to costs, and consequently to damages, was expressly excluded, and the burden of paying its own costs imposed upon the plaintiff. There is but one ground, as it seems to me, upon which this judgment can rest, and that is that it was legally impossible for the defendant, by any stipulation, or by the use of any form of words, to confine the pledge to the payment of an award, or to protect the property from a claim of damages arising out of the conduct of Dimick. If that proposition is not refuted by the bare statement of it, then it is quite evident that no reasoning, however persuasive, would avail. I think that the plaintiff has not shown that it has any claim or lien upon the property which is the subject of this action, and that the judgment should be reversed.

William M. LADD et al., Respts.

(.....Or.....)

1. A bank receiving for collection a check the proceeds of which it is to retain to the drawer's credit will be regarded as receiving sufficient compensation for its services to make it liable for negligence in attempting to make the collection.
2. A custom of banks to send a check direct to the drawee bank for collection and return is not unreasonable, at least as applied to the collection of a plain, undorsed check.

NOTE.—On the question of sending checks directly to a drawee bank, see note to Anderson v. Rodgers (Kan.) 27 L. R. A. 248.

It will be seen that the present case lays 44 L. R. A.

3. Usages are presumed to be reasonable, and the person attacking them has the burden of showing their unreasonableness.

4. The retention by a collecting bank of a dishonored check, until after the drawee bank has closed, does not create any liability to the sender, unless he was injured thereby.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for alleged negligence on the part of defendants in the attempted collection of a bank check. Affirmed.

much stress on the existence of a banking custom. As to such customs in general, see note to Shaw v. Jacobs (Iowa) 21 L. R. A. 440.

Statement by Wolverton, Ch. J.:

This is an action to recover damages for alleged negligence on the part of the defendants in the attempted collection of a check drawn by plaintiff in their favor upon the United States Banking Company. The defendants are bankers, located at Portland, and the United States Banking Company at Sheridan, 50 miles distant. The plaintiff resided at Grande Ronde, some 15 miles from Sheridan, and, on January 16, 1894, forwarded from there the check in question to the defendants at Portland, with instructions to collect, and remit a certificate of deposit for one year, bearing interest. The check was received by defendants January 18, and forwarded to the United States Banking Company the same day, for collection and return. The banking company received it the next day, and on the 23d drew a draft for the amount thereof upon the Merchants' National Bank, its correspondent at Portland, and on the 24th sent the same through the mail to defendants, who received it the same day, and presented it for payment, which was refused. They immediately notified plaintiff by letter at Grand Ronde, and asked for instructions. Plaintiff replied on the 27th, saying: "I am at a loss as to the best course to pursue in the matter. I understand that there has been no attachment issued on the bank at Sheridan. The prevailing opinion is that they will be able to make satisfactory arrangements as soon as J. M. Baldrige, the vice president of the U. S. Banking Co., returns from the East, which will take place in a few days. However, if you think best, hold the check; if not, return to me. Any advice you can give me will be greatly appreciated." Defendants received the reply on the 30th, and on the 31st sent a letter to plaintiff, of which the following is a copy: "We have written to the Bank of Sheridan that they return the check for $1,500 which we sent to them for collection for you, as requested. They replied to us that the sheriff was in charge at present, and they could not do it. We herewith hand you the check for $1,500 which they remitted for your check, and we think that you had better take it, as it is the evidence of your claim against the bank, and go to Sheridan, and see what you can do in the matter of getting your money." Plaintiff had $1,717.71 on deposit with the banking company at the date of his check. The company closed its doors January 24. It had cash on hand, January 20, $2,726.25; January 21, $2,891.50; January 23, $2,973.71; January 24, $2,265.42. On February 3 plaintiff assigned his said deposit to Paul Fundinan for the purpose of collection, who thereupon sued the company, attached its property, and subsequently procured judgment; but, owing to prior attachments, the first of which was issued January 20, was unable to secure anything thereon. At the time the defendant forwarded the check to the banking company, it was in good standing, and had theretofore paid all demands promptly. The defendants had no correspondent at Sheridan, but a reliable express agency and another bank were located there, the latter of which had been doing business but a short time, and defendants did not appear to have had any knowledge of its existence. The defense is set up that the check in question was a plain, ordinary one, without indorsements; that defendants undertook and agreed to collect the same in accordance with the custom and ordinary method by which such collections were made by banks; that there was no agreement by which they were to receive compensation for their services; that, in attempting to collect said check, they pursued the general and universal custom obtaining among banks in Portland and elsewhere, and that by reason thereof they were not chargeable with negligence. As a second defense, it is alleged that plaintiff ratified defendants' said acts by accepting the draft remitted to them by the banking company, and retaining the same for more than a year without making any claim for negligence against the defendants. Trial was had before the court, and, judgment being for defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. Williams, Wood, & Linthicum for respondents.

Wolverton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented is whether the defendants were guilty of negligence in forwarding plaintiff's check direct to the bank upon which it was drawn, and in retaining the evidence of indebtedness until it had closed its doors, and its property had been seized on attachment. The instrument was a plain, ordinary check, unindorsed, save as it may have been indorsed by the defendants prior to forwarding the same for collection and return. The engagement of the defendants was to collect and issue a certificate of deposit for the proceeds drawing interest. There is some controversy as to whether the defendants were to receive any compensation for their services; but the very terms in pursuance of which they undertook the collection would indicate that they were to receive a sufficient consideration to make them liable for neglect of the duty enjoined upon them. They were to have the use of the money when collected, upon which they intended to pay the plaintiff interest; and this, we are impelled to believe, would be sufficient within itself. Generally speaking, it can make no difference that a bank makes no direct charge for its services in collecting, for the benefits which it ordinarily and usually derives from the use of the funds while in its custody, and the advantages which may arise from business associations, are held and deemed to be adequate consideration for the undertaking, and quite sufficient upon which to predicate the liability incident thereto. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Goodman, 109 Pa. 422, 58 Am. Rep. 723; Bailie v. Augusta Sav. Bank, 95 Ga. 277; Titus v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank, 35 N. J. L. 588. In the ordinary transaction, where a check is given and received in payment of a demand, the discharge of the demand is conditional upon the honor and payment of the check when presented in due course of established business usages, sanctioned by law; but failure to present it to the drawee for payment within the proper time, depending upon the proximity of the payee and the drawee to each other, and to notify the drawer of nonpayment, will discharge the drawer's obligation to the extent of his loss by reason of such failure of demand and notice. Gregg v. George, 16 Kan. 546. It is said: "A check differs from a bill of exchange in several particulars. It has no days of grace, and requires no acceptance distinct from prompt payment. The drawer of the check is not a surety, but the principal debtor, as much as the maker of a promissory note. It is an absolute appropriation of so much money in the hands of the banker to the holder of the check, and there it ought to remain until called for, and the drawer has no reason to complain of delay, unless upon the intermediate failure of his banker. By unreasonable delay in such a case the holder takes the risk of the failure of the person or bank on which the check is drawn." 3 Kent, Com. *104, note 2. The rule governing the time in which the holder is required to present a check in order to relieve himself from the risk of loss by failure of the drawee may be stated as follows: If the payee receives the check in the same place where the bank upon which it is drawn is located, he may present it for payment at any time before the close of banking hours of the next secular day, and thereby maintain recourse against the drawer. If, in the meantime, the bank fails, the loss will be the drawer's. The term "secular day" is used to exclude Sunday, so that, if the check be received on Saturday, the payee would have all day on the Monday following in which to make the presentment. But, if the payee receives the check in a place distant from where the drawee bank is situated, it will be sufficient for him to forward it by post, on the next secular day after it is received, to some person at the latter place, who is required to present it for payment on or before the next day after it reaches him in due course of mail. These periods, depending upon the location of the respective participants, which are declared requisites for the convenient presentment of a check, are deemed to have been contemplated by the drawer, and he remains absolutely liable, although the bank might fail pending their duration. 2 Dan. Neg.

Inst. §§ 1590, 1592; Farwell v. Curtis, 7 Biss. 160. The allowance of a day, however, in which to present the check, does not extend to an agent who receives one for the debt of his principal. Such a check must be presented with due and proper diligence; otherwise, it is at the peril of the party retaining it and postponing presentment as between him and the person in whose interest he is acting. Smith v. Miller, 43 N. Y. 171, 3 Am. Rep. 690; Anderson v. Gill, 7 Md. 312, 25 L. R. A. 200. The rules in respect to giving notice of the dishonor of a check are the same as where a bill of exchange or promissory note is involved. If anything, however, by reason of the intention of the parties to the instrument that the payment should be immediate, and of the fact that it is drawn against a deposit, they are to be more strictly construed and enforced in the case of a check than of other commercial paper. Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 442.

The parties agree that at the time the transactions which form the basis of the present controversy took place there existed and still exists, among the banks in Portland and elsewhere, a general and well-established custom to the effect that when a bank or banker receives for collection an ordinary check against an account with a bank or banker situated and doing business at a place distant from where the collecting bank is located, and such collecting bank has no agent or correspondent at the place of the drawee bank, for the collecting bank to forward the check by mail directly to the drawee bank for collection and returns; and that it is also a general and well-established custom among such banks that when a bank or banker receives, from a bank or person at a distance, for collection and return, an ordinary check, drawn upon a bank situated at the same place as the receiving bank, for the receiving bank not to remit cash to the bank or person from whom such check was received, but to remit the check or draft, either of the receiving or drawee bank, drawn upon the correspondent of such receiving or drawee bank at the place from which the original check was forwarded, payable to the order of the bank or person from whom the check was received. It is contended by the respondents that these customs are to be considered the law of the case, and are controlling for the government of the parties; and that, measured thereby, the defendants are not chargeable with negligence for pursuing the course adopted in endeavoring to make the collection. Upon the other hand, it is maintained that the custom of sending the check direct to the drawee bank for collection and return is unreasonable, and therefore that it does not and cannot obtain the sanction of law, and that such an act is negligence per se, which will, in case loss should occur by reason thereof, render the collecting bank liable therefor. The reason assigned is that the collecting bank thereby makes the drawee bank its agent for presentment, demand, protest, and giving notice of nonpayment to the indorsers, if any, and the drawer; and that the duties thus devolving upon such an agent are inconsistent and incapable of being performed by the drawee of the check, as it is said he cannot present a demand to himself, or demand payment of himself, much less protest his own paper, and give notice to the proper parties that he has refused payment. There exist two different theories among the courts of this country touching the responsibility of banks undertaking collections on commercial paper at a distance. One line of authorities holds to the rule that the forwarding bank is liable only for the selection of a suitable local agent with whom to intrust the collection, and that the agent so selected becomes the agent of the owner of the paper; while, on the other hand, it is held that the forwarding bank makes the local agent its own sub-agent, and is liable for any neglect on the part of such subagent. But it is argued that in either event the defendants are liable, as, under the latter rule, they became absolutely responsible for the conduct of the Sheridan Bank, while, under the former, it was negligence per se to have selected the Sheridan Bank as agent for the purpose of consummating the collection. It does not appear to us, however, to be necessary to the determination of the present controversy that either rule should be adopted or applied. The check in question was drawn payable to the defendants, and was undorsed by anyone, so that there were no indorsers or third parties in the transaction to be subverted, and protest and notice thereof were unnecessary, and not required. The defendants, therefore, assumed the simple duty of presenting the check for payment, under the rules of law obtaining, and, if not paid, or payment was refused, of notifying the drawer, so that he might not suffer loss by reason of the failure of the drawee bank.

In Prideaux v. Oridle, L. R. 4 Q. B. 455, it is said: "A presentment through the postoffice is a reasonable mode of presentment; it is a very common mode, and having regard to the commercial business of this country, it may be said to be a proper mode of presentment. If the drawee dishonors the check, and the holder sends a notice of dishonor to the person from whom he received the check on the day following that on which the check was dishonored, each previous transferrer has one day in which to give notice of dishonor." In Bailoy v. Bodenham, 16 C. B. N. S. 288, Erle, Ch. J., was inclined to think that a check sent through the post to the drawee was a good presentment, and he says: "But, unless the money was remitted by return of post the absence of an answer should have been considered as a dishonor, and notice of such dishonor should have been given promptly." In Heywood v. Pickering, L. R. 9 Q. B. 428, where the check was sent to the drawees direct, with demand for payment, Blackburn, J., thought it to be a good presentment for payment, and that the refusal to remit constituted an actual dishonor of the check. Quain, J., in the same case, says: "There is ample evidence that, according to the custom of bankers, when a foreign check is paid to a banker by a customer, that is the usual mode of transmitting checks. Is that a good presentment? In Bailey v. Bodenham, Erle, Ch. J., and Byles, J., thought that sending a check by post to a banker might be a good presentment of a check; and in Prideaux v. Criddle, Lush, J., was of opinion that a presentment through the postoffice was a reasonable mode of presentment. Therefore we have it that, in the present case, there was a due presentment of the check according to these authorities." As supporting this position, see also 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1559. These are English cases, it is true, but a like manner of presentment seems to have received recognition in this country. In the case of Indig v. National City Bank, 80 N. Y. 100, a note, undorsed, payable at the Bank of Lowville, was placed in the hands of defendant for collection, who, instead of sending it to an agent or correspondent at Lowville for presentment, sent it by mail directly to the Lowville Bank. It was remarked that such a method appeared to be the ordinary one for the transaction of such business, and the defendant was bound only to adopt the ordinary mode, and that the practice was sanctioned by the English cases. It was there contended that by sending the note direct to the Lowville Bank the collecting bank thereby constituted the Lowville Bank its agent; but it was held that, in so far as it related to the presentment of the note at the bank, and the duties of the bank in respect to it, it was equivalent to a check drawn by the maker upon the bank where the note was payable. As the case bears some analogy to the one at bar, we may be pardoned if we quote somewhat at length from the opinion of Rapallo, J. He says: "The bank owed a duty to its customer to pay it on presentation, if in funds. The defendant used the United States mail to make the presentment, and by this means caused it to be presented to the bank for payment on the day when due. It did not deposit it there for collection. If there had been indorsers, it might be argued that the defendant constituted the Bank of Lowville its agent to notify the indorsers of nonpayment; but even this is very questionable, for it was held in a similar case that, if the proceeds were not remitted, the paper should be deemed dishonored, and notice of nonpayment should be given by the bank which had sent it. Bailey v. Bodenham, 16 C. B. N. S. 288. No such question arises, however, in the present case, for there were no indorsers. The defendant, by sending the note to the Bank of Lowville, requested it to pay it, not to receive the proceeds. The object of sending was to extract money from the bank, as agent of the maker of the note, not to put money in the bank as agent of the defendant, or to the credit of the defendant. There is nothing in the nature of the transaction which should render the defendant guarantor of the solvency of the Bank of Lowville. . . . The bank on which the note is drawn has nothing to do but to pay the note if in funds, and, if not, to refuse to pay. If it pays, it does so on behalf of the maker, and no relation is created between it and one who presents it by mail, different from 44 L. R. A.

that which would exist if presented through any other agency, unless accompanied by a request to do some further act in behalf of the sender beyond complying with its duty to its own customer." And in Briggs v. Central Nat. Bank, 89 N. Y. 182, 42 Am. Rep. 283, the same learned judge, in explanation of the opinion rendered in the Indig Case, says: "The point of the decision is that the mere act of presenting the paper for payment by mail, instead of employing a messenger to present it, does not constitute the drawee agent of the sender to receive or hold the proceeds." To the same effect, see also People v. Merchants' & M. Bank, 78 N. Y. 269, 34 Am. Rep. 532. It will be noted that the presentment in the case of Heywood v. Pickering was in accordance with the custom then prevailing, and the one in the Indig Case was in pursuance of the ordinary method; and the custom in the one case and the method in the other were very similar to the one which it is agreed by the parties exists among the banks of Portland and elsewhere, and they seem to have been considered as controlling, and as legalizing the presentment in the respective manners there adopted. Mr. Tiedeman, in his work on Commercial Paper (§ 444), says: "A custom has grown up of late to send the check direct to the bank on which it is drawn; in other words, to make presentment by mail. The sufficiency of this method of presentment has been doubted, but it seems that this method is more or less commonly adopted, and the weight of authority is in favor of its sufficiency."

In the light of these authorities, we are constrained to hold that the transmission of the check in question by the defendants direct to the Sheridan Bank, through the post, for collection and return, operated as a good presentment for payment. A custom which obtains so generally and universally among men of the highest order of business sagacity appeals strongly to the understanding for recognition, and, unless demonstrated to be clearly and palpably unreasonable and unjust, it ought to be adopted as the law of the case. It is true, the admittedly prevailing custom or usage exists and applies as well to certified checks, certificates of deposit, and notes payable at the banks; but we are here dealing with a simple, undorsed check, and are only called upon at this time to sanction the custom or usage in so far as it may be potent as affecting the present exigencies. However, there is authority for the sanction of it to the full extent prevailing, as denoted by the agreement of the parties here. Farmers' Bank & T. Co. v. Newland, 97 Ky. 464; Jefferson County Sav. Bank v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 98 Tenn. 337. Usages are presumed to be reasonable, and in considering them the courts do not so much determine whether they are supported by satisfactory grounds as whether they are necessarily unreasonable. The party attacking the usage or custom has, therefore, the burden of the controversy, as the question to be decided in a particular case is not whether the usage is reasonable, but whether it is unreasonable. 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 766.

Cases are cited and relied upon by the appellant, wherein it is held to constitute an act of negligence and even negligence per se, for the collecting bank to send paper direct to the drawee bank, located at a distant place, for collection and return. The most conspicuous of these are: Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Goodman, 109 Pa. 422, 58 Am. Rep. 728; German Nat. Bank v. Burns, 12 Colo. 539; Anderson v. Rodgers, 53 Kan. 542, 27 L. R. A. 248; Drovers' Nat. Bank v. Anglo-American Pkg. & P. Co. 117 Ill. 100, 57 Am. Rep. 855; Farwell v. Curtis, 7 Biss. 160; Whitney v. Esson, 99 Mass. 308, 96 Am. Dec. 762; First Nat. Bank v. City Nat. Bank, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 318; First Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 16 U. S. App. 1, 56 Fed. Rep. 967, 6 C. C. A. 183; Baillie v. Augusta Sav. Bank, 95 Ga. 277. But in no one of these cases was there a general and universal custom relied upon to support the act of the collecting bank as there is here. The case of Whitney v. Esson, 99 Mass. 308, comes the nearest. The paper involved was a draft, and it is there said: "It is not a reasonable usage that one who collects a draft for an absent party should be allowed to give it up to the drawee, and sacrifice the claim which the owner may have on prior parties, upon the mere receipt of a check, which may turn out to be worthless." But this must be read in connection with the agreement of the parties in that case, which was that it was a common practice for holders of drafts or checks to accept the check of the drawee in exchange for the draft, but it was not called for to be a generally established usage. In Farwell v. Curtis, 7 Biss. 160, it was said the practice of sending checks by mail to the drawee was not usual, thereby indicating that no such custom or usage was there established or relied upon. In Drovers' Nat. Bank v. Anglo-American Pkg. & P. Co. 117 Ill. 100, 57 Am. Rep. 855, a custom was sought to be established, but it was not broad enough, as remarked by the court, to include the certified check which formed the basis of the action. And in First Nat. Bank v. City Nat. Bank, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 318, the statement of the case shows it did not appear that the owners of the paper, by consent or usage, authorized the forwarding of their draft direct to the drawee. These cases involve, indiscriminately, ordinary checks, certificates of deposit, certified checks, and drafts. Upon principle it would seem that the usage is not an unreasonable one, in so far, at least, as it may apply to the collection of a plain, undorsed check. If payment of such check is refused, the payee may sue the drawer for breach of contract; but the drawer only can sue the drawee, and this upon the implied contract to pay upon demand. The bank of deposit has but a simple duty to perform when the paper is presented for payment only, and that is to honor it by compliance with the demand; so that the manner of presentment and demand for payment, whether over the counter or through the post, cannot affect the discharge of such duty. In no sense can it become the agent of the party presenting it, or of the drawer, by acting in the discharge of its duty in honoring it, and making payment. Where a party employs a bank to make a collection at a place distant from where the bank is located, and nothing is said touching the specific manner of making the same, it must be presumed it was intended by the customer of the bank that the collection would be made in the usual and ordinary manner, and in accordance with the general usage and custom prevailing among banks. If the collection is made in accordance therewith the bank has performed its undertaking. Farmers' Bank & T. Co. v. Newland, 97 Ky. 464; Jefferson County Sav. Bank v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 98 Tenn. 337.

Now, to recur to the facts; The plaintiff had on deposit with the Sheridan Bank $1,717.71. Of this fund he proposed sending $1,500 to the defendants, in Portland, for the purpose of making a time deposit with them, drawing interest. He informed the Sheridan Bank of his intention to draw upon it for that amount, and, as a means of having the money transmitted to Portland, he drew his check in favor of the defendants. They, in pursuance of the custom, sent it by mail to the Sheridan Bank for collection and return. This must be considered a demand upon that bank for payment, and it had but a simple duty to perform, which was to pay; and this it should have done, not as the act of either the defendants or the plaintiff, but for itself; and therefore it could not have been the agent of either in the performance of such duty. The failure to pay upon presentment and demand was a refusal to pay, and a dishonor of the check, and the defendants, not having received payment thereof by return mail (having regard for the business hours of the banking company and the arrival and departure of the mails), should have so treated it, and notified the plaintiff thereof by the following mail, or, at least, by the mail of the following day. It was the duty of the defendants, they not being in a condition to sue the drawee, to notify the plaintiff at once of the dishonor of his paper, so that he could have brought an action against it, if he so desired, for the recovery of his deposit. But the case was not presented upon the theory that the loss to plaintiff was caused by the negligence of defendants in failing to notify him of the dishonor of his paper. By this, however, we do not intimate that the facts as disclosed by the record would support such theory.

The specific charges of negligence are that defendants sent the check direct to the drawee bank for collection, and retained the evidence of indebtedness until after the bank had closed. Upon the first ground we have seen that the act of sending the check direct to the drawee for collection was not negligence, under the usage and custom prevailing, and in the light of defendants' undertaking; and, upon the second ground, it is plain that plaintiff could not have been injured by the retention of the check, as he was enabled to and did sue without it. In this view the question of ratification becomes unimportant. The findings of fact are full upon all the issues made, and amply support the conclusions of law.

The judgment will therefore be affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

John KEYES

v.

Xavier B. KONKEL et al., Plffs. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

An action of replevin will not lie for a corpse under statutes requiring an affidavit in replevin to state the unlawful taking or detention of "personal goods and chattels," and providing that a judgment for defendant shall be for a return of the property or for its value.

(March 23, 1899.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Saginaw County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the body of plaintiff's deceased brother from possession of defendants to whom it had been delivered as undertakers by the authorities of the hospital at which deceased died. Action dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James H. Davitt, for plaintiff in error:

Replevin is a statutory remedy in this state.

Would it not be absurd to swear appraisers to fix a money value upon a human corpse?

It is the right of burial which the law protects, and this it protects, not because the corpse is a chattel, but because the relatives have an interest in its decent protection and proper interment.

There can be no property in a human corpse.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of replevin to recover the dead body of plaintiff's brother. The deceased died at a hospital, and defendants, who are undertakers, took charge of the corpse by request of the hospital authorities. The plaintiff, after the defendants had performed some services in fitting the body for burial, demanded possession of the body, and defendants refused to deliver the body up unless paid for their services. Thereupon plaintiff instituted this suit.

The question presented is whether replevin will lie in this state for a human corpse. The question is happily more novel than difficult. The statute (How. Anno. Stat. § 6856) provides for the proceeding of replevin in the justice court, and requires an affidavit by the plaintiff setting forth that his "personal goods and chattels" have been unlawfully taken or are unlawfully detained. The replevin statutes (§§ 8346, 8347) provide for a judgment for defendant, when the plaintiff fails in his case, for a return of the property or for its value. It is apparent that no return of the property can be ordered in case of the replevin of a dead body, and it is equally true that its value in money can neither be appraised nor ascertained by a jury. It was formerly held in England that there can be no property in a human body. Williams v. Williams, L. R. 20 Ch. Div. 659, also reported in 21 Am. L.

Reg. N. S. 508; Guthrie v. Weaver, 1 Mo. App. 141; Meagher v. Driscoll, 99 Mass. 284, 96 Am. Dec. 759; Pierce v. Proprietors of Swan Point Cemetery, 10 R. I. 227, 14 Am. Rep. 667; Weld v. Walker, 130 Mass. 422, 39 Am. Rep. 465. In certain modern American cases, a dead body has been said to be a quasi property, and the right to control and bury it, and to recover against one who mutilates the corpse, has been maintained. Pierce v. Proprietors of Swan Point Cemetery, 10 R. I. 227, 14 Am. Rep. 667; Weld v. Walker, 130 Mass. 422, 39 Am. Rep. 465; Burney v. Children's Hospital, 169 Mass. 57, 38 L. R. A. 413; Larson v. Chase, 47 Minn. 307, 14 L. R. A. 85; Foley v. Phelps, 1 App. Div. 551. Recovery for the refusal of the right to bury or for mutilation of the body is rather based upon an infringement of a right than upon the notion that the property of plaintiff has been interfered with. The recovery in such cases is not for the damage to the corpse as property, but damage to the next of kin by infringement of his right to have the body delivered to him for burial without mutilation. In numerous cases equity has taken jurisdiction to prevent interference with the control of the dead body by persons entitled to control it. See Weld v. Walker, 130 Mass. 422, 39 Am. Rep. 465; Pierce v. Proprietors of Swan Point Cemetery, 10 R. I. 227, 14 Am. Rep. 667. And in Reg. v. Fox, 2 Q. B. 246, the remedy by mandamus to a jailer was granted. But on every consideration we are of the opinion that the replevin cannot be maintained. It is not contended that the defendants are entitled to maintain a lien. It is obvious that return cannot be adjudged.

The only proper judgment is one dismissing the proceeding, with costs of all the courts to the defendants. It is so ordered.

The other Justices concur.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL BANK,
Respt.,
v.

E. H. GAGNON, Appt.

(19 Mont. 402.)

1. The pledgee of a promissory note as collateral security can enforce it against the maker only to the extent of his claim against the pledgeor,—at least where the maker has a valid defense against the enforcement of the note by the pledgeor.

2. The payee of a note should be made a party to a suit against the maker by one to whom it was pledged as collateral security for a debt less than its value, where the maker has a defense against the enforcement of the note by the payee.

(April 26, 1897.)

NOTE.—Extent of recovery by pledgee on negotiable paper which pledgeor could not collect.

- I. The general rule.
- II. Limitation to unpaid advances made without notice.
- III. Application to accommodation paper.
- IV. Matters of procedure.

I. The general rule.

The general, if not the universal, rule, varied only by the conflict of authority hereinafter noted on the question whether a pledgee or 44 L. R. A.

holder as collateral security for a precedent debt is to be regarded as a bona fide holder, is that laid down in Curtis v. Mohr, 18 Wis. 616, to the effect that where money is advanced on the credit of the note used as collateral security the pledgee, if he is an innocent holder, may recover of the maker of the note to the amount for which the paper was pledged, though the maker has a defense as against the payee.

One holding a note as collateral security or as a pledge is the owner of the obligation for all practical purposes to the extent of his debt, especially where it is not shown that the debt

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Yellowstone County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of certain promissory notes. Reversed.

Mr. O. F. Goddard for appellant.

Mr. Gib S. Lane for respondent.

Statement by Hunt, J.:

The plaintiff and respondent bank sued the defendant and appellant to recover upon three promissory notes made by the defendant. One of the notes was dated April 25, 1895, for the sum of $750. Another note was dated October 9, 1894, was due one year after date, and made to the order of J. J. Nickey, for $2,392.75. The complaint alleged that Nickey, the payee named in the note, before maturity, duly indorsed, assigned, and delivered the said note to the plaintiff who was at the time of the commencement of this suit the holder and owner thereof. The third note was a joint and several one for $500, made by F. H. Nickey and the defendant. The plaintiff demanded judgment against the defendant for the amount of the three promissory notes. The defendant filed a special and general demurrer, which was overruled. The defendant then answered, admitting the execution of the note for $2,392.75, and admitting its delivery to Nickey, as alleged in the complaint, but set up that the plaintiff was not the owner or holder thereof, except as set forth in the answer. It is then alleged: "That the said J. J. Nickey, as this defendant is informed and believes, at the time he delivered said note to the plaintiff, was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,200 with interest then accrued thereon which indebtedness was evidenced by a promissory note of the said Nickey, which the plaintiff held against said Nickey; and that to secure the payment of said promissory note of $1,200, held by the plaintiff against said Nickey, the said Nickey indorsed and delivered to and to be secured is less than the amount of the note. Gardner v. Maxwell, 27 La. Ann. 561.

And an innocent bona fide holder of promissory notes as collateral security for an indebtedness existing between the payee and indorsee is entitled to recover thereon at least to the extent of the debt for which they are held as collateral, without regard to any defenses that may exist between the original parties to the notes. Farmers' State Bank v. Blevins, 46 Kan. 536; Gammon v. Huse, 9 Ill. App. 557; St. Paul Nat. Bank v. Cannon, 46 Minn. 95; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How. 343, 15 L. ed. 934.

Thus pledgees of a negotiable note as security for a debt due them of a less amount than the face of the note, who took it without notice of the fact that it was without consideration as between the original parties, are bona fide holders for value, and are therefore entitled to recover thereon to the extent of their debt for which the note was pledged as security. Fisher v. Fisher, 98 Mass. 303; Exchange Bank v. Butner, 60 Ga. 654.

And a transfer of a promissory note by the maker thereof before due as collateral security for an extension of ten days from the time of payment of a protested draft for a less amount, in violation of an agreement between them and a surety thereon, does not invalidate the title of the pledgee where he acted in good faith and without notice of such agreement, and he may recover thereon as against the maker to the extent of the draft. First Nat. Bank v. Fowler, 36 Ohio St. 524, 38 Am. Rep. 610.

And where brokers are employed to sell a note, and instead of selling it they pledge it, together with a large number of other notes, for a loan to themselves, the pledgee accepting the same in ignorance of the circumstances under which it was held, becomes a good-faith holder to the extent of the money advanced by him on the faith of the note. Farwell v. Importers & T. Nat. Bank, 90 N. Y. 483.

So, where a note is given upon an express agreement between the parties that it should be negotiated and its proceeds applied for a particular purpose, and the payee before maturity of the note borrows money thereon using it as collateral security, the pledgee taking without notice of the agreement becomes a purchaser for value to the extent of the loan made by him, and cannot be enjoined from selling the note on the ground of the equities between the original parties. Bond v. Wiltse, 12 Wis. 612.

And one who takes the note of a third person as collateral security, not for a pre-existing debt, but for a debt created at the time, and on the faith thereof with no notice of equities, becomes a bona fide holder for value, and may recover the amount of his debt from the maker. Logan v. Smith, 62 Mo. 455; St. Paul Nat. Bank v. Cannon, 46 Minn. 95.

So, an indorsee of a note before maturity as collateral security for moneys advanced or agreed to be advanced occupies the position of a bona fide holder, and is entitled to the protection of a purchaser of commercial paper in the usual course of business to the extent of the moneys paid or advanced on the pledge, though the instrument was of no binding force as between the original parties. Gammon v. Huse, 9 Ill. App. 557.

And one who takes a note as security for an antecedent debt, which note was made without consideration and for the accommodation of the payee and delivered to him by the maker without any restriction as to its use, can recover of the maker thereon, at least to the amount of the debt it was transferred to secure, where in consideration thereof he surrendered to the payee other securities theretofore held for the same indebtedness. Robbins v. Richardson, 2 Bosw. 248.

And the holder of a note assigned before maturity as collateral to secure a pre-existing debt may recover from the maker the amount of such debt if it does not exceed the amount of the note, though the maker may have paid the note of the payee. Vanliew v. Second Nat. Bank, 21 Ill. App. 126.

If a promissory note before its maturity is pledged as collateral security for a particular debt, and such debt is afterwards paid, the holder of the collateral note has then no right to collect it if the person liable for its payment has already paid it to the pledgee who was the original payee; but so long as any portion of the debt secured by the collateral remains unpaid, the holder of the latter may collect the same, or at least enough thereof to satisfy whatever may remain due of the claim secured. Bank of the University v. Tuck, 96 Ga. 456.

So, a note given for the premium upon a policy of insurance issued in violation of a statute which expressly provides that the company making the insurance shall not recover any premium or assessment upon it, is invalid in the hands of the payee, and one who takes it as collateral security for a debt which had been paid pledged the said note of this defendant for the said sum of $2,392.75 to said plaintiff, as collateral security, and not otherwise; and that the same was taken by the plaintiff as collateral security for the said note of $1,200 of the said Nickey, and for no other purpose or use; and that, as this defendant is informed and believes, the said Nickey was not indebted to the plaintiff at the time of the commencement of this action in any other or greater sum than the said $1,200, with the accrued interest thereon, as evidenced by the said promissory note, for which the said note of this defendant to said Nickey was pledged as collateral security as aforesaid, or otherwise. Further answering the complaint, the defendant alleges that, at the same time said note was made and delivered by this defendant to said Nickey, the defendant and said Nickey were copartners in certain mining and other interests; and that said copartnership still exists; and that no settlement thereof has been made between the defendant and said Nickey; and that the defendant has a good and valid defense against said note of $2,392.75 to the extent of about $1,200; and that, therefore, this plaintiff is not entitled to recover from this defendant, on said alleged second cause of action, only the amount of said $1,200 note of said Nickey, with the interest accrued thereon." No replication was filed. The plaintiff bank moved for judgment on the pleadings for the amount claimed in the complaint, on the ground that the answer did not state a defense to any cause of action in the complaint. This motion was granted by the court, and the judgment entered in favor of plaintiff, and against the defendant, for $4,493.25, together with costs. The appeal of the defendant is from the judgment.

Hunt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In considering the question presented by this appeal, it must be remembered through-obtains no greater rights than the payee had. Roche v. Ladd, 1 Allen, 436.

And the fact that the maker of a note was paying usurious interest to the payee does not render title of the holder of the note as collateral security void, or destroy his right to collect the collateral to the extent of the principal and the legal interest of the principal debt. Partidge v. Williams Sons, 72 Ga. 807. And see Saylor v. Daniels, 37 Ill. 331, 87 Am. Dec. 250, infra, II.

And a note based upon a wager contract is not void, under Mo. Rev. Stat. §§ 5721-23, 5726, providing that all notes where the consideration is money or property won at any gaming or gambling device or by bets or wagers, shall be void, where the note is in the hands of a bona fide indorsee for value as collateral security, so as to prevent him from enforcing it to the extent of the amount of the debt due him. Crawford v. Spencer, 92 Mo. 498.

Nor will the fact that a note was transferred in violation of the Massachusetts statute prohibiting the disposal of collateral security before maturity of the debt secured without authority, defeat an action against the maker and indorser. Gardner v. Gager, 1 Allen, 502.

This note is confined to the question of the extent of the recovery of a pledgee on negotiable paper which the pledgee could not collect, and the general question of the right to recover at all is not intended to be treated. Decisions as to whether one who takes negotiable paper as collateral security for a pre-existing debt is a bona fide holder or not pertain to the right of recovery rather than the extent of the recovery, and have therefore been omitted. It is to be observed, however, that there is a conflict of authority on the question whether one who takes negotiable paper as collateral security for a pre-existing debt advancing no new consideration and surrendering no rights or securities, is a bona fide holder, the courts of a number of the states, headed perhaps by New York and Missouri, having taken the position that he is not, and under this doctrine it will be seen that if the security was taken for a pre-existing debt, and no new consideration was furnished or rights or securities surrendered, the doctrine set forth in this note would not apply as the pledgee would not be a bona fide holder and could not recover, either the unpaid amount advanced before notice, or anything at all.

II. Limitation to unpaid advances made without notice.

While in general the holder of a negotiable note as collateral may recover the entire amount thereof, holding the excess if it is greater than the debt secured for the use of the pledgee, where the maker of the instrument has a good defense against the pledgee, the pledgee, having no notice of such defense, can recover the amount of the principal debt only. Union Nat. Bank v. Roberts, 45 Wis. 373. And see YELLOWSTONE NAT. BANK V. GAGNON.

A party receiving negotiable paper as collateral security is entitled to be protected as a bona fide holder to the same extent as one who becomes the absolute owner, the only difference being that the holder as collateral security is restricted in his recovery to his advances if there are equities between the original parties. Haydon v. Nicoletti, 18 Nev. 290; St. Paul Nat. Bank v. Cannon, 46 Minn. 95; Gammon v. Huse, 9 Ill. App. 557.

The rule affording full protection to an innocent holder of negotiable paper for value before maturity is modified in its application to paper transferred as collateral security, and in such case, if as between the original parties there is a defense on the merits, the transferee is protected only to the extent of the amount of the debt secured. Gammon v. Huse, 9 Ill. App. 557.

And as against the maker of a note who has a valid equitable defense to it in the hands of the payee, if the latter pledges it as security for a debt, the pledgee can only be regarded as a bona fide holder to the extent of his interest at the time he acquires the pledge or receives notice of a defense to it. Second Nat. Bank v. Hemingray, 34 Ohio St. 381; Hatcher v. Independence Nat. Bank, 79 Ga. 547.

And a pledgee of a note as collateral security can recover no more against the maker who has a valid defense as against the payee than he has paid value for, unless he would be liable over for the difference between what he has thus paid and the original amount of the note. Bond v. Fitzpatrick, 8 Grav. 536.

The defense in an action by the holder of a note as collateral security against the maker thereof that the maker had a good defense against the payee and that the holder is therefore entitled to recover only the amount for which he held it as security, is allowed to pre-out that the single note over which this controversy arises—that is, the note for $2,392.75—was indorsed to the plaintiff by Nickey simply as collateral security for a debt of $1,200, due the bank by Nickey. It is upon this note that the plaintiff maintains a right to recover for the face thereof unconditionally and in all events, without reference to the debt of Nickey intended to be secured thereby. Much space in the brief and argument of the respondent's counsel is devoted to supporting the proposition that an indorsee of a negotiable promissory note, taking the note in good faith, as collateral security for an antecedent debt, and with no other consideration, is entitled to be regarded as a holder of such paper for value, and consequently unaffected by an equitable and valid defense of the maker against the payee. But we do not understand that the appellant disputes that general proposition of law. Ever since the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Brooklyn City & N. R.

Co. v. National Bank of the Republic, 102 U. S. 14, 26 L. ed. 61, reaffirming the doctrine established by that court in Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. 1, 10 L. ed. 865, and reviewing the English and American authorities at length, it may be affirmed as a result of the best cases that the transfer of negotiable paper before maturity as collateral for a pre-existing debt merely, without other circumstances, "if the paper be so indorsed that the holder becomes a party to the instrument, although the transfer is without express agreement by the creditor for indulgence," is within the usual course of commercial business, as much as would be its transfer in payment of such debt. "In either case," said Justice Harlan, "the bona fide holder is unaffected by equities or defenses between prior parties, of which he had no notice." Applying the principle just stated to the pleadings in the case before us, we find that the indorsement of the note by Nickey to the bank, as a collateral security for his own pre-existing event circuitry of action. Steere v. Benson, 2 Ill. App. 560.

And the recovery in an action by a holder of a note as collateral security for moneys advanced against the maker thereof who had a good defense as against the payee is limited to the amount of the indebtedness which the note is held to secure. Steere v. Benson, 2 Ill. App. 560; Brown v. Callaway, 41 Ark. 418; Hatcher v. Independence Nat. Bank, 79 Ga. 547; Maitland v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 40 Md. 540, 17 Am. Rep. 620; New England Trust Co. v. New York Belting & Pkg. Co. 166 Mass. 42; St. Paul Nat. Bank v. Cannon, 46 Minn. 95; Grant v. Kidwell, 30 Mo. 455; Barmby v. Wolfe, 44 Neb. 77; Haas v. Bank of Commerce, 41 Neb. 754; Kelly v. Ferguson, 46 How. Pr. 411; Farmers' State Bank v. Blevins, 46 Kan. 536.

Thus, one who holds promissory notes assigned to him as collateral security is a holder for a valuable consideration, but can recover thereon against the maker no more than the debt actually due him, where payment had previously been made to the payee. Valette v. Mason, 1 Ind. 289; Mayo v. Moore, 28 Ill. 428.

And a plea by the defendant in an action upon a note by a holder thereof as collateral security against the maker thereof, alleging that the plaintiff took the note sued on as collateral security for an indebtedness of the payee, all of which had been paid off except a stated amount, should not be stricken out, where there are other allegations setting up a good defense as against the original payee. Hatcher v. Independence Nat. Bank, 79 Ga. 547.

And proof that an assignor of a note as collateral security, while the holder thereof, had received moneys applicable to its payment, and that after he assigned the note he declared that the note was fully paid, is strong, if not conclusive, evidence against him in an action by the pledgee against the maker, that he had no longer any interest in the note, and could claim no surplus of the pledgee so as to warrant the pledgee in recovering a greater amount than his own debt. Bond v. Fitzpatrick, 8 Gray, 536.

So, a creditor to whom a note tainted with usury is assigned by the payee as collateral security for a pre-existing debt is a holder for a valuable consideration, and may recover thereon, but only to the extent of the debt due him; as to the residue the same defense may be made as though the note had not been assigned. Saylor v. Daniels, 87 Am. Dec. 250, 37 Ill. 331.

And a note given under threats of prosecution in settlement of a pretended claim for damages when no real claim existed, and which was in reality without any consideration whatever to support it, is invalid as between the parties thereto, and where afterwards and before maturity it is pledged as security for a debt of the pledgee, the recovery thereon will be limited to the amount of the indebtedness of the innocent pledgee with interest. Bell v. Bean, 75 Cal. 86.

So, one who takes a note as collateral security for a larger indebtedness with knowledge that the pledgee had received it from the maker with authority to use it as collateral for a specified indebtedness, but that he exceeded his authority by the pledge, can only recover thereon to the extent that the pledgee was authorized to pledge the note. Maitland v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 40 Md. 540, 17 Am. Rep. 620.

And while the fact that a note was indorsed for the accommodation of the maker and entrusted to him for a special purpose, and that in violation of that trust it was negotiated to another who gave no value and knew of its fraudulent use, is no defense in an action thereon by one to whom it was afterwards indorsed for value as collateral security, such indorsee can only recover thereon the amount for which he took the note as collateral security. Chicopee Bank v. Chapin, 8 Met. 40.

So, the plaintiff in an action on a negotiable note which he holds by assignment before due as collateral security for a loan made by him to an insolvent payee against whom the maker holds an equitable set-off to the note will be limited in his recovery against the maker to the amount of the debt which the note secures. Second Nat. Bank v. Hemingray, 34 Ohio St. 381.

And one to whom notes on which the payee could maintain no action are indorsed without notice in trust as collateral security for the payment of certain debts of the payee can recover in a suit upon the notes only the amount actually due from the payee to such creditors after deducting any debts due from them to him. Williams v. Cheney, 3 Gray, 215.

And a bank taking a note from another bank as collateral security for an indebtedness due it is only entitled to recover of the maker of the note thereon to the extent of the unpaid portion of the indebtedness for which the note was pledged, where the payee bank obtained it from the maker by fraud. Haas v. Bank of Commerce, 41 Neb. 764.

debt, was upon a sufficiently valuable consideration for the transfer to bring the case within the rule which protects the holder of negotiable paper, and entitles the bank to the full benefit of the security. And we now are brought to the real question raised by the appellant, but which has to some extent been lost sight of by the respondent.

The facts pleaded show that Nickey only owed the bank $1,200 and interest at the time he transferred the Gagnon note for $2,392.75 to it as collateral security, and that the defendant, who was the original maker of the note, has an equitable claim against Nickey, growing out of some partnership relations that existed between them. The question, therefore, is not whether the bank is a bona fide holder at all, but to what extent is it to be regarded as a bona fide holder for value, and how much may it recover upon such note delivered to it as collateral security only? The degree of protection to which the bank is justly entitled is, in our opinion, controlled by the amount of the pre-existing debt of the payee of the note to the bank, or the extent of the obligation to secure which the note was passed as collateral. Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 832a, expresses the rule in this language: "When it appears that the bill or note was acquired by the holder as collateral security for a debt, and he is deemed entitled to recover upon it, he is still limited to the amount of the debt which it secures, if there be a valid defense against his transfer being regarded as, at all events, a bona fide holder, and entitled to stand upon a better footing only pro tanto. Thus, such a holder could recover against an accommodation party no more than the consideration actually advanced; but, in the absence of proof, he will be deemed to have advanced the full amount of the paper." The pledges of the note is fully protected against loss by its right to recover the full amount of the debt due to it by the payee. Its rights are

And a bank which in good faith and without notice takes from a broker as collateral security for his indebtedness an unmatured promissory note delivered to him by the maker, when it holds other notes pledged to it by the broker, and afterwards receives from a payment of most of such notes a sum more than sufficient to pay the broker's debt to the bank, cannot maintain an action against the maker for the benefit of the makers of the other notes, where they had not requested or consented to the bringing of such action, the remedy being by a bill in equity for contribution. New England Trust Co. v. New York Belting & Pkg. Co. 166 Mass. 42.

So, a bank taking a note from the payee as collateral security for an indebtedness without knowledge of any defense thereto, but to which the makers had a good and valid defense as against the payee, is entitled to recover thereon the amount of the balance for which the note was delivered as security, but the makers of the note are entitled to the balance of the amount due thereon. Bank of Clafin v. Rowlinson, 2 Kan. App. 82.

And a note given for an indebtedness which the payee had expressly covenanted to assume and to protect the maker against can be recovered upon by one who takes it from the payee before maturity as collateral for money advanced and agreed to be advanced only to the extent of the moneys paid or advanced thereon. Gammon v. Huse, 9 Ill. App. 557.

And while one to whom a promissory note has been transferred before due as collateral security for indorsements to be made by him, which are afterwards made, and who takes it without notice of a defense existing against it in the hands of the person from whom he received it, is entitled to be treated as a bona fide holder in the commercial sense, where such a defense exists, he can recover only what is due on the indorsements against which it was designed to secure him. Williams v. Smith, 2 Hill, 301.

And a pledgee of a note which was community property of a husband and wife, which was transferred by the husband to the wife for a purpose not authorized by law and pledged by the wife for an amount less than half of that for which the note was given, cannot deprive the maker of all equitable defenses against the payee who would remain a part owner thereof. Lacroix v. Derbigny, 18 La. Ann. 27.

One who takes a negotiable note by indorsement before maturity as collateral security in consideration of a new credit given takes it free from all equitable defenses between the original parties, and a payment afterwards made by the maker to the payee is no defense to a suit by the pledgee; he is entitled nevertheless to recover to the extent of the balance due him with interest, but no more, the payments made to the payee who would be entitled to the surplus being good as against him. Sawyer v. Moran, 8 Tenn. Ch. 35.

So, evidence tending to show that the maker of a note is not liable thereon to the payee is admissible in an action brought by a holder thereof as collateral security against the maker, as such holder is not protected except as to the amount of the debt secured. Gammon v. Huse, 9 Ill. App. 557; Steele v. Benson, 2 Ill. App. 560.

And evidence that the assignor of a note as collateral security while holding it received money towards its payment and after assigning it declared that it was paid is competent in an action by the pledgee against the maker to prevent a recovery of a greater amount than the pledgee's own debt. Bond v. Fitzpatrick, 8 Gray, 536, 4 Gray, 89.

And the true consideration, and the identity, and nature, and amount of a promissory note given as collateral security, are admissible in evidence in an action thereon, where the note contains on its face a memorandum that it is to be used as collateral security to other debts, and it is competent in an action thereon to show the true consideration, and the identity, nature, and amount of the demand to which it is collateral. Garton v. Union City Nat. Bank, 34 Mich. 279.

So, a pledgee of a note taken before due as collateral security for a loan made by him to the insolvent payees against whom the maker holds an equitable set-off to the note cannot recover in addition to the amount of the debt secured by the note, the attorney's fees for prosecuting the action. Second Nat. Bank v. Hemingray, 84 Ohio St. 381.

And one who takes a note as collateral security, and has advanced only a part of the agreed amount thereon when he learns of its invalidity as between the original parties, cannot recover for any further payments or advances made after acquiring such knowledge. New England Trust Co. v. New York Belting & Pkg. Co. 166 Mass. 42.

And where a note is indorsed by the payee preserved, which is all it may reasonably ask.

This general principle was recognized over fifty years ago in the case of Williams v. Smith, 2 Hill, 301, where the court, after declaring that a person to whom a promissory note was transferred before due as collateral security for indorsements to be made to him, which were afterwards made, and who took the note without notice of a defense existing against it in the hands of the person from whom he received it, was entitled to be treated as a bona fide holder, decided, however, that, inasmuch as the person who took the note received it as collateral security, he could recover no more than the amount remaining due on the principal demand. This doctrine was followed in the early case of Valette v. Mason, Smith (Ind.) 89. That was an action in assumpsit by an assignee against the makers of a promissory note. The defendants pleaded that the note was assigned to the plaintiff only as collateral security for certain money lent and advanced to the payee. It was decided, as in the case of Williams v. Smith, cited above, that the holder of commercial paper assigned as collateral security is entitled to be regarded as a holder for a valuable consideration, and is not bound by equities existing between the payee and the makers which would interfere with the collection of his debt, but that in a suit on such paper the holder is not entitled to recover more than the debt actually due to him, if any part of it has been previously paid, or if there is no good consideration as between the original parties. Chief Justice Shaw, in Stoddard v. Kimball, 6 Cush. 469, briefly discussed the question of what amount the holder of a promissory note, as indorsee, had a right to recover of the maker where the note was negotiated to the plaintiff as collateral security for a debt due to him. He was of the opinion that the plaintiff, having taken the note to secure a pre-existing debt of a less amount, was holder for value in his to another as security for advances, and the pledgee makes advances, some before and some after receiving notice that the maker of the note had an equitable set-off to it, it will stand as security for, and the pledgee can recover, only the advances made before the notice. Kerr v. Cowen, 17 N. C. (2 Dev. Eq.) 356.

So, one with whom bills of exchange accepted by a bankrupt are deposited as collateral security for a debt due him from the drawer of the bills may prove the whole amount of the bills against the bankrupt, but cannot receive more than is due. Ex parte Phillips, 1 Mont. D. & DeG. 232.

And a pledgee of bonds of a railroad company pledged by the company who still holds them, is entitled to recover of the company thereon no more than the amount secured by the pledge. Jesup v. City Bank, 14 Wis. 332.

And the fact that the declaration in an action by the holder of a note as collateral security against the maker claimed the whole of the note, does not prevent a recovery pro tanto for so much as the holder is entitled to receive, where the maker had a valid defense as against the payee. Vanliew v. Second Nat. Bank, 21 Ill. App. 126.

So, a sub-pledgee of commercial paper with knowledge that the party through whom he received it held it simply as a pledge can only recover, in an action against the maker thereof in which fraud and failure of consideration as between the original parties is claimed, the amount due from the pledgor to the original pledgee, even though the evidence establish authority on the part of such pledgee to indorse the notes in the corporate name of the pledgor. Security Bank v. Kingsland, 5 N. Dak. 283.

But one who purchases negotiable bonds from a bank to which they had been pledged as collateral security for a loan by paying the loan to the bank and applying the excess of the amount in satisfaction of a precedent debt due the purchaser from the pledgor before maturity can recover the full amount of the security against the maker, unless personally chargeable with fraud in the purchase though he may have paid less than their proper value whatever may have been their original infirmities. Cromwell v. Sac County, 96 U. S. 51, 24 L. ed. 681.

And an instruction in an action by the holder of a note which had been transferred to him by the pledgee thereof to find a verdict for the amount appearing to be due on the note, is not error where the execution and transfer of the note were admitted, and there was no evidence of notice on the part of the holder of any defense of the maker as against the payee or pledgee. Cook v. Norwood, 108 Ill. 558.

It is only where the plaintiff in an action on a note transferred as collateral security prevails merely because he is an innocent holder that he recovers simply the amount pledged, and where he recovers because a defense against the original payee is not established he recovers the full amount of the note. Barnby v. Wolfe, 44 Neb. 77; Haas v. Bank of Commerce, 41 Neb. 754.

And a bank taking a negotiable note as collateral security is not obliged to notify the maker of the assignment in order to protect itself from any payment or equities existing or subsequently arising in his favor against the payee, but if payments are made to the payees beyond the bank's loan they will be operative to prevent any recovery by the bank against the maker beyond the amount of such loan with interest. Haydon v. Nicoletti, 18 Nev. 290.

So, a pledgee of a promissory note who acquiesces in the prosecution of an action by the pledgor against the maker to recover on the note, and lends his aid by voluntarily allowing the pledgor to produce the note at the trial as evidence of his right to recover, will be concluded by the result of the action, so that if the defense of payment is successfully made the payee cannot subsequently recover against the maker in an action prosecuted by him. St. Paul Nat. Bank v. Cannon, 46 Minn. 95.

A pledgee of a note as collateral security is not bound to make inquiry as to the extent of authority of the pledgor to pledge, however, and mere negligence, however gross, not amounting to wilful or fraudulent blindness, will not reduce the amount of his recovery to the amount authorized, where the authority was to pledge for a specified indebtedness, and the pledgor exceeded his authority. Maitland v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 40 Md. 540, 17 Am. Rep. 620.

To justify the reduction of the recovery by a pledgee of a note as collateral security which was pledged to him for a larger amount than was authorized by the maker thereof to the amount authorized, the proof should be such as would justify the conclusion that the pledgee had actual knowledge of the limited authority given. Ibid.

And the question whether the pledgee of a note as collateral security had knowledge that own right only to the amount of the debt due him. In Youngs v. Lee, 18 Barb. 187, it was also decided that the bona fide purchaser and holder of a note was entitled to recover the amount paid for it, "with interest and no more." Colebrooke, Collateral Securities, § 92, cited several of the cases just referred to, and deduces the following text from them: "Where negotiable promissory notes, pledged as collateral security, are accommodation paper, without consideration, or subject to an equitable set-off, or, in cases of misappropriation as between the makers and payees and indorsers thereof, and the collateral securities are of greater amount than the loan represented by the principal evidence of indebtedness, the recovery of the pledgee against the makers upon an action thereon is limited to the amount of his advances. The pledgee in such cases of fraud is a holder for value of the collateral note, as against the makers of such paper, to the extent only of his interest at the time he acquires the title or has notice of the defenses to it." This doctrine is also followed in Mechanics' & T. Bank v. Barnett, 27 La. Ann. 177. In Fisher v. Fisher, 98 Mass. 303, the court affirmed the case of Stoddard v. Kimball, heretofore cited, and held that where the evidence established the fact that the plaintiffs received the note from the holder before its maturity without any knowledge of the circumstances under which the defendants had delivered it to the payee, or the purpose for which the latter delivered it to the holder, and where it was shown that it was held by the plaintiffs as collateral security for a valid debt due from the holder to them, plaintiffs, as bona fide holders for value and without notice, could recover "to the extent of their debt for which the note was pledged as collateral security. In Huff v. Wagner, 63 Barb. 215, the court sustained the principle that "a bona fide holder of commercial paper, to which, as between the maker and payee, there is a good defense, is entitled to be prothe pledgee was only authorized to pledge it for a smaller amount which would limit his recovery thereon to the amount authorized, is one of fact for the jury. Ibid.

So, a pledgee of a promissory note payable to a bank, which the payee agreed to use only for the purpose of showing its assets, but which was pledged, with a number of other notes, as collateral security, after which the bank failed, may sue the maker thereon notwithstanding the fact that a receiver of the bank had paid a part of its indebtedness to the pledgee, and the amount which would be recovered by the pledgee over and above the sum necessary to discharge the indebtedness due it would be held in trust for the receiver. Jackson v. Chemical Nat. Bank (Tex. Civ. App.) 46 S. W. 295.

III. Application to accommodation paper.

The rules above laid down have usually been applied to pledges of accommodation paper, though there seem to have been some exceptions.

Thus, where one man gives to another an accommodation note it will be good against the maker in the hands of a third person though passed to him as security for a pre-existing debt, and though it was procured in bad faith, the recovery being at least the amount he actually paid or pledged to the payee on the faith of the paper. Beckhaus v. Commercial Nat. Bank (Pa.) 12 Atl. 72.

Though accommodation paper pledged by the payee as collateral security cannot be enforced against the accommodation maker for any amount beyond that for which it was pledged. Mechanics' & T. Bank v. Livingston, 4 Misc. 257; Duncan v. Gilbert, 29 N. J. L. 521; Allaire v. Hartshorne, 21 N. J. L. 665, 47 Am. Dec. 175; Handy v. Sibley, 46 Ohio St. 9; Wifien v. Roberts, 1 Esp. 261.

In Allaire v. Hartshorne, 21 N. J. L. 665, 47 Am. Dec. 175, supra, Williams v. Smith, 2 Hill, 301, supra, II., was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the action was brought both against the makers and indorsers, while in this the payee is not a party to the suit, and it is objected that his rights as against the maker should not be concluded in a suit to which he was not a party.

So, the fact that a note was indorsed for the accommodation of the maker, and delivered to him for the sole purpose of taking up another note made by the same parties, also indorsed for accommodation, is not a defense in an action 44 L. R. A.

by one who took it for value and before maturity as collateral security for a pre-existing debt, but he can be considered as a holder for value and as entitled to recover only to the amount necessary to reimburse him for his advances on it. Stoddard v. Kimball, 4 Cush. 604, 6 Cush. 469.

And a bank taking an accommodation note as a pledge with knowledge that it was an accommodation note can recover thereon against the maker of the note no more than the amount for which the pledge was given, and it will not be deemed to cover over-drafts by the pledgee in the absence of an express agreement to that effect. Mechanics' & T. Bank v. Barnett, 27 La. Ann. 177.

And while a pledgee in good faith and for value of promissory notes transferred to him before maturity can prove them for their full amount against the assets in bankruptcy of the promisors, though the pledgee had only borrowed the name, in such case the pledgee proves for the whole amount but receives dividends only to the extent of the debts for which he holds the security. Ex parte Keity, 1 Low. Dec. 394.

And the same rule was applied to the holder of a bill of exchange accepted for the accommodation of the drawer pledged to him as security for a debt due him, less in amount than the bill, in Ex parte Newton, L. R. 16 Ch. Div. 330.

So, bankers taking a bill from the drawer for value which had been accepted for his accommodation of which the bank had knowledge, after which the drawer becomes bankrupt, cannot recover of the acceptor more than the amount of the balance as between them and the drawer at the time of the bankruptcy. Jones v. Hibbert, 2 Starkie, 351.

And an accommodation note executed for the purpose of being used by the payee as collateral security and indorsed by him for that purpose after maturity, which was afterwards sold by an indorsee to satisfy an unpaid balance of his debts, can be enforced by the purchaser only to the extent that the first indorser could have enforced it, the recovery being limited to the unpaid portion of the debt which it was executed to secure. First Nat. Bank v. Werst, 52 Iowa, 684.

And where a note is loaned by one person to another for his accommodation, and the latter pledges it as security for a smaller sum, and the pledgee obtains a judgment against the maker for the whole amount of the note, which he ted only to the extent of the value which he has paid." The court there further said: "The protection of the holder for value in such cases, as in other cases where the law protects bona fide purchasers against latent claims, is founded upon the idea of protecting such bona fide purchaser for value against any possible loss. And this is the precise reason why a bona fide holder of such paper, which has been transferred to him to secure an antecedent debt, cannot recover against the party who has been defrauded; namely, that he has lost nothing by his reliance upon the face of the paper." The supreme court of New Jersey, in Dnucon v. Gilbert, 29 N. J. L. 521, followed a like doctrine, and said: "It is certainly true that the holders of accommodation paper, assigned as collateral security, can recover against the accommodation maker and indorser no more than the consideration actually advanced."

In a very able review of the decisions upon the question of whether a person situated as was the plaintiff in the case at bar is entitled to the position of a holder of negotiable paper for value, and therefore not affected by the defense of want of consideration to the maker, the court of appeals of Maryland, through Chief Justice Alvey, also decided that all the plaintiff in such a case can recover is the amount due on the debt for which the note has been taken as collateral security. "In such case," said the chief justice, "while the plaintiff is entitled to be treated as a holder for value, it is only so to the extent necessary to protect the debts intended to be secured." Maitland v. Citizens'

Nat. Bank, 40 Md. 540, 17 Am. Rep. 620. Tiedeman on Commercial Paper, § 304, states that, where the pledge of a negotiable note is made for the purpose of securing the payment of a debt, the better rule is that the pledgee can recover the whole of the face value of the note, and hold the balance over and above the amount of his own claim as a trustee for the pledgeor. It would seem, therefore, as if he took a different view of the law from that taken by Daniel, although he expressly states in a subsequent part of his text that the pledgee in such a case is a bona fide holder only in respect to the amount of his claim against the pledgeor; and, if there be a good defense to an action on the collateral by the pledgeor, the recovery of the pledgee is limited to the amount of his claim against the pledgeor. But we think that if the pledgee is to be regarded in such a case (as he undoubtedly should be) as a bona fide holder only to the amount of his claim against the pledgeor, and if he be limited in his recovery to the amount of his claim, it is most reasonable that the controversy over the balance be litigated by those directly interested, and that ordinarily the pledgee is not to be held as a trustee for the pledgeor.

We are aware that there is a contradiction of opinion as to the attitude of the pledgee who seeks to recover the full amount of the collateral where such amount is in excess of the debt secured to him; but we are content to adopt the rule sustained by the decisions already cited, which limit his recovery to the amount due to him. In addition to the cases above cited, we may include Steere v. Benson, 2 Ill. App. 560, and assigns to a third person, who in consideration thereof reimburses the pledgee, inasmuch as the pledgeor could have recovered nothing against the maker of the note the assignee stands in no better position, and can enforce it only to the extent of the sum advanced to reimburse the pledgee. Blydenburgh v. Thayer, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 156.

So, a pledgee of a promissory note and mortgage given to secure it who sells them under special power of sale, and purchases them himself, does not thereby entitle himself to recover upon a foreclosure of the equity of redemption, a sum in excess of the debt for which the note and mortgage were pledged as collateral security, where the paper was accommodation paper. Handy v. Sibley, 46 Ohio St. 9.

The question whether the whole or only the amount advanced can be recovered, however, has been treated in some of the cases as depending upon whether or not the pledgee had notice that the paper was accommodation paper.

Thus, while a pledgee of a negotiable note can generally collect the whole amount and account to the pledgeor for the surplus over his debt, where it is known to be accommodation paper, he can recover of the maker only the amount of the debt due him from the pledgeor. Atlas Bank v. Doyle, 9 R. I. 76, 11 Am. Rep. 219, 98 Am. Dec. 368.

The maker of an accommodation note which was pledged by the payee to a bank that had knowledge that it was an accommodation note, who offers to pay the amount of the pledge but refuses payment of the amount of the note pledged, cannot be exonerated from interest and costs where he does not make a formal tender 44 L. R. A.

of the money as required by law. Mechanics' & T. Bank v. Barnett, 27 La. Ann. 177.

And evidence in an action upon a note showing a defense as against the payees and the first assignee, is not admissible in an action by the last assignee where the note which was accommodation paper was assigned as collateral security to a creditor with notice, and such creditor again assigned it before maturity to another without notice for a sufficient consideration. Cock v. Norwood, 106 Ill. 558.

In Berenbrock v. Stephens, 8 N. Y. Week. Dig. 163, however, it was held that a pledgee who takes a mere accommodation note given for the purpose of being used as collateral security for a loan and made payable to the party for whose accommodation it was given, may bring suit thereon whenever by its terms it is due, whether the money loaned had become due and payable or not, and may recover the whole amount thereof, though it exceeds the amount loaned.

And a promise by a bank to furnish one who indorsed negotiable paper to it with credit of an equal amount in Europe, and the issuing of letters of credit therefor, is a sufficient consideration to render the bank a bona fide holder, and entitle it to recover the face of the note though it was an accommodation note and not enforceable as between the original parties, and the bank need not prove that it had actually paid the amount for which the letters were issued. Duncan v. Gilbert, 29 N. J. L. 521.

IV. Matters of procedure.

That the maker of a note had a valid defense against the payee is matter of defense in an ac-

Second Nat. Bank v. Hemingray, 34 Ohio St. 381. A recent case upon this subject is that of Farmers' State Bank v. Blevins, 46 Kan. 536. There the court stated the question substantially as follows: In an action against the maker of the notes which had been transferred before maturity to an innocent and bona fide holder as collateral security for an indebtedness existing between the payee of such notes and the indorsee, is the indorsee entitled to recover against the maker to the full amount of such collateral notes, where such amount exceeds the indebtedness which they were transferred to secure, without regard to any defenses that may exist between the original parties to such notes, or is in such case the right of the plaintiff to recover limited to the amount of the principal debt? In that case, as in the one before us, equitable defenses were made by the pleadings; and it appeared that there was a controversy between the maker and the payee of the notes, by which it appeared that the paper was subject to equitable set-offs between the maker and payee. The court answered the question by holding "that the doctrine that the pledgee cannot recover more than the amount of the debt of the pledgor is in accord with natural justice," and that, while it hesitated to state that as a rule, yet it did not think that any other rule ought to be applied without great caution. We are impressed with the reasoning in the Kansas case, and believe it correct in principle, as well as more practical, and well founded by the several decisions relied upon in the opinion of that court and the additional authorities above referred to by us.

tion by a holder as collateral security for a debt against the maker in which it is claimed that he is only entitled to recover the amount of the claim secured, and special averments in the declaration as to the amount are not required. Vanlew v. Second Nat. Bank, 21 Ill. App. 126.

And a complaint in an action by a pledgee of a negotiable note to which a defense existed as between the original parties for the recovery of the advance thereon need not aver that the note was received as collateral security, and is sufficient where it alleges that the pledgee was the owner. Curtis v. Mohr, 18 Wis. 616.

So, the pledgee of a note to which a defense exists as between the original parties may maintain an action for the amount advanced by him thereon in his own name without making the pledgor a party. Ibid.

But see YELLOWSTONE NAT. BANK V. GAGNON.

And the order of proof to establish the amount of advances in an action by the holder of a note as collateral security for advances against the maker thereof, upon which the maker had a good defense as against the payee, is not material. Gammon v. Huse, 9 Ill. App. 557.

The presumption is that a holder of negotiable paper as collateral security gave full consideration therefor and the burden of overcoming this presumption rests with the defendant in an action by such holder against the maker on the note. Duncan v. Gilbert, 29 N. J. L. 521.

And the burden of proof rests with the maker of negotiable paper in an action thereon by one who had taken it from the payee as collateral 44 L. R. A.

There is another point made by the supreme court of Kansas in their decision which is applicable in this case as well. We think that the payee of the note, Nickey, ought to have been made a party to this litigation. Although the bank, under the views that we have taken of the law applicable to its rights, really has no interest in the controversy between Nickey and Gagnon, yet it would be eminently proper that the whole controversy be settled in this one action, and that the rights of all parties be determined. As was said by the supreme court of Kansas in the case above cited: "At the commencement of this action to recover on the notes as pledgee, the bank ought to have made Brady a party. He was the payee of the notes sued upon. He had transferred them by indorsement to the bank, who claims to be an innocent holder for value. Even after Blevins filed his answer setting up his various defenses as against Brady, and the knowledge of the bank of these equitable defenses, the bank, for protection against Brady, ought to have made Brady a party, as it now insists upon a recovery for the full amount of the notes; and yet it is shown that Brady's pre-existing indebtedness to the bank is less than the face of the notes and interest. As Brady was not a party then, and is not now, he will not be bound by the decision of this court on the question presented."

We think the case at bar is one where the court might properly order the payee of the note to be made a party, and that in the further conduct of the case this ought to be done, provided the pleadings remain as they are. It follows, therefore, that the motion security for advances to show the amount of such advances. Gammon v. Huse, 9 Ill. App. 557.

So, the burden of proof rests with the maker of a note who had authorized the payee to pledge it as collateral security for a specified indebtedness, seeking to reduce the recovery thereon by a pledgee to the amount authorized to establish that the payee had pledged it for a larger amount, and that the pledgor had knowledge of the extent of his authority. Maitland v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 40 Md. 540, 17 Am. Rep. 620.

And where a note was given in consideration of the postponement of the sale of mortgaged premises for four months and as collateral security for the mortgage debt under an agreement that if the debt should be paid during that time, or if the premises should sell for an amount sufficient to pay it with costs, the note should be void or if it should sell for a less sum only so much of the note should be collected as would make up the difference, and the land was sold, it is the duty of the maker to show it and that by reason thereof only a portion of the note ought to be collected, and in case of his failure to do so the pledgee would be entitled to recover the full amount thereof. Hancock v. Hodgson, 4 Ill. 329.

But the burden rests with the plaintiff in an action by a pledgee of notes as collateral security against the maker thereof to show what debts were intended to be secured thereby and the amount remaining due thereon. Maitland v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 40 Md. 540, 17 Am. Rep. 620.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Board of Commissioners of WILKES COUNTY et al.
v.

Clarence CALL, Sheriff, etc., and

J. M. TURNER et al., Appts.

(123 N. C. 308.)

1. County bonds issued under authority of a statute passed in violation of the state Constitution are null and void.
2. There can be no bona fide holder of county bonds issued under authority of an unconstitutional statute.
3. A provision of an ordinance of a constitutional convention, that all counties subscribing to stock of railroads shall do so subject to the same rules, regulations, and restrictions set forth in the charter of a particular company, confers no affirmative authority to make such subscriptions.
4. A general provision of an ordinance of a constitutional convention that capital stock of a railroad company may be created by subscriptions on the part of counties will not of itself authorize a subscription by a particular county.
5. Statutes procured by a railroad company for its own benefit will be strictly construed against it.
6. Recitals in a county bond will not estop the county from denying its validity if they point to an unconstitutional statute as the authority under which the bond was issued.
7. The holder of a county bond which recites that it was issued under a particular statute which is adjudged unconstitutional will be estopped from contending that it was issued under another statute.
8. Mere legislative authority given a railroad to receive subscriptions to stock from municipal corporations, for which no consideration is given and which there has been no attempt to exercise, is not a contract, but may be revoked at any time.
9. A constitutional requirement that no bills of a certain kind shall be passed unless the yeas and nays on the second and third reading shall have been entered on the journal is mandatory, and invalidates all statutes of the kind referred to not so passed.
10. The legislature cannot by a sweeping statute give all counties in the state the right to issue railroad aid bonds without regard to the restrictions imposed by the Constitution thereon.

11. An issue of county bonds may be declared void at the suit of the county commissioners, although only one bond is represented before the court, if a full defense was made and other bondholders had an opportunity to come in and be heard.

A PPEAL by defendants Turner et al. from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wilkes County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enjoin the payment of certain county bonds. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. N. Hachett for appellants.

Mr. A. C. Avery for appellees.

Douglas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought to test the validity of certain bonds issued by Wilkes county in payment of its subscription to the stock of the Northwestern North Carolina Railroad Company. The suit was brought by the commissioners of the county of Wilkes against the county treasurer. The defendants Turner and Wellborn, who had become the owners of one of the bonds after the bringing of this action, by leave of the court, became parties defendant, and invited all other bondholders to come in and join them in resisting the action.

On the face of each bond, dated October 1, 1889, appears the explicit statement that "this bond is one of a series of one hundred bonds, of the denomination of $1,000 each, issued by authority of an act of the general assembly of North Carolina, ratified the 20th day of February, A. D. 1879, entitled 'An Act to Amend the Charter of the Northwestern North Carolina Railroad for the Construction of a Second Division from the Towns of Winston and Salem in Forsyth County, up the Yadkin Valley, by Wilkesboro, to Patterson's Factory, Caldwell County,' etc. The bond does not allude in any way to any other legislative act, nor does it profess to claim further validity than that derived from the recited act. It is admitted, as well as clearly shown by the evidence, that this act of February 20, 1879, was not passed in accordance with the mandatory provisions of the Constitution of this state, as construed by this court, inasmuch as upon the passage of said bill, upon its second reading in the house of representatives, there was no call of the ayes and noes, and, further, that the vote upon such reading was not recorded in the journal of the house. Const. art. 2, § 14. The amendatory act of 1881 is subject to the same obligation. In view of the recent decisions of this court, it is useless to discuss this question now, as the rule has been definitely settled in the following cases: Union Bank v. Oxford Comrs. 119 N. C. 214, 34 L. R. A. 487; Stanly County Comrs. v. Snuggs, 121 N. C. 394, 39 L. R. A. 439; Charlotte v. Shepard, 120 N. C. 411, 122 N. C. 602; Rodman v. Washington, 122 N. C. 39. Under the authority of these decisions, we are compelled to hold that the entire issue of these bonds is null and void, for want of legislative authority. An act of the legislature passed in violation of the Constitution of the state, or in disregard of its mandatory provisions, is, to the extent of such repugnance, absolutely void; and all bonds issued thereunder bear the brand of illegality stamped upon their face by the hand of the law. The act under which these bonds profess to have been issued was never legally passed, and never became a law. As was said in Norton v. Shelby County, 118 U. S. 425, 30 L. ed. 178: "An unconstitutional act is not a law; it confers no rights; it imposes no duties; it affords no protection; it creates no office; it is, in legal contemplation, as inoperative as though it had never been passed." The Constitution of the state is plenary notice to the world of its organic law. There can be no bona fide holders of unconstitutional obligations, nor can ignorance of public statutes and legislative journals be deemed otherwise than wilful or negligent. The journals are published for the information of the public, and are widely distributed and easily accessible, fully as much so as the public records of a county. Surely, no one would be heard to say that he was the bona fide owner of a piece of land simply because he held a deed therefor, when an inspection of the records would show that his grantor had no power to convey. It has been well said in United States v. Macon County, 99 U. S. 582, 25 L. ed. 331: "The difficulty lies in the want of original power. While there has undoubtedly been great recklessness on the part of the municipal authorities in the creation of bonded indebtedness, there has not unfrequently been gross carelessness on the part of purchasers when investing in such securities. Every purchaser of a municipal bond is chargeable with notice of the statute under which the bond was issued. If the statute gives no power to make the bond, the municipality is not bound."

A careful distinction should be drawn between the want of power to issue bonds, and mere irregularities in the exercise of that power. The latter, under certain circumstances, may be cured by recitals, or eliminated by estoppel; but a want of power goes to the very root of the transaction, and destroys its vitality. A tree may yet live though its branches are badly shattered by the storm, but the last leaf falls when the 44 L. R. A.

root is dead. This rule has been clearly laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the oft-cited case of Anthony v. Jasper County, 101 U. S. 693, 25 L. ed. 1005, where Chief Justice Waite says: "Dealers in municipal bonds are charged with notice of the laws of the state granting power to make the bonds they find on the market. This we have always held. If the power exists in the municipality, the bona fide holder is protected against mere irregularities in the manner of its execution; but, if there is a want of power, no legal liability can be created. When the bonds now in question were put out, the law required that, to be valid, they must be certified to by the auditor of state. In other words, that officer was to certify them before their execution was complete, so as to bind the public for their payment. We had occasion to consider in McGarrahan v. New Idria Min. Co. 96 U. S. 316, 24 L. ed. 630, the effect of statutory requirements as to the form of the execution of patents to pass the title of lands out of the United States, and there say: 'Each and every one of the integral parts of the execution is essential to the validity of a patent. They are of equal importance under the law, and one cannot be dispensed with more than another. Neither is directory, but all are mandatory. The question is not what, in the absence of statutory regulations, would constitute a valid grant, but what the statute requires.' The same rule applies here. The object to be accomplished is the complete execution of a valid instrument, such as the law authorizes public officers to put out, and bind for the payment of money the public organization they represent." By repeated adjudications, this has become the settled rule of that court. Police Jury v. Britton, 15 Wall. 566, 570, 572, 21 L. ed. 251, 253, 254; Claiborne County v. Brooks, 111 U. S. 400, 406, 28 L. ed. 470, 472; Northern Bank v. Porter Twp. 110 U. S. 608, 618, 28 L. ed. 258, 262; Concord v. Robinson, 121 U. S. 165, 167, 30 L. ed. 885, 887; Kelley v. Milan, 127 U. S. 139, 150, 32 L. ed. 77, 82; Norton v. Dyersburg, 127 U. S. 160, 175, 32 L. ed. 85, 91; Young v. Clarendon Twp. 132 U. S. 340, 33 L. ed. 356; Hill v. Memphis, 134 U. S. 198, 203, 33 L. ed. 887, 889; Merrill v. Monticello, 138 U. S. 673, 686, 687, 34 L. ed. 1069, 1075; Erenham v. German American Bank, 144 U. S. 173, 36 L. ed. 390; Citizens' Sav. & L. Asso. v. Perry County, 156 U. S. 692, 704, 39 L. ed. 585, 591.

But it is urged that, while the bonds were expressly issued under the act of 1879, there was, apparently unknown to both parties to the transaction, and certainly ignored by them, an existing authority to issue said bonds, derived from an ordinance of the constitutional convention passed in 1868; and that, therefore, we should hold that these bonds were unwittingly issued under that ordinance, and are therefore valid. The only authority we can find in that ordinance in any way authorizing the subscription to the stock of the company or the issuing of the bonds is as follows:

"Sec. 2. That the capital stock of said company may be created by subscriptions on the part of individuals, corporations, and counties, in shares of $100."

"Sec. 12. Be it further ordained that the stockholders of said company may pay the stock subscribed by them either in money, labor, or material for constructing said road as the board of directors may determine, and that all counties or towns subscribing stock to said company shall do so in the same manner and under the same rules, regulations, and restrictions as are set forth and prescribed in the act incorporating the North Carolina & Atlantic Railroad Company, for the government of such towns and counties as are now allowed to subscribe to the capital stock of said company."

That said ordinance cannot be relied on to support the validity of the bonds at issue is apparent for several reasons:

First. We do not see that any authority whatever is given or attempted to be given by either of these sections to Wilkes county to subscribe to the capital stock of this company. But it is said that § 12, by referring to the charter of the "North Carolina & Atlantic Railroad Company," by which we presume is meant the Atlantic & North Carolina Railroad (Laws of 1852, chap. 136), confers upon the different counties through or near which the Northwestern North Carolina Railroad may run the same authority to subscribe as was given to the counties tributary to the former company. Said section does not refer generally to the act of 1852, nor does it profess to confer any of the powers therein granted. It simply says that those counties and towns that do subscribe "shall do so in the same manner and under the same rules, regulations, and restrictions" as are prescribed in the former act. The words "same restrictions" are peculiarly significant here, as the act of 1852, § 45, provides in express terms that, "if the said road be not completed within six years after the ratification of this act, this charter shall be forfeited. Therefore, even if the powers granted in the act of 1852 had been given to the Northwestern North Carolina Railroad Company, or the counties in its interest, subject to the "same restrictions," those powers would have expired by their own limitation long before their attempted exercise twenty-three years thereafter. As all such powers must be strictly construed, this restrictive provision must be held to be in the nature of a limitation, and not a condition subsequent; that is, the authority given to the counties to subscribe, if it ever existed, expired at the end of six years, unless already exercised in such a way as to create vested rights. But it makes no difference how the power was exercised, if there was no power. Section 12 of the ordinance of 1868 does not refer to § 33 of the act of 1852, which confers the power, but is evidently limited by its very terms to §§ 34-36, which prescribe the manner in which that power must be exercised by the counties or towns to which it may have been granted. It would have been very easy for the convention to have given the same authority granted in § 33, either in express terms or by reference to said section; but it has not done so, and we cannot do so by judicial construction.

There is no principle better settled than that all charters granting special privileges or powers must be not only strictly construed, but must be construed most strongly against the grantees. This rule, with the reasons therefor, has been so clearly stated by Chief Justice Pearson in Raleigh & G. R. Co. v. Reid, 64 N. C. 155, 158, that we can do no better than to quote his language, as follows: "It is equally well settled that contracts made by the state with individuals, in granting charters, are not to be construed by the same rules as contracts between individuals. In the latter, the rule of the common law, which is the same as common sense, is, 'Words are to be taken in the strongest sense against the party using them,' on the idea that self-interest induces a man to select words most favorable for himself. It is otherwise when the state is a party; for it is known that in obtaining charters, although the sovereign is presumed to use the words, in point of fact the bills are drafted by individuals, seeking to procure the grant, and that 'the promoters,' as they are styled in England, or the 'lobby members,' as they are styled on this side of the Atlantic, have the charters or acts of incorporation drafted to suit their own purposes; and a matter of this kind, instead of being in its strict sense a contract, is more like the act of an indulgent head of the family dispensing favors to its different members, and yielding to importunity. So, the courts, to save the old gentleman from being stripped of the very means of existence by sharp practice, have been forced to reverse the rule of construction, and to adopt the meaning most favorable to the grantor." The same rule is laid down in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Canal Comrs. 21 Pa. 9, 22, where Chief Justice Jeremiah S. Black, says for the court: "It may be that the privilege which the relators claim might arise by implication out of their charter or some other of the acts cited by their counsel, if we were at liberty to give to them the broad construction which we sometimes apply to other laws of a different character. But corporate powers can never be created by implication nor extended by construction. No privilege is granted unless it be expressed in plain and unequivocal words, testifying the intention of the legislature in a manner too plain to be misunderstood. When the state means to clothe a corporate body with a portion of her own sovereignty, and to disarm herself to that extent of the powers which belong to her, it is so easy to say so that we will never believe it to be meant when it is not said; and words of equivocal import are so easily inserted by mistake or fraud that every consideration of justice and policy requires they they should be treated as nugatory when they do find their way into the enactments of the legislature. In the construction of a charter, to be in doubt is to be resolved; and every resolution which springs from doubt is against the corporation. This is the rule sustained by all the courts in this country and in England. No other has ever received the sanction of any authority to which we owe much deference. This court has asserted it times without number. We have ruled five or six important cases upon it within the last year. We seem not to have made much impression on the professional mind, and we are probably making as little now. But, when respectable counsel call on us hereafter (as they doubtless will) to enlarge corporate powers by construction, we can only repeat again and again that our duty imperatively forbids it. The privileges of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company may be too rigidly restricted. If the usefulness of the company would be increased by extending them, let the legislature see to it. But let it be remembered that nothing but plain English words will do it." It should be borne in mind that there is no pretense of authority for the issue of these bonds outside of the charter of the Northwestern North Carolina Railroad Company and its amendments. It has been the actor as well as the beneficiary throughout, and therefore the acts under consideration come peculiarly within the rule of strict construction laid down by the two great chief justices from whom we have quoted.

We have not overlooked the fact that in Belo v. Forsyth County Comrs. 76 N. C. 489, this court strongly intimates that § 12 of the charter did confer the authority given in § 33 of the act of 1852; but it does so incidentally, and with little discussion, because it was not denied in the pleadings. This was not the determining point in the case, which turned chiefly upon the recitals in the bonds and the ratifying act of 1868. This is clearly shown in the opinion itself, which devotes four pages to the discussion of equitable estoppel arising on the recitals, and about half a page to the possible binding effect of the ordinance, winding up with the significant sentence on page 497 that, "as the case is presented to us, that question does not arise, and we do not decide it." It evidently did not receive careful investigation, as it apparently did not arise on the pleadings. The court stated that "the principle, however, of equitable estoppel is a most important element in the transaction," and that the recitals in the bonds (which were essentially different from those now before us) constituted an estoppel in pais upon the county of Forsyth. Can it be questioned that estoppels must be mutual, and that he who relies upon the recitals in the bond to estop another must himself be bound by them? If this is so, it ends the case at bar, as all the recitals point to the unconstitutional act of 1879.

The case of Hill v. Forsyth County Comrs. 67 N. C. 367, considering simply the power of the legislature to authorize the issue of bonds, has no bearing upon the present case. The Forsyth county bonds recited that they were "authorized by an ordinance of 1868, by an order of the court of pleas and quarter sessions of Forsyth county, at June term, 1868, and re-enacted and ratified and confirmed by an act of the general assembly, 41 L. R. A.

ratified the 11th of August, 1868." [76 N. C. 489.] The cases are clearly distinguishable. Another important point of difference is that the Forsyth county bonds were voted and subscribed within a few months after the passage of the ordinance, before whatever power it may have given, if any, had expired by its own limitation. It is evident that the legislature as well as the railroad company itself thought that the authority given in the ordinance was not sufficient, as in both cases additional legislation was sought and obtained, but with this essential difference: In the case at bar, the amendatory act, having been passed in violation of mandatory provisions of the Constitution, in legal contemplation, was never passed. As it has no legal existence, we have no authority to construe it, but simply to obliterate it. In Jarrott v. Moberly, 103 U. S. 580, 588, 26 L. ed. 492, 494, the court, in discussing a similar case, says: "Further legislation was needed. Such was the evident opinion of the legislature of the state for by an additional act, passed on the 29th of March, 1872, the authority was given in terms." And on page 586, 26 L. ed. 493, it says: "A constitutional provision should not be construed so as to defeat its evident purpose, but rather so as to give it effective operation, and suppress the mischief at which it was aimed."

Secondly. The bonds on their face profess to have been issued under an entirely different statute. The principle laid down by the Federal authorities, and practically of universal acceptance, is that estoppels rest upon the recitals in the bond. The rule is generally cited as laid down in Coloma v. Eaves, 92 U. S. 484, 23 L. ed. 579, as follows: "Where legislative authority has been given to a municipality, or to its officers, to subscribe to the stock of a railroad company, and to issue municipal bonds in payment, but only on some precedent condition, such as a popular vote favoring the subscription, and where it may be gathered from the legislative enactment that the officers of the municipality were invested with power to decide whether the condition precedent has been complied with, their recital that it has been, made in the bonds issued by them, and held by a bona fide purchaser, is conclusive of the fact, and binding upon the municipality; for the recital is itself a decision of the fact by the appointed tribunal." Buchanan v. Litchfield, 102 U. S. 278, 26 L. ed. 138; Northern Bank v. Porter Twp. 110 U. S. 608, 616, 28 L. ed. 258, 261.

In the case at bar the bonds recite that they were issued under the act of 1879; and as all estoppels of this nature, to be operative, must be mutual, are not the bondholders themselves estopped from setting up any facts to the contrary? These recitals point out the very act under which the power is claimed, and it was the duty of all persons claiming thereunder to see that the act met the constitutional requirements. Certainly, the estoppel can never go further than the recital itself. It cannot operate upon any other act, nor as to the validity of any act. In Gilson v. Dayton, 123 U. S. 59, 31 L. ed.

74, it was held that "as it appears on the face of the bonds sued on in this action that they were issued under the special act of February 18, 1857, which was held void in Post v. Kendall County Supers. 105 U. S. 607, 26 L. ed. 1204, and not under the general law of March 6, 1867, the judgment dismissing the action is affirmed." As was said in Davies County v. Huidekoper, 98 U. S. 98, 100, 25 L. ed. 112, 113: "There must, indeed, be power, which, if formally and duly exercised, will bind the county or town. No bona fides can dispense with this, and no recital can excuse it." In Dixon County v. Field, 111 U. S. 83, 92, 28 L. ed. 360, 363, it was held that the estoppel arising from recitals, in the face of the bonds, never extended to or covered matters of law, and could arise only "upon matters of fact which the corporate officers had authority by law to determine and to certify."

Thirdly. That ordinance did not create a contract between the railroad company and the county of Wilkes. The only contract that has ever existed between them was the contract of 1888, which was subject to all the constitutional provisions then existing. The mere authority given in the charter of a railroad company to receive subscriptions from municipal corporations, where no consideration is given, and no attempted exercise of the power, has none of the essential elements of a contract, and is held at the pleasure of the lawmaking power. Much more so is it subject to constitutional restrictions. Concord v. Portsmouth Sav. Bank, 92 U. S. 625, 630, 23 L. ed. 628, 631; Concord v. Robinson, 121 U. S. 165, 169, 30 L. ed. 885, 887; Citizens' Sav. & L. Assn. v. Perry County, 156 U. S. 692, 697, 39 L. ed. 585, 588. Concord v. Portsmouth Sav. Bank, 92 U. S. 625, 630, 23 L. ed. 628, 631, was overruled in Fairfield v. Gallatin County, 100 U. S. 47, 25 L. ed. 544, only in so far as it applied to the Constitution of Illinois, and for the only reason that the Supreme Court of the United States deemed it proper, in the construction of a state Constitution, to follow the state decisions, instead of their own view of the law. The general principle remains unchanged, and meets our approval.

The ratification of the Constitution on the 24th day of April, 1868, when it went into effect for all domestic purposes, annulled all special powers remaining unexecuted, and not granted in strict accordance with its requirements. Article 2, § 16, is as follows: "No law shall be passed to raise money on the credit of the state or to pledge the faith of the state, directly or indirectly, for the payment of any debt, or to impose any tax upon the people of the state, or to allow the counties, cities, or towns to do so, unless the bill for the purpose shall have been read three several times in each house of the general assembly, and passed three several readings, which readings shall have been on three different days, and agreed to by each house respectively, and unless the yeas and nays on the second and third reading of the bill shall have been entered on the journal." Article 7, § 7, is as follows: "No county, city, town, or other municipal corporation shall contract any debt, pledge its faith, or loan its credit, nor shall any tax be levied, or collected by any officers of the same, except for the necessary expenses thereof, unless by a vote of a majority of the qualified voters therein." The intention of the Constitution is obvious. Profiting by the sad experience of other states, it intended to restrict the granting of public aid, and to hold to the strictest accountability every member of the legislature who assisted in such grant by forcing him to twice record his vote on the journal, where it would be open to public inspection. It further intended that every such grant should be the deliberate and intelligent act of the legislature itself, as well as of the community affected thereby. It is our duty to give to these salutary provisions that just construction, acquired alike by the rules of law and of common sense, that will effectuate, and not destroy, their beneficial purpose.

This view, we think, is sustained by the uniform decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the only tribunal before which this decision can ever lawfully come for review. In Wadsworth v. Eau Claire County Supers. 102 U. S. 534, 537, 26 L. ed. 221, 222 (citing and reaffirming Aspinwall v. Davies County Comrs. 22 How. 364, 16 L. ed. 296), the court says: "We held in that case that the popular vote did not itself create a vested right in the railroad company to the bonds, and that a subscription was necessary to create a contract binding the county to issue bonds in payment of the stock, and binding the company to issue stock for the bonds. 'Until the subscription is made,' said Mr. Justice Nelson, speaking for the whole court, 'the contract is unexecuted and obligatory upon neither party.' Hence the new state Constitution was held to govern the case, and from the time of its adoption to have withdrawn from the county commissioners all authority to make subscriptions to the stock of incorporated companies except in the manner and under the circumstances prescribed by that instrument." In Norton v. Brownsville Tazewell Dist. Comrs. 129 U. S. 479, 490, 32 L. ed. 774, 778, Chief Justice Fuller, speaking for the entire court, says: "These cases [referring to Concord v. Portsmouth Sav. Bank, 92 U. S. 625, 23 L. ed. 628; Falconer v. Buffalo & J. R. Co. 69 N. Y. 491; Buffalo & J. R. Co. v. Falconer, 103 U. S. 821, 26 L. ed. 471; Wadsworth v. Eau Claire County Supers. 102 U. S. 534, 26 L. ed. 221; and Aspinwall v. Davies County Comrs. 22 How. 364, 16 L. ed. 296] sufficiently illustrate the distinction between the operation of a constitutional limitation upon the power of the legislature and of a constitutional inhibition upon the municipality itself. In the former case past legislative action is not necessarily effective, while in the latter it is annulled. Of course, if an entirely new organic law is adopted, provision in the schedule or some other part of the instrument must be made for keeping in force all laws not inconsistent therewith, and this was furnished in this instance by the 1st section of article 11; but such a provision does not perpetuate any previous law enabling a municipality to do that which it is subsequently forbidden to do by the Constitution. The inhibition being self-executing, and operating directly upon the municipality, and not in itself enabling the latter to proceed in accordance with the prescribed limitation, further legislation is necessary before the municipality can act." In the late case of Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Texas, 170 U. S. 220, 42 L. ed. 1017, it is held that "a clause in a charter of a railroad company, granting it power to consolidate with or become the owner of other railroads, is not such a vested right that cannot be rendered inoperative by subsequent legislation, passed before the company avails itself of the power thus granted." It is useless to cite the cases themselves cited in the cases referred to herein.

It is further urged on the part of the defendants and those whom they represent that the issuing of these bonds was authorized by §§ 1996 to 2000 of the Code. This question was definitely settled in Stanly County Comrs. v. Snuggs, 121 N. C. 394, 400, 401, 39 L. R. A. 439, and we see no reason to reverse our ruling, nor do we find any facts taking this case from its operation. We can add nothing on this point to what was there in so fully and ably said in the opinion of the court, except to say that, if the construction contended for by the defendants must be placed upon those sections, then they are in direct violation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution, inasmuch as they practically annul one of its essential provisions. If the word "uncompleted" can refer to any road not yet begun, and the word "interest" apply to a mere friendly feeling or supposed advantage to be derived from the general building up of the country, then the several counties may go on forever subscribing unlimited amounts to any railroad in esse or in futuro that may be located within the range of their knowledge. Such a construction would simply nullify the Constitution, by making its explicit restrictions vain and worthless. It cannot be adopted by us; but, if we were forced to adopt it, we would be equally forced to declare those sections null and void. If they mean that, they have no place upon the statute books. While the legislature may, in individual cases, grant to specific counties the necessary authority in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution and subject to its restrictions, it cannot, by a sweeping act of unlimited application, utterly destroy its operation. If the legislature or the railroad company or the county had placed any such construction on those sections, additional legislation would have been deemed useless, and the recitals in the bonds would have been different. It is true that this road had been begun, and was in one sense uncompleted, when the subscription was made; but it was not begun when the Constitution was ratified, and the county at that time had no pecuniary interest in it, nor any interest contemplated by the statute. It is not necessary for us to consider the fact that the first section of the road had been completed to Winston, beyond which all idea of extension seems for years to have been abandoned. The act of 1881 has no reference to the bonds in question, and is subject to the same objections as the act of 1879, which we have been discussing.

We have given this case the most thorough investigation and careful consideration on account of the important principles and the large amount involved. We deeply deplore the fact that many parties must suffer, who are in morals, if not in law, innocent holders of the bonds; but their loss comes from their misplaced confidence in those from whom they received the bonds, and the negligence of the corporation to which the power was professedly given and the bonds were issued. The only authority for their issue is found in a railroad charter, and we cannot undertake to validate defective or unconstitutional legislation by judicial construction. The suggestion of repudiation, so strongly urged here and elsewhere, has no weight with us. The so-called "repudiation" of an unconstitutional obligation is a contradiction in terms, and its assertion amounts simply to a moral and legal absurdity.

It has been said that the usual difference between heterodoxy and orthodoxy is the difference between your doxy and my doxy, and that in financial ethics the same distinction exists between stealing and financiering. This distinction we cannot indorse. It is just as wrong to wring from an unwilling and perhaps a suffering debtor an unjust debt as it is to deprive a creditor of a just debt. We will try to do neither, but will hew to the line. The strictly moral aspect of the case is not before us, but it is possible that the plaintiffs, representing an honest, industrious, and intelligent people, may have reasons for their action as strong in morals as in law. Enough appears to indicate, what is common knowledge, that the stock for which these bonds were issued has been swept away in the maelstrom of corporate reorganization. It may be that the plaintiffs, deprived of every vestige of consideration by the decree of a court of equity, may not feel any moral obligation beyond the strict letter of the law. They may see no difference between repudiation and reorganization when both accomplish the same result, to retain the benefit and shift the burden.

In Lewis v. Pima County, 155 U. S. 54, 58, 39 L. ed. 67, 69, it was held that bonds issued under an act of the legislature of the territory of Arizona, which was in violation of the Revised Statutes of the United States, were void, and "created no obligation against the county which a court of law can enforce." In the carefully considered case of Brenham v. German American Bank, 144 U. S. 173, 182, 188, 36 L. ed. 390, 394, 396, the court says: "It is easy for the legislature to confer upon a municipality, when it is constitutional to do so, the power to issue negotiable bonds; and, under the well-settled rule that any doubt as to the existence of such power ought to be determined against its existence, it ought not to be held to exist in the present case. . . . As there was no authority to issue the bonds, even a bona fide holder of them cannot have a right to recover upon them or their coupons,"—citing Marsh v. Fulton County, 10 Wall. 676, 19 L. ed. 1040; East Oakland Twp. v. Skinner, 84 U. S. 255, 24 L. ed. 125; Buchanan v. Litchfield, 102 U. S. 278, 26 L. ed. 138; Hayes v. Holly Springs, 114 U. S. 120, 29 L. ed. 81; Daviess County v. Dickenson, 117 U. S. 657, 29 L. ed. 1026; Hopper v. Corington, 118 U. S. 148, 151, 30 L. ed. 190, 192; Merrill v. Monticello, 138 U. S. 673, 681, 682, 34 L. ed. 1069, 1073.

It has been suggested that the defense in this case has been only colorable, as but one of the bonds was represented. Under the circumstances, we think, that was sufficient. An elaborate answer, evidently prepared by able counsel, has been filed, presenting every reasonable defense; and, while no argument was made before us for the defendants, every phase of the case has been carefully examined by us in the five months during which we have held it under advisement. The plaintiffs had no means of knowing who held the bonds, as they are payable to bearer, and pass from hand to hand without indorsement or registration. The bondholders themselves could have become parties at any stage of the proceedings, and would have been gladly heard by us; but the mere fact that they deliberately refrained from any participation in the defense when they had every opportunity of doing so should not deprive the plaintiffs of all power to protect the rights of the people they represent in a court of competent jurisdiction, where alone this action could be brought by them. The current of authority from other states sustains the conclusions we have reached in this case; but, owing to the large number of cases, we have thought it best to cite only from our own decisions and those of the Supreme Court of the United States.

For the reasons stated in this opinion, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Furches, J., dissenting:

On the 9th of March, 1868, the constitutional convention of North Carolina passed an ordinance chartering and authorizing the formation of a corporation, to be known as the "Northwestern North Carolina Railroad Company." Under this charter said company was formed and organized; and on the 25th of March, 1868, the county of Forsyth subscribed $100,000 to said corporation, which subscription was held to be valid in Hill v. Forsyth County Comrs. 67 N. C. 367. In payment of this subscription, the county of Forsyth issued coupon bonds to the amount of $100,000, and they were held to be valid against the county in Belo v. Forsyth County Comrs. 76 N. C. 489, and the work of constructing said road between Greensboro, in the county of Guilford, and Winston, in the county of Forsyth, was commenced. This part of the road was completed and put into operation within the next few years, and has continued to be run and operated ever since. This charter made Winston a point to which the road should run, west of its starting point on the North Carolina Railroad. From this point (Winston) it was authorized to build branch roads, but none were built until 1887, when the company proposed to build a branch of its road from Winston to or near Wilkesboro, in Wilkes county, provided Wilkes county would make a subscription of $100,000 to the capital stock of said company. This proposition to subscribe $100,000 to the capital stock was submitted to the qualified voters of said county, by the commissioners thereof; the vote taken; a majority of the whole qualified voters of said county voted for the subscription. The subscription was made, and the road built to Wilkesboro, in compliance with the agreement of the railroad company; and the bonds now asked to be declared invalid were issued by the county, delivered to the railroad company, and the interest thereon regularly paid until the commencement of this action. All these facts are shown by the record, and are admitted to be true. But there having been a change in the personnel of the board of commissioners since said bonds were issued, and since said road was built, this new board is seeking in this action to repudiate the action of the former board.

I understand the court to rest its opinion on two grounds,—the want of power in the commissioners to submit the proposition to the voters, and to issue the bonds; and the doctrine of estoppel. If there is error in these positions, I shall contend that the conclusion to which the court has arrived is erroneous, and should be reversed. I admit that, if the commissioners had no legislative authority to submit the proposition of subscription to the voters of Wilkes, these bonds are void, and the judgment of the court is correct. But I propose to show that they had this authority, and that the bonds are valid.

The charter (the ordinance of the convention) in express terms makes the charter of the Atlantic & North Carolina Railroad Company a part of the charter of the Northwestern North Carolina Railroad Company, so far as it relates to the subscription of counties to the capital stock of the company. This being so, the charter of the Atlantic & North Carolina Railroad Company is to be read and considered as a part of the charter of the Northwestern North Carolina Railroad Company. Wrought Iron Range Co. v. Carver, 118 N. C. 328; Leavenworth County Comrs. v. Higginbotham, 17 Kan. 62. It is like an instrument referring to another instrument (Flaum v. Wallace, 103 N. C. 296), or where the complaint in one action refers to the complaint in another action for data (Alexander v. Norwood, 118 N. C. 381), they are to be read and considered together as one instrument. I have shown that the subscription made to this company (the Northwestern North Carolina Railroad Company) by the county of Forsyth, under the charter as originally passed, has been sustained, and held to be valid by this court in Hill v. Forsyth County Comrs. 67 N. C. 367. This decision established the power—the authority—to submit the proposition of subscription to the voters of the county, and to issue bonds. But the validity of the bonds issued on this subscription of Forsyth was again put directly in issue in the case of Belo v. Forsyth County Comrs. in a mandamus proceeding, to compel their payment, and their legality was again sustained by this court. Belo v. Forsyth County Comrs. 76 N. C. 489. This case, also, as I contend, established the authority to submit the question to the voters, and to issue these bonds. It is true that the submission of this question in Forsyth was made by the justices of the peace, acting as a county court; and it is true that the charter provides that the question should be submitted by them. But this charter was passed, and this submission was made, and bonds issued, before the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, which did not go into effect until the 22d of April of that year. By this Constitution and subsequent legislation, the county court was abolished, and the county commissioners succeeded to their powers in this matter, and in all such cases. It is so held by this court in Belo v. Forsyth County Comrs. 76 N. C. 489, and it is expressly so provided by the legislature. Code, § 1997. Therefore, while the submission of the question in Wilkes was by the commissioners, they were the successors of the justices and the county court, fully and clearly authorized to make the submission and the subscription and to issue the bonds.

But it is contended by the court that, if the charter authorized this subscription and the issue of the bonds now sought to be repudiated, it was passed before the Constitution of 1868 went into effect, and that it was thereby repealed. To support this position, Aspinwall v. Daviess County Comrs. 22 How. 364, 16 L. ed. 296, and Lewis v. Pima County, 155 U. S. 54, 39 L. ed. 67, are cited by the court. Neither of these cases, in my opinion, sustains the position for which they are cited. The first case cited (22 How.) is intended to raise the question of violating a contract under the Constitution of the United States, and nothing more. The submission in that case was made, and the vote thereon was had, in 1849; but the subscription to the capital stock was not made, and the bonds were not issued, until 1852. In the meantime the Constitution of the state (Indiana) had been amended so as to prohibit any county in the state from issuing such bonds. But Daviess county proceeded to issue the bonds under said submission and vote, and to put them on the market, but afterwards refused to pay them; and the plaintiff, being the holder of a part of these bonds, undertook to enforce their payment. There was no question made in that case but what the Constitution had inhibited their issue. But the plaintiff claimed that the submission and the vote thereon, which were before the amended Constitution, amounted to a contract; and that the new Constitution, which prohibited the county from issuing the bonds, was an impairment of the obligation of this contract, and therefore in violation of the Constitution of the United States. No such question as this arises in 44 L. R. A.

this case. There is no pretense that these bonds are protected by any provision of the Constitution of the United States.

But it is denied by the defendants that the Constitution of 1868 repealed the charter of this road, or that it prohibited Wilkes county from making this subscription or from issuing these bonds, as I expect to show. The case of Lewis v. Pima County arose out of the legislation of Arizona territory. The legislature of this territory passed an act authorizing Pima county to issue bonds for the construction of a railroad. This being a territorial government, it had no legislative powers except those granted by Congress. And it was held in that case that Congress had not only failed to grant such legislative power, but had in express terms prohibited its exercise, and the bonds were held to be void. I fail to see the argument to be drawn from this case against the validity of the bonds under consideration. As has been stated, the charter of the Northwestern North Carolina Railroad was passed before the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, which took effect on the 22d of April of that year. But the legislature passed an act, ratified on the 11th of August, 1868, as follows: "Sec. 1. The general assembly of North Carolina do enact, that an ordinance entitled 'An Ordinance to Incorporate the Northwestern North Carolina Railroad Company,' ratified the 9th day of March, A. D. 1868, be and the same is hereby re-enacted, ratified, and confirmed." If there had been a repeal of this charter by the Constitution, which I contend there had not been, it seems to have been re-enacted in August, 1868. It has not escaped my attention that there is in the printed record an agreement as to what acts are to be considered by the court in deciding this case, and the act of 1868 is not one of those named. This agreement is signed by the counsel for plaintiffs, and by counsel for Mr. Turner and Mr. Wellborn, but it is not signed by anyone for the defendant Call. But, if it had been signed by Call, I would have to disregard it. Parties may agree upon facts, that I would feel bound by, but I cannot feel bound by an agreement as to what is the law. I refer to this act of 1868 for the purpose of meeting an argument in the opinion of the court, and not for the reason that I consider it necessary to sustain the position I have taken, as to the authority of the commissioners of Wilkes county to submit this question to the voters, and to subscribe the stock, and to issue the bonds. The charter provides for submitting the question to a vote of the people in almost, if not, the language of the Constitution of 1868, with the single exception that it shall be sufficient if a majority of the qualified voters "voting thereon shall be in favor of the subscription." To this extent, and no further, did the Constitution of 1868 conflict with the provisions of this charter; and this was cured by § 1997 of the Code, which was admitted to have been passed as the Constitution requires, and which provides that it shall take a majority of the qualified voters of the county to authorize the subscription, as was done in this case. Suppose that § 1997 of the Code had been passed by the legislature as an amendment to this charter, with all the formalities and requirements of the Constitution; would it be contended that the submission was without legislative authority, and that these bonds were void? And, if not, why is it that a general law, applying to all cases of submission, has not the same effect?

The next ground upon which the court rests its opinion is that of estoppel. This ground of alleged invalidity to the bonds arises in this way: The legislature, at its February session (1879), attempted to pass, and did pass, an act providing for the extension of the Northwestern North Carolina Railroad, from Winston to Wilkesboro, for the subscription of counties to its capital stock, and the issue of bonds. But it is claimed by the plaintiff, and such appears to be the fact, that this act did not receive the three several readings, on three several days, with a call of the yeas and noes, as provided by the Constitution, and, for that reason, that the said act is void, under Union Bank v. Oxford Comrs. 119 N. C. 214, 34 L. R. A. 487, and Stanly County Comrs. v. Snuggs, 121 N. C. 400, 39 L. R. A. 439. But the commissioners, when they issued these bonds, did not know that this act was unconstitutional and void, and they recited in the bonds that they were issued under the act of 1879. This act does not purport to be an original act, but it is stated in the act itself that it is an amendment to the ordinance of the convention chartering said road. So that anyone seeing these bonds would be led by the statements therein to know that they depended upon authority derived from the original charter; that is, the ordinance of the convention of 1868. And it is claimed in the opinion of the court that this recital in the bonds, put there by the plaintiffs, estops the holders and those representing them from showing any other authority in the commissioners, except the act of the 20th of February, 1879, and that, that act being void for the reasons heretofore stated, the commissioners had no power to issue the bonds. I admit that this act is a nullity, and cannot benefit the bondholders; and as it is void, and can do them no good, it can do them no harm. The court therefore, upon this recital in the bonds that they were issued under the act of February 20, 1879, again rests its judgment upon the doctrine of estoppel, and holds that the bondholders and the defendants in this action are estopped to show that the commissioners had any other authority except the said act of 1879. With the greatest respect and deference to the opinion of the court, it seems to me that the doctrine of estoppel is not only misapplied, but that its use and purpose are misconceived in this application by the court. Estoppels are as to facts, and not of law. In such transactions as this, they are made to apply to a party stating the facts, and not to the party to whom they are stated. This seems to me to be elementary learning. But see Bigelow, Estoppel, pp. 44 L. R. A.

4-7, and 356, and note 1: "It is not the deed of the defendant, but of Isham [the grantor] only, by whom alone it is executed; and, not being the deed of the defendant, it cannot, as a deed, estop him from denying that the grantor had title." And the same principle is held in the case of Northern Bank v. Porter Twp. 110 U. S. 603, 28 L. ed. 253, near the end of the opinion (cited by the court). In that case the bondholder was trying to estop the maker by holding him to the statements in the bond; and the court says that the maker is estopped by the recital of such facts as it was supposed to have special knowledge of,—such as that there had been a submission to a vote, and that a majority of the qualified voters voted for the bonds. But it was held that the defendant (the maker) was not estopped to show the law,—to show that the township had no legal authority to make the subscription and to issue the bonds. If the maker of the bonds was not estopped by the recitals in the bond from showing the want of legal authority to make the bonds, what rule of law or justice is there to estop the defendants in this case from showing that the commissioners of Wilkes county had the power—legal authority—to issue these bonds? It is said in the opinion of the court that "estoppels are mutual," and, as the plaintiff would be estopped by the recitals, that the defendant must be. This rule obtains in many instances, but I deny its application in this case, as I have shown above, from Bigelow on Estoppel and from Northern Bank v. Porter Twp. But were I to admit the rule to be that, where one party is estopped, the other party is also, what would be the result of the reasoning of the court, when I have shown that the maker would not be estopped to show the want of power?

The court, in its opinion, says that certain positions were strenuously insisted on by the defendants. I think this must be a mistake, as the case was not argued before us, either by brief or by oral argument, on behalf of the defendants. Mr. Turner and Mr. Wellborn, by leave of court, made themselves parties defendant after the action was brought, but they have given the case no further attention. Why they did this I do not know. The case appears to be a controversy so far as parties are concerned, for there are plaintiffs and there are defendants. But, as to the conduct of the case before this court is concerned, it has been unilateral. The opinion of the court speaks of the reorganization of the railroad company, thereby defrauding someone out of his stock. The record furnishes no evidence of any reorganization of the railroad company. It is stated in the opinion of the court that the Supreme Court of the United States is the only court authorized to review this opinion. I agree with the court in this expression of opinion, but I have no idea that it will ever be reviewed by that court, as the case is decided in favor of plaintiffs, and the defendants have not taken interest enough in it to be represented by counsel, and it is not likely they will appeal. It is said that the talk of repudiation has had no effect on the court, and I have no idea that it has; and I hope that my aversion to repudiation has had no influence on me in coming to the conclusions I have reached. My opinion is that the bonds are valid, and that their payment should be enforced by the courts.

Fairecloth, Ch. J.: I concur in the dissenting opinion.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

William D. HALE, Receiver, etc., of American Savings & Loan Association, Appt.,
v.

Ella CAIRNS et al., Respts.

(.....N. D.....)

*A member of a building and loan association, who borrows money from the association, and bids a premium for the privilege of obtaining the loan, and executes his bond for the amount of the loan and premium, and gives a mortgage to secure the payment of such bond, and also assigns to such association his shares of stock as collateral security for such payment, is not entitled, in an action brought to foreclose such mortgage by the receiver of such association (said association being insolvent), to apply the amounts he has paid as dues upon his stock in reduction of his indebtedness.

(November 19, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court of Cavalier County in favor of defendants in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cochran & Corliss, for appellant:

The plaintiff may, as foreign receiver, maintain this action.

The dues which Cairns has paid upon his stock, that is, the dues upon the four shares of stock with which he was to pay the $400 borrowed, and the dues upon the four shares of stock with which he was to pay the premium bid, should not be deducted from the amount found due on the loan for principal and interest.

When such an association becomes insolvent the borrowing stockholder should enjoy no advantage over the non-borrowing stockholder. All who have borrowed money of the association should return it with interest, for the assets of such association consist chiefly of loans made to members; and then, when all the assets have been collected in, all the stockholders should share in the net assets in proportion to their respective holdings.

Bartholomew, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

William D. Hale, the appellant, is the duly-appointed receiver of the American Savings & Loan Association. As such he seeks to foreclose a mortgage given by Robert Cairns and Ella Cairns to said association. Robert Cairns died before the action was brought, and the defendants Mary and Robert Cairns are his heirs at law. The American Savings & Loan Association was a corporation organized and doing business under the laws of the state of Minnesota, with its home office at Minneapolis. The allegations of the complaint, aside from the allegations as to the insolvency of the association and the appointment of the receiver, are substantially the same as in the case of United States Sav. & L. Co. v. Shain (decided at this term) 77 N. W. 1006. The answer also raises the same issues as in that case. Following the decision in that case, we hold that the contract in this case must be governed by the laws of the state of Minnesota, and that said contract is not usurious.

Upon the question of the proper credits to be given to the defendants, this case differs materially from the Shain Case, as the association has become insolvent, and is unable to mature the stock, and consequently unable to complete the contract on its part. In this case the loan was $400, and the premium bid was $400. The evidence of indebtedness took the form of a bond. Ella Cairns signed as one of the obligors. The bond was for $900, but only the sum of $400 drew interest, and that at the rate of 6 per cent. Eight shares of stock were assigned to the association as collateral security; the bond to be paid by the absolute surrender of such stock at maturity. The bond was payable on or before nine years from date. It is conceded, as we understand the record, that on December 19, 1888, Robert Cairns, deceased, subscribed for, and there were issued to him, ten shares of stock in said association. Subsequently two of said shares were surrendered, and they figure in no manner in this controversy, and we shall treat the matter as a subscription for eight shares. Upon these shares he contracted to make monthly payments at the rate of 60 cents upon each share until the stock matures. Cairns did not apply for a loan until more than a year thereafter, and the loan was not actually made until March 8, 1890. All payments up to that time had been kept up. Consequently there had been paid upon said eight shares, before the loan was made, the sum of $67.20. From the time the loan was made until the insolvency of the association the stock payments were regularly made. This included all payments up to and including October, 1895. Hence he paid upon his stock, after the loan, the further sum of $321.60; and of this amount one half, or $160.80, was paid upon stock held by the association as collateral security for the bonus or premium. The interest upon the loan of $400 was also paid monthly in advance, and amounted during said term to $134. For what amount of the sums so paid should the respondents receive credit?

This question has received very different answers at the hands of different courts. It has never yet been answered by this court. It has been held that a proper and equitable adjustment, in cases where the association has become insolvent and unable to mature its stock, is to charge the borrowing member with the amount of money received, with legal interest thereon, and credit him with all that he has paid, "whether paid as fines, penalties, or dues." Strauss v. Carolina Interstate Bldg. & L. Assn. 117 N. C. 308, 30 L. R. A. 693; Thompson v. North Carolina Bldg. & L. Assn. 120 N. C. 420; Buist v. Bryan, 44 S. C. 121, 29 L. R. A. 127. See also Rochester Sav. Bank v. Whitmore, 25 App. Div. 491. In this case the question was presented in an involved form, and just what the court decided is not clear. Respondent also cites in this connection Randall v. National Bldg. L. & Protective Union, 42 Neb. 809, 29 L. R. A. 133. But in that case the association involved was, so far as the record discloses, an entirely solvent corporation; and under such circumstances there can be no injustice in crediting a borrowing member, who chooses to surrender the stock pledged, with all that he has paid thereon. This rule has been frequently applied in Pennsylvania. Spring Garden Loan Assn. v. Tradesmen's Sav. Fund & L. Assn. 46 Pa. 493; Watkins v. Workingmen's Bldg. & L. Assn. 97 Pa. 514. But that a different rule, as to credits to be given, should be applied in solvent and insolvent corporations is, we think, entirely clear. The rule is universal that when a corporation becomes insolvent there must be, or at least there may be, a loss to the stockholder. And, from their very nature, the certainty of loss in case of an insolvent building and loan association is greater than in many other forms of investment. They deal only with their members. Their capital consists exclusively of sums paid by their members. They cannot become insolvent in fact without an impairment of that capital, and, if there be an impairment, then the full amount of capital paid in cannot be returned. That being true, every principle of their organization requires that every dollar of capital that has been paid in upon stock subscriptions should bear its proportionate share of the loss. In Endlich, Bldg. Asso. § 514, it is said: "The truth is that there is implied, in the very essence of the building association scheme, an agreement between the members of every association, in the light of which all other agreements, and all rules and by-laws, must be read, and to which they must be conformed; and that is the agreement that all burdens shall be equally borne, as well as all profits equally shared,—that the whole enterprise shall be conducted and the rights and obligations of the participants in it shall be adjusted upon a basis of strict mutuality, equality, and fairness." It is evident that if, in cases of the insolvency of the association, all the borrowing stockholders are to be credited on their indebtedness with all the capital they have paid in, they suffer none of the impairment, and ultimately the entire loss must be borne by the nonborrowing members, and thus the basis of strict mutuality of burdens is entirely disregarded. Equity cannot, therefore, under such circumstances extend to the debtor credit for all he has paid upon his stock. This we think is the rule of the authorities, as well as of reason. Eversmann v. Schmitt, 53 Ohio St. 174, 29 L. R. A. 184; Wohlford v. Citizens' Bldg. L. & Sav. Asso. 140 Ind. 662, 29 L. R. A. 177; Weir v. Granite State Provident Asso. 56 N. J. Eq. 234; Moran v. Gray, (N. J. Eq.) 38 Atl. 668; Curtis v. Granite State Provident Asso. 69 Conn. 6; Strohen v. Franklin Sav. Fund & L. Asso. 115 Pa. 273; Post v. Mechanics' Bldg. & L. Asso. 97 Tenn. 408, 34 L. R. A. 201.

But, viewing respondents in the light of borrowers only, and turning to the contract, we learn that, for the privilege of receiving the loan, respondents agreed to pay a premium of an amount equal to the cash received. That agreement was made by reason of the inducements held out by appellant, to the effect that both loan and premium could ultimately be paid by a surrender and cancellation of the stock when it reached par, and that the stock could be brought to that condition by small payments thereon at stated intervals, together with the profits that would accrue to such stock through the operations of the association. But the association, by reason of its insolvency, is unable to carry out its contract. It cannot mature the stock. The inducement which caused the respondent to offer the large premium has failed. Hence, whatever has been paid upon such premium, if anything, should be credited to respondents. This we think is the better rule, and it is amply sustained by the authorities last cited, although some courts have undertaken to apportion the premium, and treat a portion of it as earned. See Towle v. American Bldg. Loan & Invest. Soc. 61 Fed. Rep. 446; Sullivan v. Stucky, 86 Fed. Rep. 491. But, under what we regard as the better rule, respondents claim that they should be credited with the dues paid upon the shares of stock that were assigned as collateral to the payment of the premium. (It will be remembered that the premium was included in the bond, but drew no interest.) We held in the Shain Case—and the authorities fully sustain the proposition—that payments made upon stock that was pledged as collateral security for the payment of the loan did not constitute payments upon the loan. This was held upon the theory that the purchase of the stock and the borrowing of the money were distinct and separate transactions. The stock was purchased as an investment, and for the profits which it promised, and these profits inure to the benefit of the purchaser alike whether the stock be pledged or unpledged. Goodrich v. City Loan & Bldg. Asso. 54 Ga. 98. True, in the ultimate adjustment it was the intention to exchange the stock for the bond. But, in the language of the New Jersey court of errors and appeals in State, Washington Bldg. & L. Asso., v. Hornbacker, 42 N. J. L. 635, "until so exchanged, they are distinct in legal contemplation as well as in form. The stock is a collateral security for, and not a credit on, the bond." No reason, in law or logic, presents itself to us, why the same rule must not apply to payments made upon stock that is pledged to secure the payment of the premium. Such payments on stock are not payments upon the premium. Hence in this case nothing has been paid upon the premium bid, and there is therefore nothing in that behalf with which to credit respondents. It will be noticed that in this case appellant is not seeking to recover any of the premium. He asks only the payment of the cash advanced, with certain interest thereon, and taxes paid. The association having become insolvent and having been in the hands of a receiver, it becomes the duty of that officer to proceed to collect the assets of the association. It is his duty to close the business out. The expectations of both parties have been disappointed. The contract is at an end. The interest upon this loan was paid, under the terms of the contract, to November 8, 1895. The appellant is entitled to recover the original loan, with the legal rate of interest in Minnesota, which is 7 per cent, from said November 8, 1895. Should respondents pay this amount, or should it be realized upon a sale of the mortgaged property, respondents will, of course, become the absolute owners of the shares of stock which were assigned as collateral security, and will be entitled to a reassignment thereof. There is a claim made for taxes for the sum of $18.80, which the court found were paid by plaintiff, and which should also be included in the judgment.

The trial court will set aside its judgment heretofore entered in this case, and enter judgment against the respondent Ella Cairns for the amount heretofore indicated, with the usual decree of foreclosure as to all the respondents. It is so ordered.

Reversed.

v.

Levi HEY.

(.....Ohio.....)

*1. The right of trial by jury is a subject-matter of general legislation, and laws affecting it must be uniform in operation throughout the state. Const. art. 2, § 26.

2. A statute by the provisions of which the parties to a suit in which the issues are of right triable by jury are deemed to have waived the right, unless a certain time before the term at which the issues are, by the laws of the state, required to be made up, a demand is made for a jury, attended with a deposit of a certain sum of money for the benefit of the jury fund, affects the right of trial by jury, and must be uniform in its operation. The Cuyahoga county jury law, adopted May 19, 1894 (91 Laws, p. 793), is, in substance, such a law, and, being limited in its operation to Cuyahoga county, is invalid.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Cuyahoga County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the contract price of certain iron sold and delivered. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. C. Rogers, for plaintiffs in error:

The so-called Cuyahoga county jury law is unconstitutional. It applies only to a certain limited class, in only one county of the state, and is on a general subject.

Minshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The suit below was brought in the common pleas court of Cuyahoga county by Levi Hey against the defendants, Silberman & Co., to recover a balance due on an account for certain iron sold and delivered. The latter claimed that the iron was not of the quality ordered, and also claimed damages in the sum of $100. The amount claimed by the plaintiff was $181.95. The issues having been made up, when the case came on for trial the defendants demanded a jury, which was denied them, under the provisions of what is termed the "Cuyahoga County Jury Law" which was passed and took effect May 19, 1894 (91 Laws, p. 793). In this case, according to this law, the defendants, to be entitled to a jury, should have demanded a jury, in writing, at least five days before the commencement of the term after the issues should have been made up according to the statutes of the state, and have deposited with the clerk $5, to be appropriated to the payment of jury fees. This was not done, but under the general law of the state the defendants were entitled to a jury without having filed such written demand, or making the deposit of any sum whatever.

The plaintiffs in error claim that the statute under which they were denied a jury trial is unconstitutional, and that the judgment should be reversed for this, among other reasons. We entertain no doubt of the invalidity of this law. It is true that there is an attempt to give it the character of a general one, by making it applicable to "all counties which now contain, or which may contain a city of the second grade of the first class." But, if its subject-matter is not a proper subject of local legislation, this attempt to give it the form of a general law can be of no avail, as has been frequently decided by this court. It is manifestly a local law, intended to apply to Cuyahoga county, and can apply to no other. The Constitution (art. 2, § 26) requires that all laws of a general nature shall be uniform in their operation throughout the state, and it is well settled that the "general nature" of a law must be determined by its subject-matter. If this be general, the law must be general, but, if the subject-matter be of a local nature, a local law applicable to the subject-matter may be enacted. But as to the nature of the subject-matter the legislature is not the exclusive judge. If it were otherwise, then this important provision of the Constitution would be little more than directory, instead of mandatory, as it undoubtedly is. The greatest respect will always be given the determination of the legislature in enacting the law, but, where its validity is properly challenged on this ground, it is the duty of the court to pass on it; and if clearly satisfied that the provision has been violated, in making that a local, which should have been, if enacted at all, a general, law, it is within the power of the court, and its duty, to declare it invalid. It is sometimes a question of some nicety to distinguish between that which is local and that which is general, as regards the subject-matter of a law; and, where there is room for a fair difference of opinion in regard to it, the doubt arising from such difference should be resolved in favor of the law. In this case we are unable to perceive any ground for such a difference. There is probably in the entire field of legislation no subject of a more general nature, undoubtedly none of more general interest, than the right of trial by jury. It is regarded as a birthright of Englishmen, and among American citizens as one of their constitutional guaranties. It is guaranteed to all the citizens of this state by the provision of its Constitution, that the right shall be "inviolable." At the adoption of the Constitution of Ohio, every litigant in a suit such as that between the parties below had a right to demand a jury trial without depositing any sum of money or making the demand at any particular period before the case was called for trial; and this remains so in every county in the state, except that of Cuyahoga, if the act above referred to is a valid law. No local circumstances are suggested for this difference, and we are unable to conceive of any. If, in suits where less than $300 are demanded, or on appeal from the probate court, or from the docket of a justice of the peace, public policy requires that the right to a jury should be made to depend upon a demand therefor made a certain time before the issues should have been made up, and the deposit of a certain sum of money with the clerk of the court, what reason of a local nature exists, why this should be so in Cuyahoga county, that does not exist in any or all the counties of the state? No answer suggests itself to this question that would not also permit of a difference in the law of procedure, or of a variety on many other subjects of legislation that have heretofore been universally regarded as of a general nature. Undoubtedly there is more litigation in a large county like Cuyahoga than in some others. But this difference can be, and has been, provided for by increasing the judicial force of the subdivision in which the county is situated.

It is claimed that this law should be sustained on the authority of McGill v. State, 34 Ohio St. 228. That case, when examined, will be found to relate to an enactment quite different from the one before us in this case. It does not in any way affect the right of trial by jury. It simply provides a mode for the return of the names of electors for jury service in Cuyahoga county, different from the general law. The mode of selecting electors for jury service has never been regarded as an essential element in the right of trial by jury. Different modes have been adopted and prevailed at different times. In fact, as pointed out by the learned judge delivering the opinion in the case, the general law at that time was not uniform in its provisions on the subject; the selection being, in general, made by the trustees of the townships, acting as judges of election, and in other cases by town council, thus adapting its provisions to local requirements. Local circumstances, such as the situation of large cities, with their corrupting influences, in certain counties, may, in the interest of a fair and impartial jury trial, make the selection of electors for jury service a matter of local concern, and require legislation not required in, and inapplicable to, the other counties of the state. This was the view taken by the court in deciding the case. It adjudged that a special law, under such circumstances, was proper, and sustained the act in question. Our Constitution does not require all laws to be uniform in their operation throughout the state. The requirement simply embraces all laws of a general nature clearly implying that those not of a general nature need not operate uniformly throughout the state. Conceding the case of McGill v. State to have been rightly decided, —and there is no purpose here to question it. —still it must, as we think, readily appear from what has been said that it does not control this case. The law here in question affects the right of trial by jury,—a subject of general interest throughout the state. The law considered in the McGill Case simply affects the mode of selecting electors for jury service; and in this regard local circumstances may, in the interests of the integrity of the system, require special legislation. Judgment reversed, and new trial granted.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Oregon, Appt.,
v.
George RENICK, Respnt.

(.....Or.....)

A person cannot be himself a false token so as to be indictable for obtaining money by means of a false token and false pretenses, when he procures money from a woman by a promise of marriage and by offering himself to her under a fictitious name, and by falsely stating that he is unmarried.

(February 28, 1899.)

A PPEAL by the state from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County sustaining a demurrer to an indictment charging defendant with having obtained money from another by means of a false token. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. O. M. Idleman, Attorney General, and Charles F. Lord, for appellant:

George Renick, the defendant, by appearing and representing himself to be Charles Smith, and a single man, and of marriageable age, is a false token within § 1372 of our Code.

Bouvier defines a token "as a document or sign of the existence of a fact."

Section 1372 of Hill's Annotated Code provides that, "upon a trial for having, by any false pretense, obtained the signature of any person to any written instrument, or obtained from any person any valuable thing, no evidence can be admitted of a false pretense expressed orally and unaccompanied by a false token or writing."

The man represented himself to be that which he was not, and presenting himself in the assumed character and under false colors, forestalled inquiry; his presence in the assumed character was the very pretense or token which caused the complainant in this case to part with her money.

NOTE.—On the general subject of false pretenses, see note to Barton v. People (Ill.) 10 L. R. A. 302.

Messrs. Stott, Boise, & Stout, for respondent:

Mere words are neither symbols nor tokens, and what a man says about himself does not make him a false token, or a token of any kind.

2 Bishop, Crim. L. 5th ed. §§ 145, 155; Com. v. Warren, 6 Mass. 72; People v. Gates, 13 Wend. 311.

Wolverton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The indictment in this case charges, in substance, that the defendant, George Renick, did on the 10th day of November, 1896, in Multnomah county, Oregon, wilfully and feloniously, with intent to defraud, by means of a certain false token, to wit, himself, the said George Renick, falsely and fraudulently present himself, the said George Renick, and represent and pretend to one Carrie Meyer, an unmarried woman, that he, the said George Renick, was one Charles Smith, that he was unmarried, and competent and in a position to lawfully contract marriage with her, whereas, in truth and in fact, the said George Renick was not Charles Smith, and was not then unmarried, but had a lawful wife then living, by means of which false token, fraudulent pretense, and false representations, coupled with a promise to marry her, the said Carrie Meyer, he, the said George Renick, did then and there obtain of Carrie Meyer divers gold coins, of the value of $190. A demurrer to this indictment was sustained, and the state appeals. It is claimed that the money was obtained by false pretenses, through and by the use of a false token, and that the use by defendant of himself as such false token was sufficient in law to constitute the offense. This presents the only question to be determined.

There was a species of cheat or fraud at common law which was effectual through the use of deceitful or illegal symbols or tokens, such as were calculated to affect the public at large, and against which common prudence could not have guarded. It was not sufficient upon which to found the offense if a mere privy token was employed,—a counterfeit letter in another person's name, or a private check upon a bank in which the drawer had no funds (Lara's Case, 2 Leach, C. L. 647, 652), and the like,—not having the semblance of public authenticity or purporting to be of public consequence, such as spurious money of the realm or bank notes circulating throughout the community as a medium of exchange. But by Stat. 33 Hen. VIII. chap. 1, the obtaining goods by means of false privy tokens, counterfeit letters, etc., is expressly made an indictable offense, and this, Mr. Bishop says, has now become common law with us. 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 571. But as it regards privy tokens, at least, this statute has always been considered as creating a new offense. People v. Stone, 9 Wend. 182. Another species of cheat or fraud at common law was accomplished through the false personation of another. 2 Russell, Crimes, pp. 10, 11. Perhaps the commonly accepted definition of a "common-law cheat is that it is a fraud . . . [wrought by] some false symbol or token, of a nature against which common prudence cannot guard, to the injury of one in some pecuniary interest." 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 571; 2 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 1116; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1025. But Russell, in his work on Crimes, gives it a wider signification, and defines it as "the fraudulent obtaining the property of another, by any deceitful and illegal practice or token (short of felony) which affects or may affect the public." 2 Russell, Crimes, p. 613. See also 1 Bouvier, Law Dict. p. 317. Under this definition, the cheat need not necessarily be accomplished through the use of a symbol or token, and cases are cited by the learned author, in connection with the definition, which would seem to support his enlarged conception of it. Some cases are cited by Bishop, as King v. Jones, 1 Leach, C. L. 174, wherein an apprentice got himself enlisted as a soldier, and thus obtained a bounty, by professing that there was no impediment; and Rees v. Hanson, Sayer, 229, wherein a woman was indicted for getting board and lodging by falsely affirming herself to be single and of the name of Fuller, when she was married and of the name of Hanson. And it is supposed by the author that the boy in the one case and the woman in the other were tokens, and therefore that those cases were disposed of upon that ground only. But, when they are looked into, it does not appear that the decisions were based upon that theory. Indeed, they are so meagerly reported that it is difficult to determine what was the specific ground of their disposal. The broader definition of Russell and Bouvier of a "cheat" at common law would undoubtedly include the offense, as it was in either instance a deceitful practice. In the case of the boy, it was a wilful misrepresentation touching his age and apprenticeship; and of the woman, a wrongful personation of another. There is an old case of Queen v. Macarty, 6 Mod. 301, wherein it was charged that Macarty, one of the defendants, falsely represented himself to be a broker, and Fordenborough, the other of such defendants, falsely pretended to be a merchant of London, and as such traded in Portugal wines, and that, through such pretensions and representations, they induced one Chown to barter a quantity of hats for a quantity of a spurious and unwholesome wine represented to be good and wholesome Portuguese wine. In deciding the case upon exceptions to the indictment, Holt, Ch. J., says: "The crime is not the selling one thing for 44 L. R. A.

another, but here is a false token, the one pretending to be a broker and the other a merchant, and a combination to cheat." Rees v. Govers, Sayer, 206, is another old case wherein the defendant was indicted for falsely assuming to be a merchant, and producing divers counterfeit commissions purporting to be from Spain, and thereby induced another person to extend him credit. Upon a rule to show cause why judgment should not be arrested, Ryder, Ch. J., said: "The present case is much stronger than that of Queen v. Macarty, inasmuch as the defendant, besides pretending to be a merchant, did produce several paper writings, which he affirmed to be letters containing commissions to him as a merchant." Mr. Russell pertinently remarks, of the first of these cases, that the true ground of the judgment was that it was a case of conspiracy, and this was another species of cheat at common law; and of the second, that the cheat was effected by means of a forgery, which was in itself a substantive offense, indictable at common law. The forgery, if successful, was indictable as a common-law cheat. The broader definition alluded to would include these offenses also, without going to the extent of holding that the defendants themselves were tokens. But, whatever may be the rule and definition touching the common-law cheat, the statutes of England early began to distinguish between the different species of cheat, and to carve out a distinct offense for obtaining money or property by falsely personating another. Such an offense has been widely adopted in the American states, and our own statute has made the act punishable. Hill's (Or.) Anno. Laws, § 1776. The statute has also made it an offense for any person to obtain, or attempt to obtain, with intent to defraud, any money or property whatever, by any false pretense, or by any privy or false token. Id. § 1777. The evidentiary matter necessary to support a charge under the latter section must consist of a false token or writing accompanying the pretense. Id. § 1372. Construing the two sections together, the crime known to our statute is much the same as that constituted by 33 Hen. VIII., which extended the common-law cheat so as to include one accomplished through the use of a false privy token or counterfeit letter. The two offenses are defined, however, and made separate and distinct, by statute, so that there need be no longer a question, as under the common law, as to whether, in the false personation of another, the person engaging in the deceit is himself a false token. It is made a crime to so act, and a case coming fairly within the statute, it is thought, could not be prosecuted under the section for obtaining money under false pretenses. The case at bar, however, is probably not a false personation, by reason of the fact that the defendant did not assume to represent a real personage, but only made use of a fictitious name, having no application to anyone.

But it is contended that he is guilty of a false pretense by the use of himself as a token. If that were so, he must be regarded as a privy token, as his personation was not calculated, nor was it his purpose, to deceive or impose upon the public in general; the fraud being an imposition upon an individual only, and not extending to the injury of the public, in the sense of a public cheat. In the Jones Case, 1 Leach, C. L. 174, the personation was of a class capable of enlistment in the public service, and the act operated as a fraud in the procurement of public moneys. So, in Rea v. Hanson, Sayer, 229, the woman obtained general credit by pretending to be unmarried, thus affecting the public. Mr. Wharton puts a case: "If a pretender (e. g. Perkin Warbeck, or the Tichbourne claimant) palm himself off on a community as another person, and, under the guise of his assumed character, obtain credit from the public at large, he is indictable as a cheat, assuming that he imposes upon persons who have no notice that his claims are disputed, and also addresses his imposture to the public at large. The offense is then one aimed at the public generally, and is, supposing there is no notice to put others on their guard, aimed as much at the careful as the careless. Hence it is a cheat at common law." "But suppose," says the learned author, a little further on, "the pretender goes simply to an individual, and with that individual uses his pretended character as a basis for getting money, while there is nothing about the pretender's appearance or general reputation to sustain such character. In such case, there being no latency, since there is a direct subject tendered to the prosecutor on which to make inquiry, and the fraud being pointed at a single individual, it is not a cheat at common law." 2 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 1124. Thus is characterized the distinguishing feature between a token of public import and a privy token or symbol, and the effect of their use in the consummation of the common-law cheat, and it serves as an admirable aid in determining the nature of the supposed token used in the consummation of the offense charged. If, therefore, in the case at bar, the supposed token is a token at all, it should be termed a privy token. But is the defendant himself even so much a privy token? Within Stat. 33 Hen. VIII., such a token was taken to denote "a false mark or sign, forged object, counterfeit letter, Key ring, etc., used to deceive persons, and thereby fraudulently get possession of property." Black, Law Dict. See also note to Com. v. Speer, 2 Va. Cas. 67. Mere words are neither symbols nor tokens. Hence it has been held that one who obtains a credit by falsely representing himself to be in trade, and keeping a grocery, utters a mere falsehood. Com. v. Warren, 6 Mass. 72. So, if one falsely pretends to another that he has been sent by a third person for money, and obtains it (Queen v. Grantham, 11 Mod. 222); or, in selling a horse he knows to be blind, wilfully represents him to be sound (State v. Delyon, 1 Bay. 353); or if he knowingly disposes of wrought gold under the sterling alloy for gold of standard weight (Rea v. Boicer, 1 Cowp. 323). In these and like cases the defendant but utters a naked falsehood, unconfirmed by symbol or token, and was not within Stat. 33 Hen. VIII. In the case of Com. v. Warren, 6 Mass. 72, the defendant represented his name to be William Waterman, and that he lived in Salem; and the court said respecting it that, "if a man will give credit to the false affirmation of another, and thereby suffer himself to be cheated, he may pursue a civil remedy for the injury, but he cannot prosecute by indictment."

Now, were the representations which the defendant made to the prosecutrix more than wicked falsehoods, under our statute? or may it be affirmed that his presence when uttering the falsehoods was the exhibition of a false privy token, which induced her to part with her money and assisted him in consummating the fraud? It was a matter susceptible of proof and demonstration, upon inquiry, for she was not bound to take his word touching his assertions that he was an unmarried man or that his name was Smith. His physical presence had no tendency to establish the one fact or the other, and was therefore not an agent, in the sense of a token or symbol, in consummating the deception and accomplishing the fraud. He may have been both a liar, and the symbol of a liar, but he himself, considered as a token, did not contribute, by reason of his personal appearance, to the deception. By the statutes of England and many states of the Union, the element of a false token or symbol is eliminated, and the law is broadly cast that whoever, by any false pretense, obtains money, etc., with intent to defraud, shall be guilty of the offense. The case of Reg. v. Jennison, 9 Cox. C. C. 158, is cited, wherein it appears that the defendant was indicted for having obtained money from an unmarried woman on the false representation that he was a single man, that he would furnish a house with the money, and would then marry her, and it was held that the false representation that he was not a married man was sufficient to support a conviction for false pretenses. But the authority is not in point, as the decision was made under the enlarged English statutes, and the question of a token did not enter into the controversy. Under our statute, the pretense must be accompanied with a false token, and the question presented here is whether defendant was himself a false privy token. We think he was not. He did not attempt to assimilate anything in existence. There are no personal or physical characteristics known to social science whereby an unmarried man may be distinguished from one that is married. So that if a man presents his physical self to another person, and says nothing of his marital state, no one can say whether he at that instant is married or single, from the inspection alone. Testimony must be produced dehors the person from which to determine the fact. If he says that his name is Charles Smith, a fictitious character, and that he was unmarried, when he had a wife living, this is a mere descriptio personæ, and an inspection of the person will neither corroborate nor detract from the statement. If he be denominated a "token," and that token is false, it is only made so by the lie he has uttered; his physical existence does not help to establish it. In other words, he has not assimilated anything of real existence whereby the unwary have been deceived. He did utter a wicked falsehood, and this is a false pretense, but the false token is wanting, and therefore the indictment does not charge a crime. It is necessary to specify the false token in the indictment (2 Wharton, Crim. Law, § 1129), and this the state has not done.

The judgment of the court below will therefore be affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

CHESTER TRACTION COMPANY et al.
v.
PHILADELPHIA, WILMINGTON, & BALTIMORE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(188 Pa. 105.)

1. A crossing by a street railway of the tracks of a steam railroad at grade should not be permitted under a statute forbidding it when it is reasonably practicable to avoid it where an overhead crossing would cost only $150,000 to $200,000, although the capital of the street railway is only $500,000, if it expects to carry 3,000,000 passengers annually and passenger trains on the railroad average one in fourteen minutes.
2. An imperious necessity for an additional crossing by a street railway of the tracks of a steam railroad at grade is not shown by the fact that traffic has so increased that its present crossings are not sufficient to enable it to quickly move its cars.

(October 17, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Delaware County in favor of plaintiffs in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from interfering with plaintiffs' attempt to lay street railway tracks across defendant's road at grade. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John B. Hannum and John G. Johnson for appellant.

Mr. W. B. Broomall, for appellees:

A court of equity will not under the act of June 19, 1871, decree the construction of an overhead crossing where the cost of such crossing would be so great as to prevent the construction of the railroad.

Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 160 Pa. 277.

The city ratified its consent to the Union Railway Company to maintain its railway not only in the streets contained in the original route, but also those thereafter to be occupied, by the ordinances of September 4, 1890, and October 7, 1890.

A municipality may ratify a previous doubtful consent.

Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 160 Pa. 277.

As to the right to compensation for such a crossing, see Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. West Chicago Street R. Co. (Ill.) 29 L. R. A. 485, and note.

Where the charter route of a street railway is assailed as open to objection it does not stand the railway company in hand to make such objection, but the commonwealth alone can be heard to make it in the interest of the general public.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Greensburg, J. & P. Street R. Co. 176 Pa. 559, 36 L. R. A. 839.

The ordinance of March 18, 1890, requires the railway to be constructed on Welsh street at grade. It cannot be made at any other place because the charter route does not admit of it. It cannot be made an overhead or subway crossing because the municipal consent does not admit of it.

The court has found in this case that the necessity for the crossing is imperative.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of Chester, fronting on the Delaware river, has a population of about 25,000. Beginning at or near the river, about forty-five streets run north, intersecting other streets and avenues running east and west. The Philadelphia, Wilmington, & Baltimore steam railroad crosses the city at grade from east to west, and therefore is crossed by all the north and south streets of the city,—among them, Welsh street. For many years the railroad company maintained two tracks through the city, and at the commencement of these proceedings was constructing and about to lay down the rails on two more. By ordinances duly enacted, the city granted to the Union Railway Company the right to occupy with its railway certain streets, among them Welsh street, from Fourth to Sixth. Afterwards the Chester Traction Company became the lessee of the Union, and claimed all the rights and privileges of the lessor company. It attempted, under the consent of the city, theretofore granted, to lay its tracks on Welsh street, thereby crossing the steam railroad at grade. The latter resisted, and thereupon the plaintiffs filed this bill to enjoin defendant from any interference. The bill averred its charter and lease, the consent of the city, and the necessity of the grade crossing in conducting its business in accordance with the terms of its charter. The defendant denied the legal right of the Chester Traction Company, under its grant, to occupy the street at all; further, denied that it was a necessity to the company to cross at grade at that point. After full hearing, the court below, in opinion filed, ruled in favor of plaintiffs in the issue on both points, and directed an injunction to issue. From that decree we have this appeal by defendant, assigning for error the findings of fact and conclusions of law by the court below.

Without at present noticing the assignment averring an absence of corporate right to lay its rails, by reason of the facts on which the charter was founded, not existing at the date of the grant, we take up the one averring there is no necessity for the crossing of Welsh street at grade. The learned judge of the court below says: "We also find, as a fact admitted by the respondents, that there is no other practicable manner by which the railway can cross the railroad at Welsh street, except at grade. We also find that the proposed crossing is imperatively demanded and required by public convenience and is necessary to relieve the congestion of public travel at the railway crossing at Market street, one square of about 395 feet, south of Welsh street." [6 Del. Co. Rep. 484]. So far as we can discover in the record, there is no such admission by defendant. It is possible, counsel for defendant (although the record does not show it) made such admission at the hearing, or in the argument in the court below. If so, he made no such admission before us; on the contrary, based his argument, in large measure, on a denial of these facts. The averments in the answer to the bill are as follows: "... Further, that, admitting that there is no other practicable manner by which the railway of the plaintiff can cross the tracks of the defendant at Welsh street except at grade, yet the defendant avers that there are other practicable methods by which the said railway company can cross the tracks of the said defendant at other points, where the danger of the grade crossing at this particular locality might be avoided. Said defendant, however, denies that there is no other practicable mode by which the railway of the plaintiff can be constructed on Welsh street, and avers that the said railway can be constructed to cross the tracks of the said defendant either above or below grade." This is not, to our minds, an admission of the fact, but an assumption of it for the sake of the argument, and then an attempt to demonstrate that, even if such facts existed, there ought not to be a grade crossing at that point, because such crossing was not necessary to the transaction of the company's business. Let us examine first the facts which should deter these parties from constructing a grade crossing at this point. One hundred scheduled passenger trains pass daily on the steam road. This would be an average of one every fourteen minutes of the twenty-four hours. No witness will undertake to give the number of freight trains, because they run irregularly; but on a main line between two such cities as Philadelphia and Baltimore the number must be very great, and possibly equals that of passenger trains. The use of this particular part of the track is great, because of the location of defendant's freight warehouse near it, thus necessitating the cutting out and shifting of cars from trains. The view of the approaches of Welsh street from the steam railroad is obstructed, because of buildings on the sides of the streets. As to the extent of the use that would be made of the electric road at the crossings, we adopt the statement of its president, Mr. Lindsey. He says the purpose of the Welsh street crossing is to lessen the heavy traffic on Market street crossing, over which all the cars of all the companies now cross, except one line, which crosses at Morton avenue; that pretty close to 3,000,000 passengers are carried over the Market street crossing yearly. But one conclusion can reasonably be formed from these undisputed facts. A grade crossing is highly dangerous to the traveling public on both roads. All precautions taken to avoid danger serve only to lessen it. The millions of passengers on the two roads are at the risk of the few railroad servants who have charge of them. Recklessness, negligence, indifference, or dullness on part of the servant will still endanger life and limb of the passenger. While we are writing this opinion: we have the news of the Cohoes accident, where the steam road was crossed at grade by the electric. Every passenger in the electric car goes into one or the other of the two classes, of sixteen killed and seventeen injured. The servants of each system attribute the accident to the negligence of those of the other. Increasing the number of crossings only increases the danger, by increasing the chances for collision. That this crossing is especially perilous follows, because of the infrequent use of that particular spot of ground by both roads.

This brings before us the 2d section of the act of June 19, 1871: "If in the judgment of such court it is reasonably practicable to avoid a grade crossing, they shall by their process prevent a crossing at grade." The meaning of this, as we decided in Perry County R. Extension Co. v. Newport & S. Valley R. Co. 150 Pa. 193, is that the day of grade crossings is past, and they ought not to be permitted, except in case of imperious necessity. It is said by Paxson, Ch. J., in that case, that in the earlier period of railroad construction the desire of the people for railroads tended to close their eyes to the danger. The traffic was light, and trains ran at long intervals. But "the rapid development of the country, the enormous growth in wealth, population, and business, has materially changed the relations of railroads to the public and to each other." In every case which has come before this court since (Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Braddock Electric R. Co. 152 Pa. 116; Altoona & P. Connecting R. Co. v. Tyrone & C. R. Co. 160 Pa. 623; Scranton & P. Traction Co. v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 180 Pa. 636, and others), we have strictly adhered to this construction of the act. And we have further held that what was reasonably practicable was not to be determined by the financial ability of the road seeking to cross, but by the physical practicability of avoiding the grade crossing. The plaintiff was shown by competent witnesses that the expense, approximately, of avoiding this grade crossing by one overhead, would be from $150,000 to $200,000, while the entire capital stock of the corporation is but $500,000. But the financial inability of the company is not a test to determine whether an improvement to carry safely 3,000,000 passengers is reasonably practicable; otherwise, the poorer the company, the more unlimited its right to interfere with the exercise by the older company of its franchise, and the more freely can it disregard the safety of the traveling public. A corporation which undertakes to carry safely 3,000,000 passengers should provide a capital sufficient to build a superstructure which will not subject this multitude to avoidable risk at a crossing. The city of Philadelphia is built on low, flat ground, probably not essentially different from that on which Chester city is located. The same Delaware river washes its eastern boundary. Yet it avoids grade crossings—not one or two, but dozens of them—by over or under structures. True, the expense is very great, and very much greater than if the grade crossings had never been permitted; but the fact that two steam roads reach the very center of the city, and that every street on their route will soon cross under or over them, demonstrates that it is reasonably practicable to avoid them under the most unfavorable circumstances. We think, on the undisputed facts, proved by the plaintiffs themselves, an overhead crossing was reasonably practicable, and the court below should have so found.

But the plaintiff already has two grade crossings—one at Market and one at Potter street. By the increase of the city's population and business there has been a great increase of travel. As a consequence, the two grade crossings are not of sufficient capacity to enable the electric railway to quickly move its cars. But that does not constitute "imperious necessity." Grade crossings are not to be established to promote the mere convenience of the railroad seeking to cross. The older company still has some rights under its charter, and the presumption always is that, as between senior and junior grants, the legislature did not intend that the later should interfere with the older. The legislature, by giving the right to cross at grade, could not have intended to seriously disturb or destroy the older franchise. Yet the able counsel for appellees does not shrink from the inevitable conclusion which follows his premise, for we quote the exact language of his argument: "As the population of Chester increases, and the travel upon these street railways increase, it is necessary to have additional facilities in crossing appellant's railroad. This railroad runs through the middle of Chester. The lines which have been built, extending to the upper part of the city, and extending also to the boroughs of Upland, Media, and Darby, require additional means of crossing this railroad. It is to provide for this increased traffic that the crossing at this point [Edgmont Avenue], and the crossing at Welsh street, a square eastwardly from this point, has been proposed." That is, as travel increases on the electric railways, the number of grade crossings will be limited only by the action of city councils. Eventually there might be forty-five,—one for every north and south street. But, stimulated by like causes, travel and traffic on the steam road would also increase, and we would have the result of two railways wanting to occupy the same narrow strip across the city at the same time almost every minute of the day. Nor does the fact that heavy damages may be exacted by the passenger as a penalty for neglect to carry safely have much weight in the determination of the question. Admit that a collision would cost one or the other company, or both, a heavy sum. That would mean a loss of dividends to the company, and a loss of life or limbs to the traveling public. The risks are not equal, and humanity shrinks from offsetting the one against the other. Besides, by unnecessarily crossing at grade, the older corporation has imposed upon it a heavier burden than that which, in strictness, was incident to its grant. In addition to its obligation to carry safely on its own contract, it must be watchful that it does not injure those of the public carried by another corporation across its roadbed. It cannot be maintained that such results as we have mentioned would not seriously impair the value of the older franchise. We appreciate fully the difficulties of the situation. The electric railway, for the successful prosecution of its growing business, demands increased facilities for conducting it. If these facilities are to be obtained by additional inexpensive grade crossings, it not only largely increases the peril of the public, but seriously obstructs the older company in the exercise of its franchise rights. Proper overhead crossings involve an increase of capital stock, on which, probably, there could be no returns without increased fares to the public, or a construction out of gross receipts, which means indefinite postponement of dividends to the present shareholders. But the difficulty is not the creation of either corporation. The demands of the public have simply outgrown anything that could have been foreseen when the charters were granted, and when the exercise of their franchises were regulated by law. While everyone admits that existing grade crossings ought to be abolished and no further ones, except in the rarest cases, permitted, the existing legislation does not provide means equitably adequate to the end. More than once this court has called attention to the necessity of such legislation; but nothing has ever been added to the provisions of the act of 1871, which, as a solution of the difficulty, is, in effect, a mandate to the courts to prohibit grade crossings, unless over or under ones are physically impracticable, and unless crossings be an imperious necessity. The courts have no power to determine exactly how they shall be avoided, or to equitably apportion the expense among those interested, as under the New York statute lately adopted. So we must administer law as we find it, and not as we think it ought to be. We are of opinion the decree, on both grounds, should be reversed. First, an overhead crossing is reasonably practical; second, no imperious necessity demanding additional crossings is shown.

As to the question raised from the fact that the Chester Street-Railway Company, under a prior grant, had already laid a track upon Second street, when the Union Railway obtained its charter for a route on the same street, in violation of the law of its creation, we do not pass upon it here. The case is ruled on the other questions. And while we do not doubt our authority, in a collateral proceeding, to pass upon the question as to whether the charter of the Union is wholly nugatory, we see no reason why we should unnecessarily exercise that authority in this case.

The decree of the court below is reversed, and injunction dissolved, at costs of appellees.

POST PRINTING & PUBLISHING COMPANY

v.

INSURANCE COMPANY OF NORTH AMERICA, Appt.

(189 Pa. 300.)

The cost to the purchaser in possession, and not to the seller who attempted to retain a secret lien for the purchase money, is the value of property which must be paid by an insurer under a policy stating that the loss is payable to vendor and vendee as their interests may appear. It being understood that the title is in the vendor, where the property had been turned over to the purchaser absolutely for a sum evidenced by cash and notes, which has mostly been paid so that the seller asserts no claim under its lien.

(January 2, 1899.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Allegheny County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. S. Ferguson, E. G. Ferguson, D. T. Watson, and Johns McCleave for appellant.

Mr. Willis F. McCook for appellee.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant company, with some thirty other fire insurance companies, after March 12, 1894, and before February, 1897, insured the plaintiff against damage by fire, on a quantity of publishers' machinery and material, in the aggregate sum of $53,700. The amount of defendant's policy was $2,000. Part of the property insured consisted of ten Mergenthaler linotype machines. There was a stipulation in each policy as follows: "This company shall not be liable beyond the actual cash value of the property at the time any loss or damage occurred, and the loss or damage shall be ascertained or estimated according to such actual cash value, and with proper deduction for depreciation, however caused; and shall in no event exceed what it would then cost the insured to repair or replace the same with materials of like kind or quality." On February 14, 1897, a fire destroyed a large part of all the property covered by the policies, and, if it did not completely destroy, it very seriously damaged the ten typesetting machines. In adjusting the loss between insurers and insured there was no dispute except as to the extent of the insurer's liability on these ten machines. There had been two contracts by the publishing company with the Mergenthaler Company with reference to them, each of which fixed the price at $3,000 per machine; nor could the publishing company or any other purchaser replace them at a less price, for both by the protection afforded by the patent covering the different parts of the machine, and because the Mergenthaler Company alone was prepared to manufacture them, that company had a monopoly of their sale. At the trial in the court below there was some conflict in the evidence as to whether they had been so damaged as to be incapable of repair, and also some evidence tending to show they could have been repaired for less than $700 each. The plaintiff alleged, and offered evidence tending to show, they could not have been repaired so as to do the work required of them, and therefore it had replaced them with new ones, at a cost of $3,000 per machine, or an entire cost of $30,000. The jury on the conflicting evidence, as between these two parties, found for the plaintiff; that is, that the machines were wholly destroyed, and that the cost of replacing them was $30,000, or $3,000 each. But defendant further alleged the real owner of the machines, and the party to their contract of indemnity was the Mergenthaler Company, and to this company, under the stipulations in its policy, it must make good the loss; and further, that this loss to the manufacturer and seller of the machines was less than $1,000 each, because, although selling them for not less than $3,000, the net profit was $2,000, for the cost of manufacture did not exceed $1,000. Therefore if, under the facts and written instruments, the party insured was the Mergenthaler Company, the insurer was only, under the clause already quoted, bound to pay what would be the "cost to the insured to repair or replace the same with materials of like kind or quality," making the loss to the insurers $20,000 less than if the party indemnified be the Post Publishing Company.

As the finding of fact by the jury is that the loss as to each machine is total, the only question left for determination is, Who is indemnified by the policy? On March 12, 1894, by written contract, the Mergenthaler Company delivered into the possession of the publishing company the machines. It is not worth while discussing the terms of this lease, because both parties agree that it was a mere bailment, and though the possession was in the publishing company, the title was in the Mergenthaler Company. This contract of bailment continued until May 18, NOTE.—As to the rights of parties under conditional sales in general, see Cole v. Hines (Md.) 32 L. R. A. 455, and note; also Perkins v. Grobhen (Mich.) 39 L. R. A. 815, 44 L. R. A.

1895, when a new one was entered into. By the use of the machines for months, the plaintiff had become satisfied of their merits, and, as lessee by the first contract, it had the option to buy at the price of $3,000 for each machine, and have credited on the purchase price the rental theretofore paid. The new contract provided that the publishing company should continue in the use of the machines theretofore delivered to it until May 20, 1897, and for the possession and use thereof should pay to the Mergenthaler Company $25,000 in cash and notes, the last note falling due May 20, 1897, and interest to be paid on all the notes. Including the rental of $5,000, already paid, this made the whole sum payable on the last contract $30,000. The cash and notes were delivered. It was further stipulated that the publishing company would keep the machines insured at a sum of not less than $1,000 on each machine, pay the premium, and deliver the policies to the Mergenthaler Company; and, further, that the title to and property in the machines should remain in the Mergenthaler Company; provided that they should become the property of the publishing company when all the rent covenanted for and costs and charges were paid. On the face of each policy was this indorsement: "Loss, if any, on typesetting machines, as insured under first item of this policy, payable to the assured and the Mergenthaler Linotype Co. as their respective interests may appear. It is understood that the title to the typesetting machines insured under the first item of this policy is vested in the Mergenthaler Linotype Co. Loss, if any, on same, payable to the assured and the said Mergenthaler Linotype Co. as their respective interests may appear." In whom was the title to this property at the time of the fire? The bailment was ended by the second contract, when the lessee exercised its right to purchase. The amount to be paid was absolutely $30,000, for that was the sum evidenced by the cash and notes; and the amount to be paid when the lessee exercised the option to purchase. No covenant is exacted for their return from the publishing company; none for further assurance of title by the Mergenthaler Company when the notes are paid. Then the letter of the Mergenthaler Company to the publishing company, inclosing the contract to be signed, dated April 8, 1895, which says: "We hand you herewith two copies of the proposed contract of sale for ten linotype machines, heretofore leased to you, as agreed upon with Mr. Barr some time since," shows at once the intention of the parties to turn the lease into a sale, as provided by the first contract. As to creditors of the vendee, although no actual fraud was contemplated, the law would have held it constructively fraudulent as to them, for the title and possession of the chattel were in the vendee, with a secret lien for the purchase money in the vendor, and the machines would have been subject to seizure and sale at the suit of creditors. The declaration that the title shall remain in the vendor until the notes are paid, with no stipulation for the return of the property, was a mere attempt to maintain a secret lien. Farquhar v. McAlevy, 142 Pa. 240; Stephens v. Gifford, 137 Pa. 219; Summerson v. Hicks, 134 Pa. 567. Whether, as between themselves, equity would have sustained a lien for any portion of the purchase money, it is not necessary to inquire, for that is not the question before us. It will be time enough for that when the Mergenthaler Company attempts to enforce any supposed lien it has against the plaintiff. Nor does the stipulation on the policy that the loss, if any, shall be paid to the assured and the Mergenthaler Company as their respective interests at the time may appear, affect the right of the plaintiff to its judgment. This worked no change in the title; is but the usual stipulation by the mortgagor of insured property to protect his mortgage creditor. It does not affect the liability of the insurer for the amount of his policy, nor the right of the assured, the holder of the legal title, to recover. If the insurer—the stakeholder—wants to avoid risk from dividing the sum and paying to each as his interest appears, he can pay the money into court, and that tribunal will adjust the equities. So far as appears, the Mergenthaler Company asserts no claim on its supposed chattel lien or mortgage, it having been paid all the purchase money at date of the fire, except $8,287.50. There is nothing further in the case requiring discussion.

All the assignments are overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

UNION RAILROAD COMPANY.

(.....R. I.....)

1. The benefit of a contract by a town with a street railway company, limiting the rate of fare, is available to a passenger in an action of trespass for being ejected for nonpayment of fare after tendering the amount allowed by the contract.

NOTE.—As to right of action by third person on contract between others for his benefit, see note to Jefferson v. Asch (Minn.) 25 L. R. A. 257.

2. The fact that a person boarded a car for the purpose of making a test case as to the amount of fare demandable will not affect his right to maintain an action for an unlawful ejection after tendering the fare lawfully due.

(January 9, 1899.)

ACTION to recover damages for alleged wrongful ejection from defendant's cars.
Judgment for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edward L. Mitchell, for plaintiff:

The contract between the town of East Providence and the Union Railroad Company fixing the rate of fare was made for the sole benefit of the citizens of the town, and can be enforced by them.

Plaintiff had a right to insist upon his legal rights under this contract, even to the extent of using force to resist ejection.

English v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 66 N. Y. 454, 23 Am. Rep. 69.

The contract between the Union Railroad Company and the town of East Providence operated practically as an ordinance fixing the rate of fare within the limits of the town.

Allegheny v. Millville E. & S. Street R. Co. 159 Pa. 411; People, West Side Street R. Co., v. Barnard, 110 N. Y. 552; Shields v. Ohio, 95 U. S. 319, 24 L. ed. 357; Atty. Gen. v. Old Colony R. Co. 160 Mass. 62, 22 L. R. A. 112.

The rights of the town and its citizens under this contract are practically similar to the rights of the city of St. Paul and its citizens under an ordinance, consented to by the corporation, securing to the municipality and its citizens the right to transfer tickets.

Pine v. St. Paul City R. Co. 60 Minn. 144, 16 L. R. A. 347.

A fair and reasonable construction of the contract between the Union Railroad Company and the town of East Providence would entitle the plaintiff to ride upon the second car without paying an extra fare.

The act of the conductor in ejecting the plaintiff from the car constituted an assault entitling the plaintiff to recover damages from the defendant corporation.

A ticket is only evidence of a contract, and the plaintiff was entitled to a transfer under a contract between the town and the company.

Georgia R. Co. v. Olds, 77 Ga. 673; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Cope, 36 Ill. App. 97.

The fact that he did not have a transfer ticket to show to the second conductor was not his fault, but the fault of the company.

Forsee v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 63 Miss. 67, 56 Am. Rep. 801.

The plaintiff having paid his fare had a right to resist ejection and was not obliged to leave the car.

English v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 66 N. Y. 454, 23 Am. Rep. 69.

The defendant having pleaded justification under § 43 of chapter 187 of the General Laws, the plaintiff, aside from any contractual rights he may have under the contract between the town of East Providence and the Union Railroad Company, is entitled to recover damages for the assault.

The replication de injuria is in the nature of a general issue, and puts in issue all matters alleged in the plea.

2 Greenl. Ev. 15th ed. § 96.

The present action is not a moot case, but is an actual case of which the court will take jurisdiction.

Fisher v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 46 N. Y. 644.

Mr. William G. Roelker for defendant.

Stiness, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Pub. Laws 1891, chap. 975 (Act May 29, 1891), gave authority to towns to "pass ordinances or make contracts" granting franchises to corporations for operating street railways, etc. October 15, 1892, the town of East Providence made such a contract with the defendant, in which it was agreed that, "during the continuance of said exclusive franchise, the fare from one point to any other point on the lines of said party of the second part in said town shall not exceed five cents." In the agreed statement of facts it appears that a line was constructed which ran from Rumford to Riverside, which was discontinued before this alleged cause of action accrued, but that both Riverside and Rumford were still upon its lines by connecting roads. October 23, 1896, the plaintiff boarded the Warren avenue car, paid his fare, stating to the conductor that he wanted to go to Rumford; and, at the nearest point of connection, he demanded a receipt showing that he had paid his fare, or a transfer to Rumford, which the conductor refused to give. He then boarded the first car going to Rumford, by the only route he could take, stated to the conductor that he had paid his fare on the other car, that he desired to go to Rumford, and that he had asked for a transfer or other evidence that he had paid his fare, which had been refused. The conductor insisted upon his paying his fare on that line, and, upon the plaintiff's refusal to pay, the conductor ejected him from the car. The plaintiff sues in trespass for assault and battery. The defendant pleads in justification, setting up a charter to the South Main Street Horse-Railroad Company, to which, with other companies, the Union Railroad Company is successor, which gave to the former company the right to extend its lines into East Providence, and to fix rates of fare not exceeding ten cents for each passenger between any two points on said road; that in accordance with such authority, continued to the defendant, and under ordinances of East Providence relating thereto, the defendant has established and charges a lawful fare of five cents for one continuous ride on any car of said Union Railroad Company in said town of East Providence; that, upon the plaintiff's refusal to pay such fare, he was ejected from the car by the conductor, using no more force than was necessary.

We think the contract of October 15, 1892, recited above, supersedes the rights under the charter and said statutory provisions pleaded. The statute of May 29, 1891, gives authority to make a contract, and by it the defendant waives its previous rights in respect to fare, for the consideration of extension of lines and an exclusive right to maintain them. Under this view of the contract, a plea in justification, so far as it rests upon rights previously held, is of no avail. The only question is the one which has been chiefly pressed in argument,—whether the plaintiff can avail himself, as an individual, of the right to claim the benefit of the provisions of that contract in this action. The plea does not wholly fail, because it still has the averment that the plaintiff was ejected for a refusal to pay the lawful fare. The terms of the contract are plain,—that "the fare from one point to any other point on the lines of said party of the second part shall not exceed five cents." We cannot vary this language by reason of the fact that, when the contract was made, two rides for five cents was not the established rate of fare. The contract makes no such reservation, and it was entered into with a view of new or extended lines within the town. If, then, it is of general application, it is controlling in this case.

The plaintiff cites a large number of cases to the effect that a promise made by A. and B., for the benefit of C., may be sued on by C. Most of these cases relate to debt, where there has been a substantial, though not a technical, novation. In Wilbur v. Wilbur, 17 R. I. 295, this court held that it was not prepared to extend the doctrine to cases where no debt was assumed. The case was an action of assumpsit, on the promise to another to pay a note without consideration and void in law. The language of the opinion must be taken in its relation to the question before the court, which was whether a promise to pay to the plaintiff a sum of money, as for a debt, could be enforced by him when in fact no debt existed. We do not think that the court meant to lay down the rule that in no case, excepting debt, can a person avail himself of a promise to another. The contract in question was made for the benefit of passengers using the defendant's cars. The town can hardly show damages for its breach, and therefore, if the people for whose benefit it was made cannot recover for its breach no one can. True, the town might take steps to avoid the contract and stop the road for failure to perform conditions; but, in so doing, it would cut off the privileges of many to redress the wrong of one. This would neither be a reasonable nor an adequate remedy. It must have been intended to be a contract for the benefit of the public, made through the town as their corporate representative, upon which passengers could rely, and for breach of which they could seek redress; otherwise, it is a contract of little obligation and force. Suppose the defendant should charge ten cents for one ride, and should eject a passenger for refusing to pay it; under its contention, the passenger would be without redress. In Little v. Banks, 85 N. Y. 258, the state made a contract with the defendant to publish reports of the court of appeals, in which it was stipulated that he should furnish copies to book-sellers, and, upon default, to pay the sum of $100 as liquidated damages, "to be sued for and recovered by the person so aggrieved." It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. This last clause quoted introduces an element not in this case, but it is not an important one in the view of the New York court. The court held that the contract was for the benefit of booksellers, such as the plaintiff, and that he had a right under it, the clause quoted being intended to carry out the purpose of the contract by fixing a sum of liquidated damages. The general principle as to the plaintiff's right is laid down by the court as follows: "Contractors with the state, who assume, for a consideration received from the sovereign power, by covenant, express or implied, to do certain things, are liable, in case of neglect to perform such covenant, to a private action at the suit of the party injured by such neglect; and such contract inures to the benefit of the individual who is interested in its performance." The principle is put upon the ground of public policy essential to the public welfare. In Porter v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 97 N. C. 46, the defendant agreed with the city of Charlotte to pay a part of a policeman's salary, to be on duty at its depot. It was held that he could sue the defendant on the contract. Benge v. Hiatt, 82 Ky. 666, 56 Am. Rep. 912, gave a child the right to sue on a contract made by his putative father with his mother, for the child's benefit, in consideration of the surrender of the child to the father by the mother. In Ooster v. Albany, 43 N. Y. 399, the city undertook improvements under a statute by which it was to pay for damages to property. Judge Folger, in the opinion, said: "Here is the promise, the consideration, and the promisee, definitely brought out. The ultimate beneficiary is uncertain." The court held that a party damaged could maintain an action against the city for such damage as he had shown. The distinction to be made in cases of this sort is well stated by Brown, J., in House v. Houston Waterworks Co. 88 Tex. 233, 28 L. R. A. 532: "It is not true that for every failure to perform a public duty an action will lie in favor of any person who may suffer injury by reason of such failure. If the duty is purely a public duty, then the individual will have no right of action; but it must appear that the object and purpose of imposing the duty was to confer a benefit upon the individuals composing the public." The distinction is clearly brought out in Aldrich v. Howard, 7 R. I. 199. In that case a statute required buildings within certain limits to be built in the manner and of the materials described in the act. The plaintiff, as adjoining proprietor, alleged a violation of the act, and special damage to his estate. On demurrer, upon the ground that there was no private right of action, the court held that the penalty was the remedy through which the public could compel a compliance with the law, but that the private right existed also for one suffering special injury. Ames, Ch. J., in the opinion, said that the case was within the rule so long ago laid down by Lord Holt that, "in every case where a statute enacts or prohibits a thing for the benefit of a person, he shall have a remedy upon the same statute for the thing enacted for his advantage, or for the recompense of the wrong done to him contrary to the said law." In Taylor v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 45 Mich. 74, 40 Am. Rep. 457, Cooley, J., said: "The burden that individuals are required to bear for the public protection or benefit may in part be imposed for the protection or benefit of some particular individual or class of individuals also, and then there may be an individual right of action as well as a public prosecution, if a breach of the duty causes individual injury." Most of the cases cited by the respondent arise out of contracts for the supply of water to a town or city, under a general public duty, and not for the benefit of individuals or a class of individuals. They hold that there is no contract in favor of a private plaintiff, while some rest upon the lack of authority to impose conditions.

The statute of May 29, 1891, gives authority to a town to act by ordinance or contract. If it acts by contract, as in this case, the necessary implication is that it may stipulate for terms other than those expressed in the act. As to the rate of fare, § 4 provides that the charge for service shall not be greater than the price actually charged by the corporation at the time of granting the franchise, which also clearly implies that it may be less, otherwise, it would be the same price. We do not think, therefore, that the contract was ultra vires as claimed by the defendant. The plea of justification ignores the contract, but it is made a part of the statement of facts. It is to be noted that this case is not brought upon the contract, as in most of the cases cited. The plaintiff sues for trespass. The defendant pleads a justification upon the ground that the plaintiff was ejected for refusing to pay a "lawful fare." The evidence of the contract shows what we construe to be a waiver of any right on the part of the defendant, if any such existed, to charge for fares under the charters set out in the plea; and hence that the provision, "The fare from one point to any other point on the lines of said party of the second part in said town shall not exceed five cents," fixes such fare as the maximum lawful fare between the points in question in this case. The plaintiff, having paid this fare, has paid all that he could be required to pay under the contract, which, being for the benefit of passengers, a class of which he was one, was for his benefit, and of which he could take advantage, under the principles stated above. We think, therefore, that the plea of justification is not sustained.

Another point taken by the defendant is that, because the plaintiff boarded the cars for the purpose of making a test case, this is a moot case, which the court will not entertain. A moot case is one which seeks to determine an abstract question, which does not rest upon existing facts or rights. Where a concrete case of fact or right is shown, we know of no principle or policy of law which will deprive a party of a determination, simply because his motive in the assertion of such right is to secure such determination. It is a matter of common practice. Most of the cases of trespass to try title are of this sort. We are therefore of opinion that the case is not objectionable on this ground. We think that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, which, according to the agreement of parties, will be for nominal damages.

Judgment for the plaintiff for ten cents and costs.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Sim ANDERSON, Appt.,

v.

(.....S. C.....)

1. An instrument binding children to the service of a person during their minority, though signed by him and by their parents, is void as to them as an indenture of apprenticeship under Rev. Stat. 1893, § 2206, unless signed by the infants, although the statute does not expressly provide for their signature.
2. The real welfare of a child is the principal consideration in awarding its custody as between conflicting claims thereto.
3. The custody of a minor by virtue of a fair agreement with the parent, not prejudicial to the welfare of the minor, although not binding upon him, is not unlawful or against public policy so as to constitute such an illegal restraint as a court must relieve at the will or caprice of the parent.

(March 16. 1899.)

A PPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Laurens County in favor of defendant in a habeas corpus proceeding to obtain the custody of plaintiff's minor children which had been placed in charge of defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. R. Richey, for appellant:

The infants must be a party to the indenture, otherwise it is void.

Austin v. McCluney, 5 Strobb. L. 104.

The formalities of the statute must be complied with or the indenture will be void.

Welborn v. Little, 1 Nott & M'C. 263.

A deed of indenture is a deed consisting of as many parts or duplicates as there are parties.

5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 453.

A writ of habeas corpus lies at the instance of either parent or apprentice to release a person held as apprentice under void or avoided indentures.

1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 639b; United States v. Anderson, Cooke (Tenn.) 143; Com. v. Robinson, 1 Serg. & R. 353; Com. v. Harrison, 11 Mass. 63; Re McDougle, 8 Johns. 328; Rea v. Delaval, 3 Burr. 1434.

The father of said infants being yet alive the respondent cannot hold said infants under said instruments as a testamentary instrument in the form of a deed.

2 Kent, Com. p. 225.

Messrs. Ball & Simkins, for respondent:

The paper is good as an indenture of apprenticeship. The statute has been substantially followed.

It does not require the infant to sign the indenture, but only that the magistrate shall certify, under his hand and seal, the presence and approbation of the father, mother, or guardian of the infant. For the infants to have signed in this instance would really have been a burlesque, by reason of their tender years.

The distinction now between deeds-poll and indentures is of no practical value. Under the common law the main distinction related to the form of the action on each. If it was an indenture, the action was assumpsit; and if a deed-poll, debt or covenant. But with the advent of the Code, all distinction between the two has passed away with the abolition of the distinction in these forms of action.

5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 453, 454.

If the paper was not an indenture such as the statute requires, it is still binding at common law on the parties to it. Even if it is voidable on the part of the infants, it does not follow that Sim Anderson, Neicy Anderson, and John Young are not bound by it.

2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 505.

The infant alone can take advantage of any informalities.

Loddell v. Allen, 9 Gray, 377; Van Dorn v. Young, 13 Barb. 286.

Jones, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant appeals from an order of Judge Townsend refusing his petition for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain the custody of his minor children, one a girl about eight years old, and the other a boy about seven years old. The return of respondent to the writ was as follows: "That he holds in custody and detains the bodies of Mattie Anderson and Sim Anderson, Jr., by reason of the following facts: Sim Anderson, Sr., the father of the two infants, Mattie Anderson and Sim Anderson, Jr., came to live with respondent, John Young, the latter part of December last, bringing with him the two said infants, one six and the other seven years of age, and they continued on there during the year 1898. Sim Anderson was at the time almost totally blind, and, although his eyesight improved some, his general health was all along very poor, and he was utterly unable to properly take care of the said infants; and his wife, Neicy Anderson, who lived on another place, applied to him to be allowed to take the children, and care for them. This Sim Anderson refused to do, but, after consulting together, they agreed between themselves as a wise settlement of the matter to bind the children to me. Sim Anderson came to me, and proposed the plan. I finally consented, provided Neicy, the mother, was willing. He assured me she was, and afterwards I saw her, and she gave her consent. We all then went to Magistrate W. M. McMillan, and explained the matter to him. He drew the instrument of writing binding over the children to me, which he explained fully to us all, and which we, the said Sim Anderson, Neicy Anderson, and myself, then and there signed. This indenture is herewith exhibited, marked 'A.' This respondent then entered upon his performance of said indenture, and has since carried out towards the said children all the obligations therein required of him. And this respondent is satisfied that the welfare of the children is much better subverted by matters remaining as they are than giving the custody of the children to the said Sim Anderson, who is utterly unable to care for them." The alleged indenture was dated August 19, 1898, was executed under seal by the said father and mother of the children and by John Young, the respondent, and was attested as signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of W. M. McMillan, as magistrate, under his seal. The instrument, among other things, recited that the father and mother, of their own free will and accord, put their son and daughter apprentice under John Young to learn to be farmers, and, after the manner of apprentices, to serve him for fourteen years, or until they became of age; containing stipulations as to the service and conduct of their said children, one such stipulation being that they shall not absent themselves from said John Young's services, day or night, without leave. On his part John Young covenanted to teach and to provide for said apprentices for said term. All parties bound themselves "for the true performance of all and singular the covenants and agreement aforesaid." The instrument was not signed by the said children, and, so far as appears, they were not present at the execution; and there was no certificate upon the same by the magistrate beyond his attestation as a witness, as follows: "W. M. McMillan [L. S.] Magistrate L. C. S. C.," under the words, "Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of." The circuit judge held that the indenture set up in the return, to which petitioner is a party, is binding upon him, and, there being nothing to show improper treatment of the infants on the part of John Young, respondent be refused the petition. Appellant assigns error (1) in holding that the indenture is binding upon him, (2) in holding that the instrument is an indenture, (3) in refusing his petition, (4) in not holding that he was entitled to the custody of his children.

apprentices (3 Stat. at L. p. 544) expressly provided that the intending apprentice "shall execute such indenture in the presence and with the approbation of his or her father, mother, or guardian," etc., and under this act it has been decided that the indenture will be void as to the apprentice unless he is a party to it. Welborn v. Little, 1 Nott & M'C. 263; Austin v. McCluney, 3 Strobb. L. 104. Indentures of apprentices are now regulated by §§ 2072, 2073 et seq., Gen. Stat. 1882, now appearing as §§ 2205, 2206 et seq., Rev. Stat. 1893. In these sections the language above quoted from the old act of 1740 is not to be found. In § 2072, Gen. Stat. 1882, it is provided as follows: "It shall, and may be lawful, to and for any person or persons within this state to take one or more apprentice or apprentices indentured according to the directions of this chapter," etc. It is nowhere provided in said chapter how apprentices shall be indentured except in § 2073, appearing as § 2206, Rev. Stat. 1893, which provides as follows: "It shall be the duty of any trial justice to whom application is made by a person desiring to become the master or mistress of any infant to be bound to service by indenture according to law, to certify under his hand and seal upon such indenture the presence and approbation of the father, mother, or guardian of such infant at the time it was executed, . . . which indenture or indentures, so executed and certified as aforesaid, shall be good and effectual, to all intents and purposes, as if such apprentice had been of full age, and by indenture of covenant had bound him or herself; or otherwise shall be void and of none effect." Notwithstanding the absence of the language quoted from the act of 1740, we hold that by necessary implication the apprentice must execute the instrument, otherwise it will be void as to such apprentice as an indenture of apprenticeship under the statute, however unreasonable this may appear when applied to infants which have not attained years of discretion. There is no doubt that the rule generally held is that the apprentice, to be bound, must execute the indenture, unless the statute expressly provide a different mode of execution in behalf of the infant. Having reached the conclusion that the alleged indenture is void as to the infant apprentices because they are not parties to it, we need not consider whether, when the parents have actually executed the instrument themselves, and bound themselves to its stipulations in the presence of the magistrate, and the magistrate has signed the instrument as a witness under his title and seal, it is not a compliance with the requirement as to the magistrate's certificate as to their presence and approbation. But it does not follow, because the indenture is void as to the infants, that petitioner is therefore entitled to the custody of his children. There is no doubt that ordinarily, and prima facie, the father, as natural guardian, is entitled to the custody of his minor children; but this right is not absolute, as his property right in a chattel would be. His right of custody may be subordinated to the real interests of his child. While, then, a court is in duty bound to relieve an infant from illegal restraint, yet, in awarding custody, it will exercise a wise discretion, looking to the real welfare of the child as the principal consideration. This is the rule in this state, and generally in this country. Ex parte Schumpert, 6 Rich. L. 346; Ex parte Williams, 11 Rich. L. 459; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 368.

As the office of the writ of habeas corpus is to release from illegal restraint, the first inquiry here is whether the petitioner's children are illegally restrained by the respondent. Respondent asserts that his custody of the children is lawful by virtue of the indenture with the father and mother placing them with him as apprentices. Conceding that the instrument is void as to the minors as an indenture of apprenticeship under the statute for want of compliance with statutory regulations, the question remains whether the instrument is so void as to make respondent's custody illegal as against the father who executed it. In Eubanks v. Peuk, 2 Bail. L. 409, Judge O'Neill expressed the opinion that a mother, during the minority of her son, was entitled to his services; and, if she chose to place him with another, and to contract that he should serve that other until he was of the age of twenty-one years, and that for his services the defendant should remunerate him by schooling, and the delivery of property, it was a valid contract, which inured to the benefit of the plaintiff, and on which he could maintain that action. In the later case of Austin v. M'Cluney, 5 Strobh. L. 106, the court held that, while the indenture under the act of 1740 was of no force as against the minor, who was not a party to it, it was nevertheless binding at common law against the parties thereto, and such a contract was not contrary to public policy. In this last case the court cited Day v. Everett, 7 Mass. 147, as sustaining an indenture not executed in accordance with the statute as good at common law, as the father might lawfully assign the services of his child during his minority, and during the life of the father. A parent cannot, at common law, irrevocably divest himself of his trust and duty to care for and train his children, and surrender their care and custody to another, merely for his own comfort or pecuniary gain; but he may lawfully place his children in the custody of another, and assign their services during minority for their own welfare,—as to learn some useful trade or occupation,—in which case a court is not bound to restore the children to the parent's custody unless it appears that the real welfare of the children requires it. We think reason and authority warrant us in stating as the law that the custody of a minor by virtue of a fair agreement with the parent, not prejudicial to the welfare of the minor, is not unlawful or against public policy, and is not such illegal restraint as a court must relieve at the will or caprice of the parent. Hurd, Habeas Corpus, 537; Clark v. Bayer, 32 Ohio St. 299, 30 Am. Rep. 593; Chapsky v. Wood, 26 Kan. 650, 40 Am. Rep. 321; Bonnett v. Bonnett, 61 Iowa, 199, 47 Am. Rep. 810; Green v. Campbell, 35 W. Va. 698; see also note in Brooke v. Logan, 2 Am. St. Rep. 184 (112 Ind. 183), and note in Enders v. Enders, 27 L. R. A. 56 (164 Pa. 266). In this case, while the father is seeking to revoke his agreement, and regain the custody of the children, the mother, who, for some reason, is not living with the father, insists that the children should remain with respondent, who is the husband of her sister, or, if not, that they be given to her, as petitioner is unable to properly care for them. It does not appear that petitioner has a home for them, or any means whatever. There was evidence before the circuit judge tending to show that petitioner was crippled and partially blind, and wholly unable to support himself and the children. On the other hand, there was evidence that respondent was faithfully carrying out his agreement to care for the children, and there was no showing whatever of any ill or improper treatment of them by respondent, and it was not questioned that respondent was a man "far beyond ordinary for respectability, virtue, and general well-doing," "a man of good disposition, and well able and qualified to care for and train the children."

The exceptions are overruled, and the order refusing the petition is affirmed.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

TEXAS LOAN AGENCY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

Fanny R. FLEMING et al.

(.....Tex.....)

1. The legal sufficiency of evidence to support a finding by the court is a question of law on appeal.
2. The collection of rents from a subtenant does not operate by law as a cancellation of the original lease and an assumption of the possession of the property by the lessor.

NOTE.—As to the liability of a landlord for injuries to the tenant's guests and servants from defects in premises, see McConnell v. Lem, 44 L. R. A.

3. The lease of a building which has a door opening at considerable height into space, and unprovided with bars and guards, does not render the landlord liable to a person who is injured in consequence of the failure of the lessee or other person during the lease to keep the door properly fastened.

review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Bowie County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's husband which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frost, Neblett, & Blanding, for plaintiff in error:

Appellant's liability to Fleming could only be predicated on the failure to perform some duty it owed Fleming. If he was the guest of Brown or Benefield, and appellant had no knowledge that they were using its rooms and closets, appellant owed him no duty, and could therefore not be liable.

Durant v. Parmer, 29 N. J. L. 544; Marshall v. Heard, 59 Tex. 266; O'Connor v. Andrews, 81 Tex. 28.

If the doorway was provided with proper shutter fastenings, etc., and in that condition was safe and free from danger when properly used, and became unsafe by reason of the negligent or improper use of the door, then appellant would not be liable, if it was not in possession and did not have control of the door.

The loan agency, not being in possession of the property, before it could be held liable, it must be shown that it induced, for its own interest, Fleming to enter the building. If he was on the premises, neither as the guest of the loan agency nor McGraw, and without profit to the loan agency, then appellant could not be liable.

To hold the owner of a building liable for injuries to persons on the premises, without either invitation, permission, or knowledge of the owner, such owner must have a knowledge of the defects which cause the injuries.

Ahern v. Steele, 115 N. Y. 203, 5 L. R. A. 449.

In the absence of a statute, the owner of a building is not, as to the public, bound to keep the premises in such repair that they may be safely visited by the public.

The liability of the owner exists only in favor of third persons standing upon their rights strictly as such. Those who claim that they were invited into a dangerous place must seek their remedy against the person who invited them. If they are the guests of the tenant, he and not the owner is the person to whom they must look for redress.

A mere passive acquiescence on the part of the owner or occupant in the use of real property by others does not involve him in any liability to them for its unfitness for use.

Schmidt v. Bauer, 5 L. R. A. 580, notes, 80 Cal. 565.

The landlord is liable if the nuisance occasioning the injury existed when the premises were leased; or where the structure was in such a condition that it would likely become a nuisance in its ordinary use for the purpose for which it was constructed and let, and the landlord failed to repair it; or when the landlord authorized or permitted the act which caused it to become a nuisance.

Kalis v. Shattuck, 69 Cal. 597, 58 Am. Rep. 568.

The door was furnished with a lock, key, and bolt to fasten it securely. It must follow, then, that the condition it was in at that time that caused the injury, if that caused it, was the failure by the occupant to use the appliances so furnished. This would, under the law, exempt appellant from liability.

Messrs. Charles S. Todd, R. W. Rodgers, and Hiram Glass, for defendants in error:

Appellant is liable if either of the two following conditions of fact existed at the time of the injury: (1) If defendant was in possession of the premises, and knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence could have known, of the dangerous condition of the premises, and of the use made of the closets by the guests of the hotel adjoining; or (2) if McGraw was in possession of the premises under lease from defendant, and at the time of such lease and delivery to him by defendant, the premises were in a dangerous condition and the closets were being used by lodgers in the adjoining hotel, and defendant knew, or by reasonable care and diligence could have known, of such dangerous condition and such use.

The owner of a building owes the duty to the public (a stranger or third person not a trespasser) to keep its property in such reasonably safe condition that the public or a third person, who is without fault, will not be injured by reason of any dangerous defect in or nuisance upon such building.

The owner is liable for injury to any such third person on such premises by invitation either expressed or implied; and implied invitation may arise from and be proved by the circumstances.

Actual knowledge, either of the existence of the defect or nuisance, or of the use of the premises, is not necessary; if the facts and circumstances are such that the owner by the exercise of ordinary care, prudence, and diligence might and ought to have known, he will be charged with knowledge of what it was his duty to have known.

A person who erects or maintains any structure in a locality is liable as for a nuisance for any injuries that may ensue from its improper construction or maintenance.

Wood, Nuisances, § 120.

The thing itself being such that it may be productive of injury if not properly guarded and cared for, the person erecting it without taking measures to prevent it from being productive of ill results in any event cannot rid himself of the consequences of his act by temporarily parting with his control over it.

Having terminated the relation of landlord and tenant by surrender of the lease and acceptance thereof, the appellant resumed possession of the property; and that portion including the closets, not actually occupied, was in possession of defendant.

O'Connor v. Andrews, 81 Tex. 33.

There was very strong evidence authorizing the jury to find permission and implied invitation by plaintiff in error to Benefield and his guests and lodgers to use their closets.

There was a community of interest in such use by all the occupants of the whole house, inasmuch as Sharpe and other tenants and occupants of plaintiff in error's premises could reach the closets in no other way except by going through Benefield's house, which he in turn permitted.

Benefield and his guests had an easement in the use of the closets, and appellant's tenants an easement through Benefield's halls.

Wood, Nuisances, § 135; Totten v. Phipps, 52 N. Y. 354.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Fannie R. Fleming, the widow of Edgar Fleming, brought this suit for herself and her minor children, in which she was joined by the parents of her deceased husband. Plaintiffs sought to recover from the Texas Loan Agency damages for the death of Edgar Fleming, charged to have occurred through the negligence of the loan agency at an hotel in the city of Texarkana, Texas. It was averred in the petition that the deceased lost his life through the defective and dangerous condition of a door in the hotel building, the property of defendant, at which he stopped as a guest. The plaintiffs recovered a judgment for $20,000, which was affirmed by the court of civil appeals, upon the following conclusions of fact: "It was established by the facts that appellant, in 1891, held a mortgage on a certain hotel building in Texarkana, Texas, owned by one Benefield; and, to settle the matter, the hotel was partitioned, Benefield getting a portion 32 feet wide and 130 feet long, and appellant the balance of the building. The hall running east and west ran across both portions of the house, and was used jointly by the different owners. The hall running north and south was in the part of the building belonging to Benefield. The water-closets in the building were all on the property belonging to appellant. Guests of the hotel, on the second floor, in order to reach the water-closets, had to pass along the hall running north and south, until a short hall, also on Benefield's property, running east and west, was reached, at the end of which the room in which the water-closets were situated was reached. This room belonged to appellant, and access to it could only be obtained in the manner described. In addition to the door leading from the hall into the room, there was a door on the south of the room, which opened out into space. The water-closets were used indiscriminately by guests, whether in Benefield's or appellant's part of the house. The hotel was, on May 1, 1891, leased by Benefield and appellant to D. McGraw, for a term of five years. At the time of the lease, the door leading out into space was not locked, nor in any manner protected or guarded, but was often left open. The condition of the door was known to appellant, and it remained in that condition until the accident occurred, on the morning of March 3, 1892. On February 1, 1892, McGraw abandoned the hotel, and appellant proceeded to collect rents from tenants of McGraw on the first floor; and Benefield opened an hotel in his part of the building, and with the knowledge and consent of appellant, the guests of Benefield used the water-closets above described. On the night of March 2, 1892, Edgar Fleming, a guest of Benefield, went to the water-closets, and, the door being open that opened out into space, stepped out, fell to the pavement 15 feet below, and received injuries from which he died on March 4, 1892. We find that appellant at this time had resumed control of the hotel, and that the door was open on the night of the accident. Edgar Fleming was not guilty of contributory negligence in going through the door. Edgar Fleming lost his life through the negligence of appellant. The accompanying diagram will render assistance in arriving at an understanding of the condition of the premises hereinbefore mentioned." 46 S. W. 64. The plaintiff in error assigns that the following findings of fact are without evidence to support them: "(1) With the knowledge and consent of appellant, the guests of Benefield used the water-closets above described. (2) We find that appellant at this time had resumed control of the hotel, and that the door was open on the night of the accident."

When a court of civil appeals has found, from the evidence, conclusions of fact, they are binding and conclusive upon this court if there be evidence to sustain them. It is a question of law, however, for this court to determine, if there be any evidence in the record to support the findings of that court. Choate v. San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. 91 Tex. 409; Hudson v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 145 N. Y. 412; Hannigan v. Lehigh & H. R. R. Co. 157 N. Y. 244. It requires no less testimony to support a finding of fact made by a court of civil appeals than if such finding were made by a jury in the trial of the cause. "It is the duty of the district court to instruct a verdict, though there be slight testimony [in support of an issue], if . . . probative force [of such testimony] be so weak that it only raises a mere surmise or suspicion of the existence of the fact sought to be established—such testimony, in legal contemplation, falls short of being 'any evidence,'" within the meaning of the law. Joske v. Irvine, 91 Tex. 574. The fact that there may be evidence which was admissible does not preclude the trial court from determining the question of its legal sufficiency. The same test is applicable to a finding of fact by the court of civil appeals when challenged in this court upon the ground that it is without evidence to support it. If the testimony be such that a district judge should instruct a verdict then a finding by the court of civil appeals upon such evidence would be equally untenable as a verdict. The jurisdiction of the court of appeals of the state of New York to review the action of the general term on the facts is quite similar to that of this court in regard to the findings of fact by the courts of civil appeals. In Hudson v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. cited above, the New York court said: "All questions as to the weight of evidence are final in the general term, and this court has no power to review the determination of that court with reference thereto. But where the evidence which appears to be in conflict is nothing more than a mere scintilla, or where it is met by well-known and recognized scientific facts, about which there is no conflict, this court will still exercise jurisdiction to review and reverse if justice requires."

A careful examination of the statement of facts fails to show any evidence whatever to sustain the following portion of the finding of the court: "And, with the knowledge and consent of appellant, the guests of Benefield used the water-closets above described." Curtis, the only representative of the loan agency who appears to have been at Texarkana about that time, testified positively that he did not authorize Benefield or anyone to use any part of the building which had been leased to McGraw, and that the loan company and its officers never knew until after Fleming was injured that the rooms or closets belonging to it in said building were being used by Benefield or any other person. Benefield testified that Curtis refused to rent him that part of the building, and Brown, the clerk of Benefield, testified that he had no authority from the loan company to use the rooms or any portion of the building that belonged to it. There was no testimony to the contrary of these statements that we can find in the statement of facts. We therefore sustain the objection of the plaintiff in error to that portion of the finding of the court of civil appeals.

The second conclusion above copied rests upon two circumstances alone: (1) The Texas Loan Agency received from the tenants of McGraw, who occupied the first floor of the building, rent due under their contract with McGraw, and credited the amount upon McGraw's account with it for rent; (2) that the accounts of Estes and Watlington, agents of the Texas Loan Agency, show that after the injury had occurred to the deceased, Mr. Fleming, and before the lease was canceled, they made some slight repairs to the building, at a cost of $8. The rent seems to have been collected first on the day that Fleming was injured, at night, the second day of March, 1892. Did the collection from McGraw's tenants of rent due to McGraw operate, by law, a cancellation of McGraw's lease, and the taking of possession of the property by the loan agency? There is no evidence to show that it was intended on the part of the owner of the property to release McGraw, and to resume control of the property itself, but, on the contrary, its acts and declarations made at the time show a different purpose. There is nothing to show that the tenants who occupied the lower floor under leases from McGraw ever agreed to become the tenants of the loan agency, or that any agreement was made by which the leases they held from McGraw should be canceled. The fact that the repairs were made upon the building does not tend to establish the proposition that the owner had resumed control thereof. McGraw had agreed to make repairs, had sublet a portion of the house, as his lease permitted him to do, and had himself attempted to abandon the lease of the building. If repairs were necessary for the protection of the building itself, or for the protection of the subtenants, then it was not inconsistent with plaintiff's claim against McGraw, as its tenant, that it should make the repairs which he had agreed to make, but had failed to do.

Receipt by plaintiff in error of rent due to McGraw from his subtenants, and crediting that upon McGraw's account, was not inconsistent with the continuance of the lease between the landlord and McGraw. Such act did not operate to release McGraw from his contract. It is not claimed that any change was made between McGraw and his tenants, or that the loan agency took actual possession of any part of the premises. Beall v. White, 94 U. S. 382, 24 L. ed. 173; Whitney v. Meyers, 1 Duer, 266; Bedford v. Terhune, 30 N. Y. 453, 86 Am. Dec. 394; Graham v. Whichelo, 1 Crompt. & M. 187. In Beall v. White, above cited, a lease had been made to a firm for a number of years. One member of the firm retired, leaving two as constituting the new firm. The landlord received the rent from the new firm under the old contract, for some years. The retiring partner claimed that he was released by these acts, but the Supreme Court of the United States held that the lease was not canceled by the acts of the landlord.

We doubt if it can be said there is any evidence to sustain the finding of the court of civil appeals that the door out of which deceased walked was open and unlocked at the time the loan agency delivered possession of the house to McGraw; but the fact, if true, is wholly immaterial to the issues involved in this case. The undisputed evidence shows that, when possession was given to McGraw, the opening through which the deceased walked was supplied with a good and suitable shutter, a lock with a key, and a bolt, by which it could be closed up and made entirely safe. McGraw took possession of the house on the 1st of May, 1891, and Fleming received his injury on the 2d of March, 1892,—ten months after the date that possession was delivered to the tenant. If the door had remained open during all the time that intervened between the taking of possession by McGraw and the injury received, that injury would not have been the proximate result of the negligence of the loan agency in not closing the door at the time that it had possession of it, but would be attributable to the negligence of the tenant in failing to close the door and make it safe during the time the property was under his control. We shall therefore discard the fact that the door was not then closed, in the further consideration of this case.

It is said that the door opened out upon space, and was unprovided with bars and guards, and was therefore dangerous in itself. It is a matter of common knowledge that windows are constructed so that the opening comes down about as near to the floor as a door, with sash adjusted upon cords and rollers, by which they can be raised, and, when unsupplied with blinds, are as dangerous in themselves as the door in question. If the opening which caused the injury had been a window supplied with sash, instead of a door with a shutter, the danger would have been just as great as it was in the present instance, and the liability of the landlord would have been the same. There is not in the record any testimony that tends to show that the door in question was unsafe when properly closed and secured; and, in fact, if anyone had testified to such a proposition it would be incredible, as being contrary to well-known physical facts inconsistent with it. Hudson v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 145 N. Y. 412.

The judgment in this case rests solely upon the proposition that the landlord is liable for the negligence of his tenant or other person who may, without authority from him, occupy the premises, and that the failure of such person to use the means which the landlord has furnished to make safe and secure the openings about the building renders the owner liable to the guests of such tenant for damages received by reason of that negligence. It is difficult to argue a proposition so palpably at variance with the well-settled principles of law which determine the liabilities of such parties. We have, however, carefully examined this question, and find that the authorities without exception, so far as we have been able to discover, are in direct opposition to any such claim of liability. The law is that when the landlord leases premises to another, and such premises are in a good and safe condition, he is not liable for any injury which may result by reason of the negligence of the tenant to make use of the means furnished him by which the premises may be maintained in safety for all persons using them. Johnson v. McMillan, 69 Mich. 30; Adams v. Fletcher, 17 R. I. 137; Mellen v. Morrill, 126 Mass. 545, 30 Am. Rep. 695; Leonard v. Storr, 115 Mass. 86, 15 Am. Rep. 76; Handyside v. Powers, 145 Mass. 123; Kalis v. Shattuck, 69 Cal. 593, 58 Am. Rep. 568; White v. Montgomery, 58 Ga. 204; Allen v. Smith, 76 Me. 335; McCarthy v. York County Sav. Bank, 74 Me. 315, 43 Am. Rep. 591; Sargent v. Stark, 12 N. H. 332; Stewart v. Putnam, 127 Mass. 403.

The authorities cited above embrace the following classes of cases: (1) Cases in which the leased premises had water and sewerage fixtures, which were capable of being used safely, but the tenant failed to make use of the means supplied, whereby the premises were overflowed, and property of another injured. (2) Those cases where the premises let abutted upon a public highway, and, for the purpose of supplying the basement of the building with fuel, had coal holes in the sidewalks of the streets, which, when leased, were supplied with the appliances necessary to making them safe and secure for persons walking over them; but the tenant either left the holes open, or failed to make use of the securing appliances, and thereby pedestrians upon the public highway fell into the coal holes, and were injured. (3) Where the premises leased were situated upon public highways, with the roof overhanging the sidewalk, not being supplied with any means for preventing ice which might accumulate upon the roof falling into the street. The tenant failed to relieve the roof of the accumulation of snow and ice, and persons traveling upon the highway were injured by its falling upon them. (4) Where an awning was constructed in front of the leased building for the purpose of shading and protecting it from the weather, but the tenant permitted the awning to be used as a standing place for a number of people, whereby it was broken down, and caused injury to those who were assembled or passing upon the highway beneath it. In all those cases the courts held that the owner of the land was not liable for the negligence of the tenant in failing to use the means supplied to him for protecting others from injury. In the case of Sargent v. Stark, above cited, the landowner had built a dam across a stream, under a law that forbade him, during a given season, to submerge certain lands adjacent to the stream. The dam was built in accordance with law, and provided with water gates, by which the quantity accumulated could be at any time reduced so as not to affect the lands forbidden to be overflowed. The landowner leased the mill and the dam to another, who failed to make use of the gates. The land was overflowed, and suit was brought against the owner. In passing upon the case, the supreme court of New Hampshire said: "There can be no doubt that Stark had a right to build a dam on his own land, of such model and dimensions as he pleased, unless it was so constructed as necessarily to affect the right of his neighbors by overflowing the land above, or by obstructing improperly the passage of water to the land below. . . . We infer from the case that the proprietor of the mills was restricted as to flowage only during a portion of the year. If so, it was only necessary that the water should be properly drawn down during that portion of the year in which his right was limited in this respect. At all events, it is the neglect of the proper control and management of the water, and keeping it within its legal limits, that prejudices the plaintiff, and not the erection of the dam. . . . It will hardly be pretended that the lessor of the mills would be liable for the mismanagement of the water by the lessee. . . . Those only can be rendered liable under the circumstances of this case who were so managing and controlling the water as to cause the injury." That case is directly in point, and clearly announces the true doctrine upon this question. It was no injury to anyone for the loan company to own a house in which there was a door opening out upon space, without bars or guards, provided it had a sufficient shutter to close the opening, and sufficient lock and bolts to secure the shutter in place.

As the supreme court of Michigan said "It was the neglect of those who used the house to properly control and manage" the shutter to the door that caused the injury to Fleming. Modern methods of heating and lighting, furnishing water and sewerage, when used with care, contribute much to the health and comfort of the people, but, by want of care, may be made offensive, dangerous, and destructive to life and property. If the doctrine upon which this case rests should prevail, no property owner could safely lease to another premises thus fitted up for use as hotel building or the like; for, by negligence in using gas, a guest might be asphyxiated, or want of care might introduce poisonous sewer gas into the building, producing death to the customers of the tenant.

The trial court, in effect, charged the jury that if there was a door at the place provided with a shutter, with lock and key, but it was not closed and secured at the time the lease was made and possession delivered to McGraw, then the loan agency would be responsible for the injury received. The trial court erred in submitting the case to the jury with such instructions, and the court of civil appeals erred in affirming the judgment.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the District Court and of the Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and that this cause be remanded for further trial.

OREGON SHORT-LINE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

- *1. The amount of damages is a fact to be found by the jury, and, if there be any evidence to support the verdict, the court is not at liberty, under the Constitution of this state, to set it aside.
2. The general rule in tort is that the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for all injuries which are the natural and proximate consequences of, or can be traced to, the injury complained of. Such are termed "general damages," and may be proved under the general allegation of damage in the complaint. Special damages are those which are not the probable and natural result of the injury, and must be specially pleaded. A plaintiff is not required to aver all the physical injuries which he sustained, or which might have resulted from or be aggravated by the wrongful act of defendant.

in force in Utah, but the rule as to champertous contracts was modified by the provisions of § 3683 Utah Comp. Laws 1888, which provided that "the measure and mode of compensation of attorneys and counsellors at law, is left to the agreement, express or implied, of the parties." Under this statute it was competent for attorney and client to agree that the attorney's compensation should be contingent upon success, and payable, by percentage or otherwise, out of the proceeds of the litigation. It was not competent for the attorney, in consideration thereof, to agree to pay the fees and costs of suit thereafter to be commenced, but one who was not a party to such contract has no right to question its validity.

Mr. Parley L. Williams, for appellant: The damages awarded are excessive.

The damages assessed are against the clear weight of the evidence and so manifestly wrong as to leave no reasonable inference that the amount of damages awarded were justified.

If a complaint contained no more definite statement of injury than that a plaintiff was permanently injured, it would be bad upon special demurrer, for failure to set out in sufficient detail and describe the particular injuries, but a special demurrer to the complaint in this case would not have been sustained, for the allegation is that the plaintiff, by reason of the negligence alleged, "became greatly and permanently injured, cut, and disfigured in and upon his head, back, arms, and legs," and, further, that he was internally injured in the region of his back and abdomen.

There is no definite allegation at all of other injuries.

The plaintiff was not entitled to introduce evidence of injuries other than those sufficiently described in the complaint, to enable the defendant to know the particular matters he was required to meet.

Peck v. Heurich, 167 U. S. 624, 42 L. ed. 302.

Messrs. Evans & Rogers and A. G. Horn for respondent.

Miner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought against the railroad company to recover damages for an injury to plaintiff's person received on April 3, 1897, at Malad Bridge, in Idaho, at which time the train on which plaintiff was a passenger was derailed. The plaintiff alleges that the accident was occasioned because defendant negligently maintained an inadequate switch, side track, and roadbed, and negligently and carelessly ran its train at a great and dangerous rate of speed, by reason of which the train was thrown from the track, and plaintiff became greatly and permanently injured. Upon a trial the jury found a verdict of $5,000 in favor of the plaintiff. This appeal is from the judgment, and the order overruling defendant's motion for a new trial.

1. The appellant contends that the damages assessed are excessive, against the clear weight of the evidence, and so manifestly wrong as to show the amount of the verdict was unjust and influenced by prejudice and passion. Upon an examination of the testimony, we find that there was evidence upon which the jury could find a verdict for the plaintiff, although conflicting as to the nature of plaintiff's injuries. In such case it has been invariably held by this court that the amount of the damages is a fact to be found by the jury from all the evidence in the case, and if there be any evidence to support the findings or verdict, this court is not at liberty, under the Constitution of this state, to review alleged errors in avoiding it. In such case the court will consider the evidence only so far as may be necessary to determine the question of law. Nelson v. Southern P. Co. 15 Utah, 328; Walley v. Deseret Nat. Bank. 14 Utah, 313; Watson v. Mayberry. 15 Utah, 275; Harrington v. Eureka Hill Min. Co. 17 Utah, 300; Mangum v. Bullion, B. & C. Min. Co. 15 Utah, 536; Anderson v. Daly Min. Co. 15 Utah, 23; State v. Halford. 17 Utah, —, 54 Pac. 819; Reese v. Morgan Silver Min. Co. 17 Utah, —, 54 Pac. 759.

2. The plaintiff, under objection and exception, was permitted to testify on redirect examination that his memory was poorer than it was before the injury; and under like objection, that the testimony was not within the allegations of the complaint, the plaintiff was permitted to testify that there was a difference in his eyesight after his relapse, and that he could not see out of his right eye. The witness had made contradictory statements concerning several matters of injury, indicating an absence of correct recollection; and counsel for the plaintiff contends that the question as to memory was asked for the purpose of explaining apparent contradictions in his testimony, and that the testimony concerning plaintiff's eyesight after his discharge from the hospital was offered for the purpose of basing a hypothetical question to medical experts who afterwards testified in the case; the contention being that the relapse was a partial stroke of paralysis on the right side, caused by an injured spine, and not an epileptic fit, as contended for by the appellant. It does not appear that any demurrer had been interposed to the complaint for uncertainty or otherwise. In its charge to the jury the court limited the damages to the allegations of the injuries set forth in the complaint, and no reference was made to the loss of eyesight or memory. We think the testimony was competent under the claim of counsel, and also under the complaint filed. The result of the injury charged in the complaint, and traceable to the wrongful act, was that the plaintiff became greatly and permanently injured, cut, and disfigured in and on his back, head, and arms, and that he received injuries in other parts of his body, and was internally injured in the region of his back and abdomen, and that, by reason of such injuries so received, plaintiff became sick, sore, and disordered, and crippled for life, from which injuries he suffered great mental distress, and was unable to follow his usual avocation. Judge Sutherland, in his work on Damages (3 Sutherland, Damages, 2d ed. 2661, 2662), says: "The general rule in tort is that the party who commits a trespass or other wrongful act is liable for all the direct injury resulting, although such injury could not have been contemplated as the probable result of the act done. The plaintiff may show specific, direct effects of the injury without specially alleging them; as that he was thereby made subject to fits. If they were a part of the result of the injury, the plaintiff may recover for such damage without specially alleging it, as well as the pain and disability which followed. The obviously probable effects of the injury may be given in evidence, though not laid in the declaration. Thus, where one of the direct consequences of a wound was the loss of the power to have offspring, evidence of that fact was admissible, though the declaration did not specifically designate that consequence." In Johnson v. McKee, 27 Mich. 471, the court said: "The battery consisted in striking McKee with a chair, whereby certain injuries were inflicted on his face and head, and in consequence of which he was seriously, and, as is claimed, permanently, affected. Among other results, there was evidence that he suffered from urinary difficulties caused or aggravated by the blow. It was claimed this injury was not within the terms of the declaration, and could not be shown without express averment. If the evidence showed any such resulting injury, it showed it to have been as closely connected with the blow as any of the other evil consequences. It was a sickness produced by it in the same way as the swelling and soreness in the head and eyes, and the other grievances about which no question was made on the trial. The declaration charges sickness and pain to have been among the sufferings caused by means of the assault, and we do not think the rules of pleading require any more specific description than was given. We need not inquire how far it was requisite to go in declaring for consequences not necessarily following such an injury, because these consequences are very clearly set forth. When the defendant was informed that damages were sought for sickness and disorder and their attendant expenses, as well as for wounds and bruises, he was bound to expect evidence of any sickness the origin or aggravation of which could be traced to the act complained of." This seems to be the better and well-settled doctrine, although there are cases to the contrary. Manley v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 69 Vt. 101; Keyser v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 86 Mich. 400; Welch v. Ware, 32 Mich. 77; Tyson v. Booth, 100 Mass. 258; Snyder v. Albion, 113 Mich. 275; Montgomery v. Lansing City Electric R. Co. 103 Mich. 46, 29 L. R. A. 287; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Hecht, 115 Ind. 443; Ehrgott v. New York, 96 N. Y. 264, 48 Am. Rep. 622; Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Harris, 122 U. S. 597, 30 L. ed. 1146; Chicago v. McLean, 133 Ill. 148, 8 L. R. A. 765. The plaintiff is always entitled to recover all damages which are the natural and proximate consequence of, and are traceable to, the act complained of; and those damages which are probable, traceable to, and necessarily result from, the injury are termed general, and may be shown under the general allegation of the complaint. Only those damages which are not the probable and necessary result of the injury are termed "special," and are required to be stated specially in the complaint. The plaintiff was not required to aver all the physical injuries which he sustained, or which might have resulted from or be aggravated by the wrongful act complained of. If such injuries can be traced to the act complained of, and are such as would naturally follow from the injury, they need not be specially averred. Chicago v. McLean, 133 Ill. 148, 8 L. R. A. 765; Montgomery v. Lansing City Electric R. Co. 103 Mich. 46, 29 L. R. A. 287. When the defendant was informed of the injury to plaintiff's head and back, and that he was greatly and permanently injured in his body, and internally injured in his back and abdomen, by reason of which plaintiff became sick, sore, disordered, and crippled for life, from which injuries he suffered great mental distress and physical pain, he was bound to expect evidence of any sickness or injury to plaintiff, of memory or eyesight, the origin or aggravation of which could be traced to the negligent act complained of. This rule does not in any sense overturn the well-established one that where damages are special they must be specially averred in the complaint.

3. It is contended that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, as requested by the defendant, as follows: "The court instructs you that in this case the plaintiff has entered into a contract with his attorneys whereby he agrees to give them 40 per cent of whatever sum may be recovered herein, and the said attorneys agree, for said consideration, not only to render their services as attorneys herein to the plaintiff, but in addition thereto to pay the costs required to be advanced to the clerk, the sheriff for serving summons, and whatever may be necessary to pay the fare of witnesses from Idaho to the place of trial. This constitutes an unlawful maintaining of plaintiff's case, and 44 L. R. A.

is contrary to law, and the said contract reaches to and affects the entire interest of the plaintiff in the case; and in consequence of said unlawful agreement the said plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action, and you are therefore instructed to return a verdict for the defendant." Defendant contends that the alleged contract, claimed to be champertous, was entered into between the plaintiff and his counsel May 15, 1897. At this time § 3683, Utah Comp. Laws 1888, was in force. This section provides: "The measure and mode of compensation of attorneys and counsellors at law is left to the agreement, express or implied, of the parties." Under this statute the mode and manner of compensation were expressly left to the agreement, express or implied, between counsel and client, and no legal restrictions were placed upon their agreement or compensation at the time their contract was made. Although the common law was in force in this state at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, so far as compatible with our situation and government, as held in Deeriet Irrig. Co. v. McIntyre, 16 Utah, 398; People v. Green, 1 Utah, 11; Thomas v. Union P. R. Co. 1 Utah, 232; Church of Jesus Christ of L. D. S. v. United States, 136 U. S. 62, 34 L. ed. 498; American Pub. Co. v. Fisher, 166 U. S. 464, 41 L. ed. 1079; Rev. Stat. 1898, § 2488,—still it is believed that its force, as applied to champertous contracts, was modified by the passage of § 3683, above quoted. Section 135, Rev. Stat. 1898, was not in force when this contract was made. Under § 3683, it was competent for an attorney and client to agree upon the attorney's compensation; and such compensation may be made contingent upon success, and payable, by percentage or otherwise, out of the proceeds of the litigation. But it was not competent for the attorney, in consideration thereof, to agree to pay the advance fees and costs of the suit thereafter to be commenced. Fowler v. Gallan, 102 N. Y. 395. "The English common law and statutes against maintenance and champerty had their origin, if not their necessity, in a different state of society from that which prevails at the present time. When the doctrine was established, lords and other large landholders were accustomed to buy up contested claims against each other, or against commoners with whom they were at variance, in order to harass and oppose those in possession. On the other hand, commoners, by way of self-defense, thinking that they had title to lands, would convey part of their interest to some powerful lord, in order, through his influence, to secure their pretended right. The want of sufficient written conveyances, and records of titles, and the feudal relation of vassal and liege lord, afforded facilities for the combinations and oppressions which followed this state of things. The power of the nobles became mighty in corrupting the fountains of justice. To remedy these evils the law against both maintenance and champerty was introduced." It is held in Courtright v. Burnes, 3 McCrary, 60, 13 Fed. Rep. 317: "The tendency in the courts of . . . [the United States] is strongly in the direction of relaxing the [stringency of the] common-law doctrine concerning champerty and maintenance, so as to permit greater liberty of contracting between attorney and client than was formerly allowed, and this for the reason that the peculiar condition of society which gave rise to the doctrine has in a great measure passed away. In some of the states the common-law rule is altogether repudiated, and it is held that no such contract is now invalid unless it contravenes some existing statute of the state. Sedgwick v. Stanton, 14 N. Y. 289; Voorhees v. Dorr, 51 Barb. 580; Richardson v. Rowland, 40 Conn. 565; Mathewson v. Fitch, 22 Cal. 86; Hoffman v. Vallejo, 45 Cal. 564; Lytle v. State, 17 Ark. 609."

4. If it be conceded that the common law, as modified, was in force at the time the contract was made, and that it was of a champertous character, and therefore void, yet it appears that the contract was entered into between the plaintiff and his attorney, and that the defendant was in no way a party thereto. The defendant, being a stranger to the contract, had no right to question its validity in a collateral attack. There seems to be no sound reason in a rule which would allow a party to defeat a just cause of action because the opposite party has made a contract which is absolutely void, and which therefore cannot be enforced by either of the contracting parties. As to the defendant the rights of the parties are the same as if the illegal contract had never been executed. The champertous contract, being void, would devert the plaintiff of no cause of action. He is still the real party in interest. While the parties to the illegal contract might be allowed to repudiate it, other persons, not parties to it, should not be permitted to exonerate themselves from their just obligations on account of it. If, for instance, a defendant, when sued upon his valid promissory note, can avoid payment thereof, and interpose a bar to a recovery, by showing that the plaintiff made a champertous contract with his attorney for its collection, then is a meritorious plaintiff placed, to a large extent, at the mercy of a dishonest debtor. Under such circumstances it does not lie in the mouth of the defendant to set up that fact for the purpose of escaping the payment of an honest debt, or avoiding a just liability. The law in such a case will compel the defendant to perform his undertaking, and leave the question of champerty to be determined between the plaintiff and his attorney. We are of the opinion that the defendant is not in a position to avoid a legal obligation because the plaintiff and his attorney may have entered into a champertous contract to enforce the obligation. Small v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 55 Iowa, 582; Hoffman v. Vallejo, 45 Cal. 564; Burnes v. Scott, 117 U. S. 582, 29 L. ed. 991; Duke v. Harper, 66 Mo. 51, 37 Am. Rep. 314; Thalhimer v. Brinckerhoff, 3 Cow. 623, 15 Am. Dec. 309; Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet. 177, 9 L. ed. 388; Hilton v. Woods, L. R. 4 Eq. 432; Elborough v. Ayres, L. R. 10 Eq. 367; Allison v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 42 Iowa, 274; Pike v. Martindale, 91 Mo. 268; Court-right v. Burnes, 13 Fed. Rep. 317. There are cases holding a contrary doctrine, but we believe the above rule to be sustained by the great weight of authority. We are of the opinion that the court properly refused to give the instruction requested by the defendant.

5. There is still another reason why the instruction should not have been given to the jury: It appears that the defendant did not set up in its answer the plea of champertous contract. It is a rule well settled that, in proper cases, when such contracts are questioned between the parties who make them, a plea or answer of the fact upon the part of the defendant is necessary in order to make the defense availing. This rule will apply in this case. Moore v. Ringo. 82 Mo. 468; Pike v. Martindale, 91 Mo. 268; Brumback v. Oldham, 1 Idaho, 710; Allison v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 42 Iowa, 274; McMullen v. Guest, 6 Tex. 275; Suit v. Woodhall, 116 Mass. 547.

Upon the whole record we find no reversible error. The judgment of the District Court is affirmed, with costs.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Smyth County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the value of certain lambs which were alleged to have died because of defendant's negligence in permitting them to drink salt water. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bolling & Stanley for plaintiff in error.

provide suitable and necessary means and facilities for receiving live stock offered to it for shipment over its road and connections, as well as for discharging such stock after it reaches the place to which it is consigned. Covington Stock-Yards Co. v. Keith, 139 U. S. 128, 35 L. ed. 78; Kincaid v. Kansas City C. & S. R. Co. 62 Mo. App. 365.

As incidental to its business of transporting or hauling cattle, a railroad company must provide the means of loading, unloading, and caring for them pending their delivery to the consignee; the hauling from one point to another, and providing the car, track, engine, and servants for that purpose, are no more a part of the service rendered by the carrier than are the loading and unloading and the providing of appliances and servants for those purposes. Walker v. Keenan, 34 U. S. App. 691, 73 Fed. Rep. 755, 19 C. C. A. 668.

The duty of a carrier of live stock to receive, transport and deliver it is not fully discharged unless the carrier makes provision at the place of loading to properly receive and load the stock, and provision at the place of unloading to properly deliver the stock to the consignee. Covington Stock-Yards Co. v. Keith, 139 U. S. 128, 35 L. ed. 78.

It is a matter of common knowledge that railroad carriers provide stockpens as a means of receiving at their stations live stock for shipment, and that it is part of their mode of transportation, and the rule as to the safety of a car is applicable to stock pens, each, of course, governed by the uses for which they are intended. McCullough v. Wabash Western R. Co. 34 Mo. App. 23.

And a railroad company carrying live stock is liable for damages resulting from a breach of its implied duty to furnish safe pens in which stock is to be placed preparatory to its transportation. Mason v. Missouri P. R. Co. 25 Mo. App. 473.

A railroad company carrying live stock is bound to keep its stock yards in a reasonably safe and secure condition for the purposes intended, and where it permits the fence surrounding the yard to become weak, rotten, and defective, by reason of which a shipper's cattle escape and run away and are injured, the railroad company is responsible for such injury. Cooke v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 57 Mo. App. 471.

So, in Kansas P. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 8 Kan. 623, it was said that to insure the safe transportation of live stock the carrier thereof is required to have yards and stables with conven-

Messrs. James L. White, John A. Buchanan, and B. F. Buchanan, for defendants in error:

The injury was done at Saltville, the initial shipping point and on the premises and in the loading pens of the defendant company, the regular place provided by the company for loading, and where the loading was required to be done. The railroad company is responsible for such injury.

Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Sutherland, 89 Va. 703.

The railroad company cannot contract against its own negligence.

Virginia & T. R. Co. v. Sayers, 26 Gratt. 328; Wilson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 21 Gratt. 654.

When a railroad holds itself out as a carrier of live stock it is obliged to provide suitable facilities, such as yards or pens for receiving and discharging the stock, and for these it may not in addition to the custo-quired to have yards and stables with conveniences for feeding both at the termini and along the route, as well as a corps of experienced stockmen to take care of them in transit, and that the duty to maintain them is an incident to the employment, and not an element to determine its character.

Texas Rev. Stat. art. 4236, providing that railway companies are required to erect at every depot, station, or place established for the reception and delivery of freight suitable buildings or inclosures to protect produce, goods, wares, and merchandise, and freight of every description from damage by exposure to the weather or otherwise, requires railway companies to keep pens for the shipment of cattle. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Trawick, 80 Tex. 270.

So, a railroad company carrying live stock is bound to provide a reasonably safe chute leading from the stock pen into the car, with which to load stock. McCullough v. Wabash Western R. Co. 34 Mo. App. 23.

And it is its duty to keep the chute in a reasonably safe condition. Kincaid v. Kansas City, C. & S. R. Co. 62 Mo. App. 365.

II. Application generally.

A railroad accepting stock for shipment is liable to the shipper thereof for damages resulting from its inability speedily to forward them, by reason of which it became necessary to unload them for care, feed, and water, which it undertook to do by its own servants, but overcrowded them in pens while it kept the pens and hydrants locked so that the agents and servants of the shipper could not give them personal attention. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Frost (Tex. Civ. App.) 34 S. W. 167.

And where a train upon which cattle were being transported was stopped by drifts and backed to a station, and the cattle unloaded by the trainmen and put in a yard from which some of them escaped and died on the prairie, and the yard was insufficient in strength or size to ordinarily prevent cattle from escaping, and the escape was without the fault of the owner, the railroad company is liable therefor; but if they were thus unloaded with the consent of the owner, and were in his charge at the time of the loss, no recovery can be had. Chapin v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 79 Iowa, 582.

And where cattle were delivered to a railroad company for carriage, and loaded but not started on their journey because of a heavy snow storm, not at the place of shipment, but in the mary and legitimate charges for transportation make a special charge.

23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 902.

Riely, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants in error, on June 13, 1891, delivered to the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company two lots of lambs to be transported to Jersey City, in the state of New Jersey. One lot was received by the railroad company at its station at Saltville, Virginia, and the other lot at Pounding Mill, in Tazewell county, Virginia. A large number of the lambs having died on the route, the owners charged that their death was caused by the negligence of the railroad company, and brought suit to recover damages for the loss sustained. The railroad company having undertaken to furnish a stock pen at Saltville for the purpose of enabling shippers of live-stock to load the same upon its cars, its negligence upon which the plaintiff's right of action was founded, consisted, it was alleged in the declaration, in not furnishing a suitable stock pen and maintaining it in a good and safe condition, but permitting salt water or brine, which was poisonous and dangerous to stock, when drunk by them, to be in the pen, whereby the lambs had access to and drank of it, and sickened and died.

When a railroad company holds itself out as a carrier of live stock, the law imposes upon it the duty to provide suitable and safe facilities, such as yards or pens, both at the place of shipment and the place of destination, for receiving and discharging the live stock offered to it for shipment over its road. Covington Stock-Yards Co. v. Keith, 139 U. S. 128, 35 L. ed. 73; 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 902. It appears from the certificate of the evidence that the railroad company did provide at its station at Saltville, from which one of the lots of lambs was shipped, a stock direction towards which they were to be carried, and the agents of the company took charge of the cattle and put them in stockyards having no suitable sheds or other protection, whereby some were frozen and some died, the injury will be held to have been caused by want of proper care of the carrier and its agents, and not by inevitable accident as the direct cause. Felnerberg v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 52 N. J. L. 451.

So, a carrier bringing cattle to their destination after a delay of six hours, arriving after dark at a place where the pens are small, and not sufficient to hold the cattle, is liable to the owner for the damages caused, where it refuses a request of the owner to procure the pens of another company which are large enough, but drives them into the small pen until they trample each other, when the gates are opened and they are allowed to escape, and some of them are lost. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. York, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 813, p. 718.

And evidence that pens in which a shipper was obliged to place his horses en route were muddy, boggy, supplied with no troughs or racks in which to feed, and that the provender ordered for them was trampled in the muddy ground by the stock and did them little good, and that he did not have frequent opportunities to unload and feed the carrier refusing to stop for such purpose, is sufficient to warrant a recovery for injuries to the stock on the ground of negligence. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Ivy, 79 Tex. 444. And see HARMAN & CROCKETT v. NORFOLK & W. R. Co.

So, an instruction in an action against a carrier by a shipper for injury to stock shipped, that under a contract to receive the stock and transport it it devolved upon the railway company to provide all necessary stock pens at the place where the cattle were to be received to enable the shipper to load the stock, and that if it failed to provide such necessary pens within a reasonable time after they were at the place of delivery, and injury resulted therefrom, the company would be liable for damages resulting therefrom, is not subject to the objection that it required the railway company to give that shipper preference over any other shipper in the use of the pens, though other shippers might have equal or better rights to first service. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Woods (Tex. Civ. App.) 31 S. W. 237, 2 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. N. S. 519.

An instruction in an action against a carrier for damage to a shipment of mules, placing the 44 L. R. A.

inability of the plaintiff to recover on his failure to notify the defendant to have the cars containing the mules switched up to the chute of the stock pens until after the engine pulling the train had left the place, is properly refused as ignoring the duty of the defendant to have proper machinery and facilities for unloading stock to be fed when, in the course of transit, it may be necessary to do so, and as assuming, as matter of law, that the engine remained a reasonable time after the plaintiff obtained information, giving rise to the necessity for unloading. Dunn v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 68 Mo. 268.

So, a defect in a platform causing an injury to a horse in attempting to load him on the cars in a station in the stock lot used by the company for the purpose of loading and unloading stock will not excuse the railroad company from liability for the injury in the absence of full diligence to discover the defect before exposing the horse to the injury. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Herrman, 92 Ga. 384.

And a railroad company carrying live stock which furnishes a shipper, for loading cattle and hogs, with a chute, the bottom of which is covered with ice, is not relieved from liability for injuries caused thereby by the fact that its condition was due to the effects of a general storm which affected the whole surrounding country. Kincaid v. Kansas City, C. & S. R. Co. 62 Mo. App. 365.

And the dangerous condition of such a chute furnished by a railroad company, the floor of which was covered with ice, is the proximate cause of an injury to the shipper, where while driving the stock up the chute, one steer slipped against another, causing the latter to fall on him and break his leg. Ibid.

So, the mere fact that a cattle pen at a station was not capable of holding hogs securely will not justify the conductor of a train carrying a carload of cattle and hogs in refusing to allow the car to be switched and lay out, where the train had been delayed and the cattle were found to be suffering, and there was nothing to show that the railroad company was not under the duty of having a pen safe for hogs as well as cattle. Johnston v. Alabama & V. R. Co. 69 Miss. 191.

And a defense, in an action against a carrier by a shipper for negligently permitting its pens from which his pigs were shipped to be covered with lime, whereby his pigs were injured, that the lime was placed upon such pens under the provision of the contagious diseases pen and a force pen, to enable shippers of live stock to load the stock on their cars. In the stock pen was a culvert, which was made to convey the water from a fresh-water spring, and about one third of the culvert, at each end, was broken in and uncovered. There was a tank of salt water on the hill side, above the pen, from which the salt water escaped, and flowed into the pen and into the culvert. Many of the lambs, when put into the pen to be loaded, although the loading was done as rapidly as possible, drank of the salt water, in spite of the efforts of the men engaged in loading them to prevent it. It is shown by the evidence that Harman & Crockett had bought the lambs from persons in the surrounding country, who delivered the lambs at the railroad station for shipment, and that Harman & Crockett knew nothing of there being salt water in the pen until they learned the fact after the disaster had happened to their stock. But it was known by the railroad company's agent at its station at Saltville. The lambs, which were shipped from Saltville, left there on the cars about 5 o'clock in the afternoon, and arrived at Lynchburg at 11 o'clock the next morning. Mr. Crockett, one of the owners, met them at Lynchburg, and had them unloaded for the purpose of feeding and watering them. He fed them some hay, but finding them very thirsty and feverish, he turned the water off, and they got very little, if any, at that point. They arrived in Baltimore the next day, when they were found to be still so very thirsty that they could hardly be gotten away from the water, and were in bad condition, and looking as if sick. When they arrived at Baltimore, the two lots were unloaded, and turned into the feeding pens together, and became intermingled. At Baltimore they commenced to die, and by the time they arrived at Jersey City, the next day eighty-five had died on the route. Sixty-of animals act of 1878, whereby every loading pen was required to be disinfected before using, is not sufficient to exonerate the carrier, as the defense admits that the pens in which the pigs were placed were improper for their reception, and there is nothing to show that under the provisions of the act it was impossible to have safer pens. Shaw v. Great Southern & W. R. Co. Ir. L. R. 8 C. L. 10.

So, the negligence of a railroad company in maintaining a stock pen the gate of which had defective fastenings is the proximate cause of an injury to cattle resulting from their escape from being stampeded by the noise of a passing train and frightened so that they burst open the gate, and the company is liable for such injury. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Bigham, 90 Tex. 223.

But where a shipper of stock confines cattle in the stock pens of a railroad company preparatory to shipment, and the appliances for fastening the pen are defective, and, to prevent the escape of the cattle, the shipper attempts to fasten it with a rope, when the cattle are stampeded by the noise of a passing train causing them to rush against the gate, whereby it is thrown open and the shipper seriously injured, the negligence of the company in permitting the gate to remain in a defective condition is not the proximate cause of the injury, and the shipper cannot recover in an action therefor against the carrier. Ibid.

And to warrant a recovery by a shipper for loss of weight of stock by reason of a failure of the carrier to supply sufficient pens for loading, it must appear that the loss in weight occurred by reason of such failure, and the recovery cannot include loss in weight from any other cause. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Woods (Tex. Civ. App.) 31 S. W. 237, 2 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. N. S. 519.

And the liability of a railroad company whose train, which contained a car loaded with cattle, was stopped by drifts and backed to a station, and the cattle unloaded and placed in an insecure pen, rests upon its negligence in placing the cattle in an insecure place, and if the loss did not occur in consequence of such negligence the company is not liable. Chaplin v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 79 Iowa, 582.

Under the Texas statute requiring safe and suitable pens to be provided by a railroad company it is liable for damages resulting from defective pens due to its negligence. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Jackson (Tex. Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 255.

III. Commencement and termination of risk.

The liability of a railroad company begins from the time it receives stock in its pens for shipment. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Jackson (Tex. Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 255.

And the delivery by a shipper of a horse at a stock pen and on a chute provided by the railroad company for loading stock, and designated by its agents as appliances to be used in loading, is a sufficient delivery to charge the company with liability if the horse is injured, because the chute is in a rotten and defective condition. McCullough v. Wabash Western R. Co. 34 Mo. App. 23.

So, the delivery and reception of hogs in the stock pens of a railroad company for transportation is equivalent to a contract to transport them without unnecessary delay, and renders the railroad company liable for injuries from delay caused by a lack of rolling stock or otherwise. Pruitt v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 62 Mo. 527.

And a railroad company which enters into an agreement with a shipper to carry cattle, and directs him where he should place them preparatory to their transfer, in obedience to which direction he delivers the stock in the railway's cattle pens, becomes from the moment of the delivery a carrier as to such stock, and its responsibility as such then attaches: the deposit being a mere accessory to the carriage. Liability is not postponed until the time when the stock shall be actually put in motion. Mason v. Missouri P. R. Co. 25 Mo. App. 473.

And the refusal of a railroad company to ship cattle from a station after they had been delivered according to the terms of the contract of shipment at stockyards of the company at that station and placed in such stockyards, relieves the shipper from the necessity of making any further delivery or offer to deliver. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Godman, 104 Ind. 490.

So, cattle which had been placed in the stock pen of a railroad company by direction of the company's agent for the purpose of immediate shipment, which escaped through a defect in the pen while the work of putting the herd on board the cars was actually going on and nearly half of them had already been loaded, must be considered to have been received by the carrier for shipment, rendering it responsible for them as a common carrier. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Tarwick, 80 Tex. 270.

And in Moffat v. Great Western R. Co. 15 L. T. N. S. 630, which was an action for dam-

one more died the following night, and others were sick, which very materially affected the sale of those that had survived. It appears from the certificate of the evidence, as testified to by men of large experience in the live-stock business that it is dangerous to animals to give salt to them, and then let them have free access to water; that the salt creates an intense thirst, which causes the animals—especially lambs—to drink immoderately of the water, the effect of which is to produce sickness, from which they are liable to die. It being proved that the stock pen at its station at Saltville was the means provided by the railroad company to enable shippers to load their live stock on its cars, and that it permitted salt water to be in the pens, accessible to the lambs, the company had not performed its legal duty to furnish and maintain suitable and safe facilities to shippers for receiving their stock for shipment. It was therefore guilty of negligence, and liable to the plaintiffs for such loss as was caused by its negligence. It appearing from the evidence that salt water is dangerous to live stock when drunk by them; that it was in the stock pen at Saltville, into which the lambs had to be driven for the purpose of loading them on the cars; that the lambs, while being loaded, drank of it; that they were in good condition when put into the cars; and that they soon thereafter became very thirsty and feverish, and affected like stock that had been made sick by drinking water after being salted,—the jury were clearly justified in finding that this was the cause of their death.

It was argued by the plaintiff in error that it assumed no other liability than the safe carriage and delivery of the stock to its connecting line at Lynchburg, that it did this, and that its liability then ceased. This defense cannot avail, for the evidence shows that the injury was done at Saltville, the ages to a horse in which the animal on arriving at the station was put in the horse box and tied up, after which one of the porters hearing a noise found that she had got her foot into the manger in front of her and then slipped, and before the porter could get a knife to cut the rope in which she was entangled had strangled to death, the court laid down the rule that the carrier was liable if guilty of negligence in the carriage of the horse, meaning thereby its treatment of the animal from the moment it took it into custody, but that it was not responsible for accidents of a nature beyond the range of ordinary risks.

A railroad company is not liable, however, for damages due to the escape of cattle from its cattle pens where they had been placed there by permission of its agent but had not been received for shipment, and no bill of lading had been given. Fort Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Riley (Tex. App.) 1 S. W. 446, 27 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 49.

And a refusal by a railroad company to receive and carry cattle cannot be predicated upon the fact that the train was not held until the cattle, which had escaped, could be recovered, where there is nothing to show that the means for loading was not in a proper condition, and the duty of loading rested with the shipper. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Godman, 104 Ind. 490.

And a shipper of hogs who arrived at the station from which he desired to ship, too late for the train on which he expected to ship them, the hogs not being then in the yards or on the depot grounds, but in a private yard in no way controlled or used by the carrier, cannot complain of the refusal of the carrier to delay the train at the station until the hogs could be driven into the stock yards and loaded, and cannot recover damages for such refusal. Frazier v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 48 Iowa, 571.

And the fact that the agent of a carrier told a shipper a few days previous that he need not load two cars he then had there until the train arrived does not estop the carrier from insisting upon a compliance with the usual custom as to future shipments of a greater number of carloads of stock. Ibid.

So, the obligation of a railroad carrying stock ceases as a common carrier when it has delivered the stock at its place of destination and unloaded from its cars and stored it in its proper place after which it is merely required to see that it is properly cared for and to deliver it to the shipper or his consignees. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Pratt, 13 Ill. App. 477.

And the liability of a railroad company as carrier of livestock under a clause in a shipping contract limiting its liability to losses occurring on its own line, ends upon the refusal of the connecting carrier to receive it when it has been placed in pens at the end of its line, its liability then shifting to that of custodian of the property or forwarding agent, which involves only reasonable care of the property while it is held for delivery, and its liability for causing the live stock, consisting of hogs, to be stored in infected pens depends upon the exercise of ordinary care or reasonable diligence. Larimore v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 65 Mo. App. 167.

So, the failure to maintain fences along the line of a railway and between it and other premises of the railway company is not a cause for complaint which will render it liable for damages arising from the fact that cattle in their transit from the railroad to the highway and while passing through the station yard were frightened by a porter with a lantern, without fault on his part, so that one of them ran upon the railroad and was killed. Roberts v. Great Western R. Co. 4 Jur. N. S. 1240, 4 C. B. N. S. 506, 27 L. J. C. P. N. S. 266.

And a railroad company transporting a horse under a contract that it will not be answerable for damage, which lands the horse safely at its destination and ties it in a horse-box, where it is left in an exposed situation for twenty-four hours and seriously injured thereby, owing to the fact that the owner has forgotten it, is not liable for such damages. Wise v. Great Western R. Co. 1 Hurst. & N. 63, 25 L. J. Exch. N. S. 258.

And a railroad company which carried cattle to their destination, and arriving on Sunday morning, owing to a police regulation, the owner was unable to take them away that day, whereupon they were placed in the defendant's pens, and two of them died during their confinement, and he was prevented on the next day from taking the other away because of his refusal to sign a receipt for the whole number, ended its liability as a carrier upon the delivery of the cattle in the yard, and is not liable for the loss of the cattle which died or for injury to the rest from the delay or from a fall in the market price. Shepherd v. Bristol & E. R. Co. L. R. 3 Exch. 189, 37 L. J. Exch. N. S. 113, 18 L. T. N. S. 528, 16 Week. Rep. 982.

shipping point, and in the pen it had provided to enable shippers to load their stock in its cars.

It was also urged that under the printed contract of shipment the railroad company was not responsible for any injury to the stock until they were "loaded into the car, and the car door fastened or secured by the conductor." It failed, as we have seen, to furnish and maintain suitable facilities for receiving the live stock, of which it held itself out as a public carrier. Such failure was negligence, and a common carrier cannot contract for exemption from liability for

R. 9 Exch. 132, 43 L. J. Exch. N. S. 89, 30 L. T. N. S. 562, in which a railroad company carried a horse to its destination, and finding no one there to take it, and having no pen at that place placed it in a livery stable, it was held that its duty as a carrier then ended, and that where the owner unreasonably refused to take the horse from the livery stable, and the carrier afterwards took him and sent him to the owner, paying the charges of the livery-stable keeper, it was entitled to recover them from the owner.

Where a railroad company does not provide suitable facilities for the delivery of live stock contracted to be carried by it, however, it may be compelled to deliver through facilities furnished by the consignee. Covington Stockyards Co. v. Keith, 139 U. S. 128, 35 L. ed. 73.

So, where a patron of a railroad company has extended a track of his own from the track of the company to his premises and there equipped a station for unloading, there is no obligation on the part of the railroad company to such person or his patrons to provide a depot on its line for the unloading of cattle consigned to his yards. Walker v. Keenan, 34 U. S. App. 691, 73 Fed. Rep. 755, 19 C. C. A. 668.

The question whether a carrier of horses failed to exercise due care in keeping them after arrival at the place of destination for some time upon a plank floor in consequence of their having been previously confined for some time in the car, and whether such confinement would necessarily result in injury, are questions of fact for the jury, and evidence that it was customary to keep horses upon plank floors in that locality, and that it was impracticable to keep them upon earth floors, is admissible in an action for damages therefor. Moses v. Port Townsend Southern R. Co. 5 Wash. 595.

IV. Effect of contributory negligence.

Contributory negligence of a shipper which will relieve a railway company from liability for making defective pens cannot be founded upon his knowledge of their unfitness. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Jackson (Tex. Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 255.

A railroad company cannot absolve itself from its statutory duty to keep suitable pens for the shipment of cattle by showing that they were so badly kept or constructed as to make it contributory negligence upon the part of the shipper to use them. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Trawick, 80 Tex. 270.

And knowledge of the unsafe condition of an apron or platform connecting a stock chute with a stock car into which cattle are being driven by a shipper in the exercise of due care will not prevent him from recovering for injuries received from a defect by reason of which the apron gave way and he was precipitated against the side of the car and was injured. White v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 89 Ky. 478, 7 L. R. A. 44.

The obligation to provide a safe mode of delivering stock transported rests with the railroad company, and if the company by its agent require a shipper's agent to remove a horse from a car on a dangerous platform,—one not ordinarily safe for the delivery of stock,—and the horse is injured thereby, the company is responsible though the agent of the owner may have been apprised of the danger. Owen v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 87 Ky. 626.

And a shipper of hogs and cattle who is damaged because of the icy condition of a chute furnished by a railroad company for the purpose of loading his stock does not lay himself open to the charge of contributory negligence in failing to put ashes or sand on the floor of the chute, as the duty to furnish a safe means of loading rested with the railroad company, though he might be guilty of contributory negligence if he used a means of loading so glaringly dangerous as to make it reasonably certain that injury would result. Kincald v. Kansas City, C. & S. R. Co. 62 Mo. App. 365.

So, the act of a shipper of a horse in going into the stock pen and leading the horse up the chute and into the car, unassisted by any agent or employee of the railway company, will not relieve the company from liability for injuries to the horse due to the fact that the chute was in a rotten and defective condition. McCullough v. Wabash Western R. Co. 34 Mo. App. 23.

And the act of an owner of cattle in opening cattle pens of a carrier and permitting the cattle to escape will not relieve the carrier from liability for damages due to a failure to provide sufficient pens, where it has refused his request to obtain the pens of another company which are sufficient, and crowded them into small pens, where they are trampling each other to death. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. York, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 813, p. 718.

And an instruction in an action against a carrier for damage to a shipment of mules, that if the owner could have procured the feeding, watering, and resting of the mules, and thereby saved himself from damage which ensued from a failure to provide pens, he could not recover therefor, is properly refused as imposing a duty on the plaintiff which devolved upon the defendant. Dunn v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 68 Mo. 268.

It has been held, however, that the question whether a shipper of a horse was guilty of contributory negligence which would prevent his recovery for injuries to the horse resulting from a fall from a platform supplied by the railroad company for the purpose of loading the horse is one of fact for the jury to determine from all the facts of the case, though the fact that the platform was dangerous may have been known to the shipper and he himself did the loading. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wood (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 715.

So, an answer in an action against a railroad company for supplying a shipper of a horse with a defective chute or platform upon which the horse was required to walk in leaving the car, whereby he was injured, alleging that in taking the horse from the car the plaintiff's agents by their negligence and by reason of the wildness and unruddiness of the horse suffered him to jerk, rear, and fall, but that he was not hurt or otherwise injured, not alleging that but for such negligence he would not have fallen, does not set up contributory negligence so as to render a reply necessary. Owen v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 87 Ky. 626.

And evidence in an action by a shipper of injury or loss caused by its own neglect. Va. Code, § 1296; Virginia & T. R. Co. v. Sayers, 26 Gratt. 328. See also Clarke v. Rochester & S. R. Co. 67 Am. Dec. 205, and the valuable note thereto, 14 N. Y. 570.

It was further claimed that even if it was negligence in the railroad company to permit stock against a railroad company for an injury caused by defective stock pens, showing that the shipper thought the pens not thoroughly secure, but that the railroad company through its agent was present and pointed out the pens as the place for the reception of the stock, does not justify a demurrer to the evidence on the ground that his knowledge of their insecurity should prevent a recovery: It is at most a question for the jury. Mason v. Missouri P. R. Co. 25 Mo. App. 473.

So, the question whether an injury to a horse during transportation was caused by reason of the failure of the railroad company to provide suitable and safe facilities for unloading the horse, or whether the facilities for unloading were suitable and the injury was caused by the contributory negligence of the owner which would prevent a recovery, is a question to be tried upon the merits of the case, and not upon a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. American Exch. Bank, 92 Va. 496, 44 L. R. A. —.

V. Relief from liability by contract.

Though a contract between a railroad company and a shipper by which the shipper undertakes to load, feed, water, and unload his stock at his own risk and expense may be valid and binding, it is the duty of the railroad company to provide suitable and safe facilities for loading and unloading and for watering and feeding, a failure to perform which is negligence, against liability for which it cannot contract. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. American Exch. Bank, 92 Va. 496, 44 L. R. A. —.

And a stipulation in a contract for transportation of a horse that the shipper should unload it does not relieve the railroad company from liability for an injury to the horse while the shipper's agent was unloading it, resulting from the use of a dangerous platform supplied him by the company. Owen v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 87 Ky. 626.

And a railroad company receiving a number of cattle upon its cars for transportation, which started them and took them a part of the distance and then had the cars containing them detached from the train and placed upon a side track where the cattle could neither be fed nor watered nor unloaded with safety, where they were detained for three or four days, and several of the animals perished from hunger and the inclemency of the weather, and they were greatly reduced in flesh and weakened, is liable for the damages thereby caused, though the carriage was under a special contract by which the owners undertook all risk of loss, injury, damage, and other contingencies in loading, unloading, conveyance, and otherwise. Keeney v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 59 Barb. 104.

So, where a shipper of a horse and a railroad company make a verbal contract for the transportation of the horse, and he is directed as to the place and means of placing the animal in the car, and follows such direction, and the horse is injured by reason of a defective chute leading from the stockpen to the car, and the shipper then abandons the shipment but afterwards enters into new negotiations and ships the horse in a car from another place, whereupon a written contract is entered into, making the salt water to be in the pen which it had provided to enable shippers of live stock to load their stock in its cars, and the only means which it had furnished for that purpose, yet that the plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence in allowing the lambs to get to the water while being loaded, no mention of a release of the damages already sustained, such written contract does not relieve the railroad company from responsibility for such injury, and is inadmissible in evidence in an action therefor. McCullough v. Wabash Western R. Co. 34 Mo. App. 23.

And a bill of lading of cattle shipped, given to the shipper after the time when the cattle escaped from the pen of the railroad company and were injured thereby, in which the shipper waives any and all causes of action for damages which have accrued to him by any written or verbal contract prior to the execution thereof, is inadmissible in evidence in an action for such injury, where the answer was a general denial as, under it, the defendant could not be allowed to make a defense of confession and avoidance. Cooke v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 57 Mo. App. 471.

And a condition in a contract for the transportation of cattle by which the owner undertakes all risks of loading, unloading, and carriage, whether arising from negligence or default of the company or its servants or from defect or imperfection in the station, platform, or other places of loading and unloading, or from any cause whatsoever, is unreasonable and invalid, and will not relieve the company from liability for a loss due to the fact that the place at which the cattle were removed was at a siding, wholly unprotected by fences or otherwise from the line, and only capable of accommodating one truck at a time, and while the second truck was being unloaded the cattle, which had been removed from the first, strayed on the line and some of them were killed by a passing train. Rooth v. North Eastern R. Co. L. R. 2 Exch. 178, 36 L. J. Exch. N. S. 83, 15 L. T. N. S. 624, 15 Week. Rep. 695.

In the above case, Roberts v. Great Western R. Co. 4 C. B. N. S. 506, 4 Jur. N. S. 1240, 27 L. J. C. P. N. S. 266, supra, III, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case it was merely held that the company was under no absolute obligation to fence its premises from the line in order to protect animals under its customers' exclusive control.

The presence of a servant of a shipper who accompanies cattle, riding on a free pass, does not exempt the carrier from responsibility for an injury to the cattle resulting from their being placed in improper sheds and yards where some were frozen and some died, where there was no contract between the parties that the pass shall relieve the carrier from its common-law liability. Feinberg v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 52 N. J. L. 451.

VI. Compensation.

A carrier of live stock cannot make a special charge for merely receiving or delivering it in and through stockyards provided by itself, and it cannot invest another corporation with authority to impose burdens of that kind upon shippers and consignees. Covington Stock-Yards Co. v. Keith, 139 U. S. 128, 35 L. ed. 73.

And the legal duty of a carrier of live stock is not fully discharged by receiving and discharging live stock at yards access to which must be purchased. Keith v. Kentucky C. R. Co. 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 601.

Where delivery of live stock is to be made at and they cannot recover. The evidence satisfactorily establishes the negligence of the railroad company, and that the loss sustained by the plaintiffs was due to such negligence. Contributory negligence, to defeat a recovery, must be satisfactorily and affirmatively shown. Unless it appear from the plaintiff's evidence, it devolves on the defendant to prove it. Contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs nowhere appears. There is no evidence whatever that they knew of the existence of salt water in the loading pen, and it is not even pretended that they had any actual knowledge of it, but it is claimed that the men who brought the lambs to the station became aware of it. This is true, and the evidence shows also that they used every effort to prevent the lambs from drinking the water. The fact that they learned of the presence of the salt water in the pen does not fix contributory negligence upon the plaintiffs. The men who delivered the lambs at the station, and put them in the cars, were not the employees of the plaintiff. They were the persons from whom Harman & Crockett had bought the stock to be delivered to the railroad for shipment. In making the delivery, they were in no sense the agents of the plaintiffs. They were simply fulfilling their parts of the contract of sale. Therefore, their knowledge was not the knowledge of the plaintiffs, and could not be imputed to them. The doctrine of constructive notice by agency does not apply. The defense of contributory negligence is not sustained.

On the trial the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $742, with interest thereon from June 17, 1891. The defendant company moved the court to set aside the a place at a point away from the carrier's line, however, and by means of a track not owned or possessed by the carrier, the printed schedule of such carrier showing in two items the compensation exacted for the haul and that exacted for the transfer to the point of delivery, the theory that a carrier is bound by law to unload freight at a station on its own line does not prevent the carrier separating the charge for loading and hauling upon its line from its charge for transporting from its line to a specified point away from its line. Walker v. Keenan, 34 U. S. App. 691, 73 Fed. Rep. 755, 19 C. C. A. 668.

And carriers need not move cattle from their lines of road over the tracks of stockyard companies to stockyards belonging to such companies without compensation other than their charges for hauling to points on their respective lines. Ibid.

And the compensation for transporting live stock may be apportioned so that a part may pay for the loading and hauling and another part for the unloading and the care of the animals pending delivery. Ibid.

VII. Discrimination.

Where two stockyards are contiguous and both connected with a railroad by suitable switches, and a railroad can receive stock from and deliver it to the one as easily as the other, it cannot discriminate between them and insist upon the delivery of stock in one yard where it is consigned to the other. McCoy v. Cincinnati, 1 St. L. & C. R. Co. 13 Fed. Rep. 8.

And a railroad is not justified by the plea of public convenience in making the yards of one stockyard company their exclusive stockyard depot at a particular place, thus enabling that stockyard company to exact payment of those who were not its customers for the privilege of passing stock to and from the cars, where there are yards owned by other persons near to and on the same switch where the public might be suitably served at lower rates. Keith v. Kentucky C. R. Co. 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 601.

VIII. Matters of procedure.

A cause of action for damages for injury to a horse caused by being crowded or pushed off of a narrow platform over which it was passing in being unloaded is within the jurisdiction of the proper court in the city or county in which the injury occurred. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. American Exch. Bank, 92 Va. 496, 44 L. R. A.

company by a shipper alleging that the company violated its contract and committed a wrong in refusing to receive and carry cattle is insufficient where the gravamen of the action is the failure of the company to maintain and keep in repair proper ways and means for loading the cattle into the cars. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Godman, 104 Ind. 490.

And a complaint in an action against a common carrier to which a horse had been delivered for transportation, alleging negligence in its care while in transit and also after it had arrived at its destination while remaining in a stable in which it was placed by the carrier in its custody as warehouseman, alleges but one cause of action. Armstrong v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 45 Minn. 85.

So, evidence of the condition of mules when taken off of cars after transportation, and their value in that condition, and also in a sound condition, is admissible in an action for damages against the carrier, where it is claimed that the injury sustained was in consequence of the fact that they had been left standing in the cars at the station in cold, stormy weather, for about twenty-four hours without water or food, and they could not be unloaded, fed, or watered because the cars containing them were left on the spur track 200 feet from the chute of the stock pens. Dunn v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 68 Mo. 268.

And a witness to whose competency no objection is made may testify in an action against a railroad company for negligently putting a horse after transportation into an unsuitable and unsafe stable whereby she was injured, as to whether the stable was of the character in which farmers and others in the neighborhood were accustomed to keep horses and cattle. Armstrong v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 45 Minn. 85.

And a farmer brought up on a farm in this country, who is acquainted with the stable in question and with stables in which the people of the country usually keep their horses, and to whose competency as a witness no objection is made, may be asked in such an action if in his judgment such stable is a suitable place in which to put her. Ibid.

And experienced farmers, cattle dealers, vendors, or traders are competent witnesses in an action by a shipper against a railroad company for negligence in maintaining a weak, rotten, and defective cattle pen, by reason of which his cattle escaped, to testify as to the effect of the escape, stampeding, overheating, etc., upon fat cattle. Cooke v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 57 Mo. App. 471.

verdict, but the court refused to do so, and gave judgment thereon. It was proved that the lambs would average about seventy-seven pounds each, and that they were worth in the New York market—the place where they were to be sold—from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to 8 cents per pound. One hundred and forty-seven died before they could be gotten to market. It is an easy calculation to show that, exclusive of any compensation for those that were sold as “sick lambs,” the amount of the verdict of the jury was rather below than above the actual damages sustained by the defendants in error. And the evidence was ample to sustain the charge of the plaintiffs in the suit that the loss that they had sustained was due to the negligence of the railroad company. The court rightly overruled the motion for a new trial.

There is no error in the judgment appealed from, and the same must be affirmed.

Buchanan, J., having been of counsel, did not sit.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
FRANKLIN & PITTSYLVANIA RAIL-ROAD COMPANY.

(.....Va.....)

1. The obligation of the lessee of a railroad to maintain and operate the road during the term of the lease is a necessary implication, where the road was built with the aid of county subscriptions to give railroad connection to the county seat and with the expectation of making the lease, while the lease provides for equipping the road as may be necessary to its use and enjoyment, and that the receipts shall be applied to the annual expenses of running the road and keeping it in repair, then to reimburse the lessee for the annual rent, etc., although there is no express covenant requiring the operation of the road.
2. Equity may compel the continued operation of a leased railroad during the term of the lease by a mandatory injunction, which is in fact a decree of specific performance, as the remedy at law would be neither complete nor adequate.
3. Hardship will not prevent specific performance of a contract which was fairly and justly made, when it results from miscalculation or from contingencies which might have been foreseen, and for which the complainant is not in fault.
4. A decree for the continuous operation of a leased railroad as it was then operated is not objectionable as disregarding the exigencies that may arise, when the existing train service is such as the lessee has for several years deemed proper and necessary.

NOTE.—For specific performance of duty of lessee to operate railroad, see also Schmidt v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 38 L. R. A. 809, and note.

5. A decree requiring the operation of a leased railroad may include a branch road owned by the lessee, which is essential to the operation of the other.

(Keith, P., dissents.)

(February 2, 1899.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Franklin County in favor of complainant in a suit brought to compel defendant to operate complainant's road in alleged accordance with the terms of a lease. Affirmed with amendments.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Blackford, Horsley, & Blackford, for appellant:

The court clearly did not have jurisdiction to grant the relief prayed for and to make such an order as that contained in the final decree.

The court could not cause the contract to be executed through the instrumentalities of the court. This court, if it undertakes this labor, must take a new departure in equity practice and jurisdiction, and override long-established doctrines of courts and text writers.

Beck v. Allison, 56 N. Y. 366, 15 Am. Rep. 433; Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Speer, 32 Ga. 550, 79 Am. Dec. 305; Pom. Contr. 2d ed. § 312; Richmond v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. 33 Iowa, 423; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Marshall, 136 U. S. 393, 34 L. ed. 385; Ross v. Union P. R. Co. Woolw. 26; Hoard v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 123 U. S. 226, 31 L. ed. 132; Campbell v. Rust, 85 Va. 653; Ewing v. Litchfield, 91 Va. 579.

If neither the plaintiff nor the public has a right to require it to operate this road, then the two together cannot require it, and the public is not a party to this suit.

When the law itself contemplates that it may be necessary for a road to be abandoned, and provides that when it is abandoned the right of the public is simply to vacate the power of the corporation to use that which it has abandoned, there can be no right in the public by bill in equity or otherwise to compel specific performance by the corporation.

People v. Albany & V. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 261, 82 Am. Dec. 295; Sherwood v. Atlantic & D. R. Co. 94 Va. 291; Collins v. Sutton, 94 Va. 127.

The plaintiff divested of the desires and convenience of those living adjacent to the road, but who are incapable of maintaining the road, has no right to the interference of a court of equity.

The hardship which would be imposed on the defendant in requiring it to use its revenues from other sources in operating the road which it never covenanted to operate, at enormous loss, is sufficient in itself to deter the court in decreeing specific execution.

Pom. Contr. § 186; Willard v. Tayloe, 8 Wall. 557, 19 L. ed. 501; London v. Nash, 3 Atk. 512; Booten v. Scheffer, 21 Gratt. 497.

Unless a charter positively requires a railroad company to operate its road, the court should put no construction which would impose such an obligation

Com. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 12 Gray, 180; Sherwood v. Atlantic & D. R. Co. 94 Va. 291.

Mr. Eppa Hunton, Jr., also for appellant:

In construing this contract "regard should be had to the intention of the parties contracting, and such intention should be given effect. To arrive at this intention regard is to be had to the situation of the parties, the subject-matter of the agreement, the object which the parties had in view at the time and intended to accomplish."

Young v. Ellis, 91 Va. 501.

The reason of the lease was to induce the appellant to become responsible for the bonds, and to give it security for the money paid by it.

This and this alone brought about this contract.

Can it be imagined that this lease would have been approved and ratified by the learned judge of the circuit court of Alexandria in the case of Graham v. Washington City, V. M. & S. R. Co. if it had provided for the continuous operation of this road at a ruinous loss to the property which was then under his protecting care?

A mandamus will never be awarded unless the right to have the thing done which is sought is clearly established.

Northern P. R. Co. v. Washington Territory, Dustin, 142 U. S. 492, 35 L. ed. 1092.

It cannot be maintained that the covenant for continuous operation is clearly established.

A construction should be avoided if it can be done consistently with the terms of the agreement which would be unreasonable or unequal, and that construction which is most obviously just is to be favored as most in accordance with the presumed intention of the parties.

Young v. Ellis, 91 Va. 301.

Enforcement of contracts may be interfered with and prevented by subsequent unforeseen events, which introduce a sufficient element of inequality, unfairness, or hardship.

In an action at law, where there has been an entire breach of the contract, compensation may be recovered at once for the whole loss.

James v. Kibler, 94 Va. 173.

Courts will not grant the extraordinary remedy of mandamus where to do so would be fruitless and unavailing.

2 Spelling, Extraordinary Relief, § 1377; Strasburg v. Winchester & S. R. Co. 94 Va. 648.

Performance of this contract involves skill, personal labor, and cultivated judgment.

Pom. Spec. Perf. § 23, p. 30.

Riely, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Franklin & Pittsylvania Railroad Company (hereinafter called the "Franklin Company") was incorporated by an act of the general assembly of Virginia of March 12, 1878, and authorized to construct a railroad from some point on the main line of the Washington City, Virginia, Midland, & Great Southern Railroad Company (hereinafter called the "Midland Company") or any branch thereof, in the county of Pittsylvania, to Rocky Mount, the county seat of Franklin county.

On September 19, 1878, it made a lease of its road, to take effect when the same was completed, to John S. Barbour, receiver, in the chancery suit of Graham against the Washington City, Virginia, Midland, & Great Southern Railroad Company, pending in the circuit court of the city of Alexandria, for the term of thirty-four years, at the annual rental of $7,000. The lease was made subject to the ratification of the stockholders of the Franklin Company and the approval and confirmation of the said court. It was duly ratified by the former, and approved and confirmed by the latter. The road was constructed and equipped by the lessor, and delivered to the lessee on April 15, 1880, from which date the lease was to run for thirty-four years.

The Southern Railway Company having, on June 18, 1894, duly acquired, by purchase and conveyance, the road owned by the Midland Company when the lease was made, and along with it the lease to Barbour, receiver, by the Franklin Company, plainly manifested an intention, in the summer of 1897, to abandon and cease to operate the leased road. In anticipation of such action by the Southern Railway Company, and to prevent the consequences that would result from it, the Franklin Company brought its suit in equity in the circuit court of Franklin county, charging in its bill that the Southern Railway Company intended to abandon and cease to operate under the lease the road of the complainant after July 1, 1897, and asking that it be enjoined and restrained from doing so. The Southern Railway Company filed its answer to the bill and admitted the charge of the complainant.

Is the defendant company bound to operate the leased road during the term of the lease, or may it rightfully abandon and cease to operate it? This is the first question presented for our determination. Its solution depends upon the provisions of the lease.

It is conceded that an express covenant to operate the road during the term of the lease is not to be found among the provisions thereof, but the complainant in the court below, which is the appellee here, contends that the obligation to operate the road throughout the entire term of the lease is so plainly contemplated by its provisions that the law will enforce it as an implied covenant, as fully as if the obligation were expressed in appropriate words.

Necessary implication is, beyond doubt, as much a part of an instrument as if that which is so implied was plainly expressed. "Although the words of a contract under seal," says Addison in his Treatise on Contracts (vol. 3, § 1400), "do not, in themselves, import any express covenant, yet the law, in order to promote good faith, and make men act up to the spirit, as well as to the letter, of their engagements, will create and supply, as a necessary result and consequence of the contract, certain covenants and obligations, which bind the parties as forcibly and effectually as if they had been expressed in the strongest and most explicit terms in the deed itself."

While this is very true, courts are nevertheless justly prudent and careful in inferring covenants or promises, lest they make the contract speak where it was intended to be silent, or make it speak contrary to what, as may be gathered from the whole terms and tenor of the contract, was the intention of the parties. If, however, it can be plainly seen, from all the provisions of the instrument taken together, that the obligation in question was within the contemplation of the parties when making their contract, or is necessary to carry their intention into effect,—in other words, if it be a necessary implication from the provisions of the instrument,—the law will imply the obligation and enforce it.

Before proceeding to examine critically the provisions of the lease, it is proper to observe that a court, in construing an agreement whose language leaves in doubt its meaning as to the particular matter in controversy, in order to ascertain the intention of the parties, should have regard to the occasion which gave rise to the contract, the obvious design of the parties, and the object to be attained, as well as to the language of the instrument itself, and give the agreement that construction which will effectuate the real intent and meaning of the parties as thus ascertained from the entire instrument and by reference to the circumstances attending the making of it.

It is apparent that a principal object of the incorporators of the Franklin Company was to furnish railroad facilities to the citizens of Franklin county by connecting by rail Rocky Mount, the county seat, with the main line of the Midland Company, and thereby secure railroad communication with all sections of the state and country reached by the road and its connections. It was to this end that the county of Franklin subscribed to and paid for in its bonds $200,000 of the capital stock of the Franklin Company. And the consummation of this object was the main inducement on the part of the Franklin Company to enter into the lease with the Midland Company; while the inducement to enter into it on the part of John S. Barbour, receiver, was, as expressed in his reports to the circuit court of Alexandria, to obtain, as he believed, a valuable feeder to his line of railroad. That the lease was in the contemplation of the parties thereto at the time the Franklin Company obtained its charter is shown by the eighth section thereof, whereby it is expressly made "lawful for said company to lease its road, or any part thereof, to the Washington City, Virginia, Midland, & Great Southern Railroad Company, or any other railroad company chartered by the commonwealth."

It is apparent, upon a fair construction of the whole instrument, considered in the light of the circumstances under which it was made, that it was within the contemplation of the parties and their intention that the road should be maintained and operated during the entire term of the lease; and, when we come to examine its provisions critically, the obligation to do so, though not expressed in words, is plainly implied.

By the lease the Franklin Company demised to John S. Barbour, receiver, its whole road from Rocky Mount to Pittsville, in Pittsylvania county, together with all its stations, water tanks, switches, sidings, privileges, franchises, and other appurtenances, including an equipment of rolling stock not to exceed in value $20,000, for thirty-four years; said term not to commence until the Franklin Company had completed and delivered the road to the receiver, and supplied the same with such amount of rolling stock and other equipment as might be necessary to its use and enjoyment, provided said equipment should not exceed in cost the sum of 20,000. And the receiver, in consideration of the said demise, agreed to pay to the Franklin Company an annual rental, during the term of thirty-four years, of a sum equal to 7 per centum upon the amount of certain bonds which the Franklin Company proposed to issue and secure by a mortgage upon its road, privileges, and franchises, not to exceed $100,000. He further covenanted to apply the receipts which might be derived from the property thereby demised as follows:

First. To the payment of the annual expenses of running the road and keeping it and the equipment in proper repair.

Second. To reimburse himself for the payment of the annual rent which he had agreed to pay for the use of the road.

Third. To the payment of a dividend of 7 per centum upon the capital stock of the company, provided the capital stock should not exceed in par value the sum of $200,000.

Fourth. The residue of said receipts, if any, after making the said payments, should be retained by the receiver for the use and benefit of the trust in his hands, under the order of the court.

He still further covenanted to return the road, at the end of the term of thirty-four years, in as good repair as when he received it, and to return rolling stock and equipment equal in value to that which he received.

In the preamble to the lease, there is also the declaration that the Franklin Railroad, when completed, "will be a valuable feeder to the traffic of the main line" of the Midland Railroad.

The leased road could not be a "feeder," valuable or otherwise, to the traffic of the main line of the lessee, unless it was operated.

Neither would there be annual expenses of running the road, and of keeping it and the equipment in repair, nor receipts to pay them, unless the road was operated.

One of the obligations of the Franklin Company, as we have seen, was to furnish rolling stock and other equipment necessary to the "use and enjoyment" of the road, not to exceed a fixed amount. The obligation to furnish the rolling stock and equipment for the use and enjoyment of the road implied the corresponding obligation to use it, and to use it was to operate the road.

By the terms of the lease, the receiver was to reimburse himself for the annual rental out of the receipts arising from the operation of the road, and provision was also made for the payment out of the receipts of a dividend to the stockholders.

The stipulations referred to plainly manifest an undertaking by the lessee to operate the road, and are inconsistent with the theory that it might, at its will and pleasure, abandon the road and cease to operate it. And that such was not the understanding of the lessee and his successors is unmistakably shown by their conduct; for although the road has been unremunerative from the first and an increasing burden to the lessee and his successors, both he and they recognized the duty to maintain and operate it, without raising a question, so far as the record discloses, as to their obligation to do so, as did also the appellant until shortly before this suit was instituted and the injunction awarded to prevent its abandonment of the road, covering altogether a period of upwards of seventeen years.

By the general statute law of the state in force when the lease was made, an abandonment by a railroad company of its road, or a failure to use and keep it in good repair, for three successive years, rendered the company liable to a forfeiture of its charter and of its property. The parties to the lease are presumed to have known the law, and it cannot be doubted that they were fully cognizant of it. It is inconceivable that the Franklin Company would have entered into a lease of its road which would permit its abandonment by the lessee, with the consequent liability to a forfeiture of its franchises and property; and such a lease would be no less incompatible with the express covenant of the lessee to return the road in as good condition as he received it, and rolling stock and equipment equal in value to that which he received.

It was asked in argument by counsel for the appellant if it could be imagined that the circuit court of the city of Alexandria would have approved and ratified the lease if it bound the lessee to operate the road continuously during the whole term, even at a loss to the property then under its care. It may be replied, would the court have sanctioned the lease which bound the lessee to pay an annual rental of $7,000 for thirty-four years out of moneys derived from the property then under its care, if the road might not be used, but could be abandoned at the will and pleasure of the lessee? for it is conceded that, by the terms of the lease, the rent must be paid during the whole term, whether the road be operated or not. Clearly not.

Our conclusion is that the obligation to maintain and operate the road during the term of the lease is a necessary implication from its expressed stipulations. It adds nothing to the written contract to infer an obligation to do what was actually intended by the parties and what is essential to give effect and vitality to it.

This conclusion is in no wise inconsistent with the case of Sherwood v. Atlantic & D. R. Co. 94 Va. 291, where this court refused to compel the railroad company to replace its tracks from its existing terminus to its former terminal station, in the city of Portsmouth, and to re-establish that point as the terminal station of its line. That case, which was much relied upon by counsel for the appellant, furnishes no ground for the contention that the appellant may abandon, at its will, the use of the appellee's road.

In that case the contract sought to be enforced was made subsequent to the mortgage under which the road was sold and acquired by the defendant company. It was held that the contract, being subsequent to the mortgage, was abrogated by the sale, and that 41 V. R. A..

the purchaser took the property free and discharged from all the obligations of the contract.

It was further held in that case that, the original company having the right under its charter to fix its deep-water terminus at either one of two points, and having built its road to one of those points, and selected that as its terminus, it was not obliged by its charter to maintain any other terminus, or compelled by the general law to keep up a branch road that it had constructed to connect with its main line. So that neither by charter, nor by contractual obligation, was the defendant company obliged to make its terminal station in the city of Portsmouth.

But how different is the case at bar. By the lease there is the obligation by contract upon the lessee to use and operate the road during the term of the lease. It is true that the obligation is only implied, but it is nevertheless as operative as if it were expressed. The lease from which the obligation proceeds has never been in any wise abrogated, but in all the mutations of the properties of the lessee it has been expressly preserved, with all the duties and obligations arising under it.

In Sherwood v. Atlantic & D. R. Co. 94 Va. 291, the distinction was clearly drawn between the positive duties imposed by charter and those assumed by a corporation under permissive grants of power. As to the former, it was said that the court would compel their performance by appropriate remedies, while with respect to the latter it would enforce them or withhold its hands, as might seem just, upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the case.

In the case at bar there is the obligation by contract upon the lessee to maintain and operate the leased road. The obligation is in full force, and as binding as if it were a positive duty imposed by charter. The case is clearly distinguishable in principle from that of Sherwood v. Atlantic & D. R. Co.

The lessee being bound, by the provisions of the lease, to maintain and operate the road of the lessor, the next question for determination is whether there is any binding obligation on the appellant to do so.

In the decree of the circuit court of the city of Alexandria of September 25, 1878, by which the court approved and ratified the lease, is contained the following provision in relation to it: "And, for the purpose of establishing the rights of all parties claiming under the contract, it is hereby declared that, in any order hereafter to be made in this cause providing for a sale of the road or a reorganization of the defendant corporation, said contract shall be duly respected, and all rights acquired thereunder duly protected."

In the 37th section of the decree entered by the court, February 13, 1880, for the sale of the property of the defendant corporation (the Midland Company), the lease from the Franklin Company was expressly included; and in the 48th section of the decree it was provided that "the purchaser must take the property rights, franchises, and works sold under this decree by said commissioner subject to the leases and contracts specially named in said 37th section of this decree, . . . and the said purchaser must, as to said contracts and leases, take the place of the said company or of said receiver, as the case may be, and assume any and all liability and obligations thereunder." In the deed made, in pursuance of the sale, to the purchasers, who adopted as their corporate name "The Virginia Midland Railway Company," the lease from the Franklin Company was expressly conveyed, and the foregoing provision in the 48th section of the decree of sale duly incorporated.

The new corporation, on April 15, 1886, demised all of its property, including expressly the lease from the Franklin Company, to the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, for a term of ninety-nine years; and by deed of October 22, 1886, the latter company conveyed much, if not all, of the said property, including the lease from the Franklin Company, to the Central Trust Company of New York, trustee, to secure certain bonds issued by the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company. This deed was foreclosed by decree of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia entered on April 13, 1894, in the consolidated causes of Central Trust Company of New York, trustee, against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, and William P. Clyde and others against the same and others, and the property conveyed by the said deed, including the lease from the Franklin Company, was bought by certain persons, who assumed and adopted the corporate name of "Southern Railway Company." A conveyance was duly made of the property on June 18, 1894, to the said company, by masters appointed for that purpose by decree entered in the said causes. It thereby acquired, and by the express terms of the conveyance assumed and adopted, the lease of the Franklin Company and thereby became liable for the fulfillment of all the obligations of the original lessee. It therefore plainly appears that the Southern Railway Company stands in the shoes of Barbour, receiver, as respects the said lease, and is as firmly bound by its covenants, expressed or implied, as if it had been the original party thereto instead of the said receiver.

Having ascertained from the provisions of the lease under construction that the lessee, Barbour, receiver, was bound to operate the road of the lessor during the term of the lease, and being also of opinion that the appellant company is likewise bound by the said obligation in all its force and vigor, it remains to be determined whether a court of equity will enforce the obligation.

It was earnestly contended by counsel for the appellant that, conceding such obligation to exist, the remedy of the appellee was a suit at law for damages for the breach thereof, and that equity was without jurisdiction in the case. As a general rule, the remedy for the breach of a contract, especially where it does not relate to real estate, is a suit at law for compensation in damages, but, if the remedy be not adequate, full, 44 L. R. A.

and complete, equity will interpose and compel the specific performance of the contract. The true rule is thus laid down in Story, Eq. Jur. § 33: "The remedy must be plain; for, if it be doubtful and obscure at law, equity will assert a jurisdiction. It must be adequate; for, if at law it fall short of what the party is entitled to, that founds a jurisdiction in equity. And it must be complete; that is, it must attain the full end and justice of the case. It must reach the whole mischief and secure the whole right of the party in a perfect manner, at the present time and in future; otherwise, equity will interfere, and give such relief and aid as the exigency of the particular case may require." Stuart v. Pennis, 91 Va. 688.

It cannot be reasonably contended that a suit at law would afford redress for the threatened injury. Only half of the term of the lease has expired. It has seventeen years still to run. It would be impossible to ascertain the amount of damage that the complainant would sustain from an abandonment of the road during the remainder of the lease. The injury from loss of traffic, from the natural and certain decay of buildings and structures, and from the possible, if not probable, forfeiture of its franchises and property, could not be estimated nor compensated by damages. The right of the complainant to have the road operated by the defendant until the expiration of the lease is a continuing right, and, if the injury were reparable in damages, it would require a multiplicity of actions for the daily breach of the agreement. The remedy at law would be neither complete nor adequate. Nothing short of the interposition of a court of equity would meet the exigencies of the situation, and secure the complainant the protection of its rights.

It was objected that, conceding the remedy at law to be inadequate, equity will nevertheless not compel specific performance of a contract having some years to run, which is practically what is sought by the mandatory injunction, that requires continuous acts, involving the exercise of skill and judgment. It may be admitted that the authorities are not uniform, and that there are decisions which sustain the objection, but an examination of the decided cases will disclose the fact that the great weight of authority, and especially the recent decisions of courts of the highest respectability and influence, maintain the jurisdiction of equity in a case like that at bar. The courts are constantly called upon to exercise the very jurisdiction here called in question, in operating railroads through receivers. No particular difficulty is encountered in doing so, although the operation of the road in such case requires a continuous series of acts, involving the exercise of skill and judgment; and, if the court can do this through its receiver, no good reason is perceived why it may not compel a railroad company to operate a road in performance of its contract to do so.

In Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 1, 34 L. ed. 843, the St. Louis, Kansas City, & Colorado Railroad Company claimed that it was entitled by succession, under a certain contract, to use, jointly with the Wabash, St. Louis, & Pacific Railroad Company, that portion of the tracks of the latter company which extend from a point on the northern line of Forest Park, through the park, and thence to the Union Depot, in the city of St. Louis, together with the right to use side tracks, switches, turnouts, and other terminal facilities. It was a continuing right, and unlimited in time. The contract contained provisions regulating the running of trains, and prescribing the duties of superintendents, train masters, and other officers. The claim being denied, and the right to use the tracks refused, the court, in a suit brought to enforce the same, decreed the specific performance of the contract, and enjoined the Wabash Company from refusing to permit the Colorado Company to use its tracks.

In Franklin Teleg. Co. v. Harrison, 145 U. S. 459, 36 L. ed. 776, the telegraph company had entered into a contract with Harrison Bros., by which it agreed to allow them the right to put up, at their own expense, maintain, and use, a telegraph wire on its poles between Philadelphia and New York, which, when put up, was to be maintained and kept in good working order at the expense of the telegraph company, and over which Harrison Bros. were to be allowed to transmit messages free of all charge. At the expiration of ten years the wire was to become the property of the telegraph company, after which time it was to lease the same to Harrison Bros. for $600 per annum, and upon the same terms, in all other respects, as if the wire had not been given up. The ten years having expired, Harrison Bros. continued to use the wire as before, but paying the stipulated sum of $600 per annum. After this had gone on for about three years, the telegraph company gave notice to Harrison Bros. of its intention to terminate the agreement. The court held that the contract was one proper for specific performance, and enjoined the telegraph company from terminating the agreement, and required it to maintain the wire in good working order for Harrison Bros.

In Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. v. Coney Island & B. R. Co. 144 N. Y. 152, 26 L. R. A. 610, it appears that the plaintiff owned a steam railroad, which extended from Coney Island to a depot at the corner of Ninth avenue and Twentieth street, in the city of Brooklyn, and also owned certain horse-car railroads, extending from the depot to Fulton ferry, and that the defendant operated certain horse-car lines from Fulton and other ferries to Fifteenth street and thence to Coney Island. A contract was entered into between them by which the plaintiff granted to the defendant the right to use the tracks of its horse-car line on Ninth avenue from Fifteenth street to the depot at Ninth avenue and Twentieth street free of charge, for twenty-one years from June 1, 1882, and the defendant covenanted to run cars to plaintiff's depot to connect with its trains run to and from Coney Island. The contract contained a provision that, in case the defendant should use steam as a motive power on its line between the city and the island, either party could terminate the contract on six months' notice.

They acted under the contract until October, 1889, when defendant, having adopted the "trolley system" of running cars by electricity upon its road between the city and the Island, ceased to run its cars to the plaintiff's depot, and advised the plaintiff of its intention not to do so. Upon a bill filed by the plaintiff to compel specific performance of the contract, the court so decreed.

In Union P. R. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 163 U. S. 564, 41 L. ed. 265, a contract between certain railroads for trackage arrangement in all its details, for a period of 999 years, was decreed to be specifically performed upon the refusal of the party, which had contracted for the use of its tracks, to abide by the agreement, and the recalcitrant company enjoined from interposing any obstacle to the enjoyment by the other party of the rights and privileges secured to it under the contract.

The case of Schmidt v. Louisville & N. R. Co. reported in 38 L. R. A. 809, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 686, is very similar in its principal features to the case before us. The Northern Division of the Cumberland & Ohio Railroad Company leased its roadbed, right of way, and other property to the Louisville, Cincinnati, & Lexington Railway Company for the period of thirty years. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company purchased the entire property of the lessee, including the said lease; took possession of the demised road; and, after operating it for a considerable period, gave notice of its intention to abandon the operation of the road. Suit was thereupon instituted to enjoin it from doing so, and to compel the performance by it of the lease.

The lessor was required by its charter to operate the road, but the defendant contended that no duty rested upon it except such as was imposed by the lease itself, and denied that the duty to operate the road was so imposed. The court held that, as assignee of the lease, it assumed all the obligations thereof, and that it being the statutory duty of the lessor to operate the road, and the lessor having agreed that the lessee should operate it for the term of thirty years, the defendant was obliged, under the agreement, to do so.

In all of the cases above referred to, or in nearly all of them, the same contention was made as is now made here, that a court of equity will not specifically enforce a contract that calls for continuous service, involving the exercise of skill and judgment, and requires constant supervision on the part of the court, but it was overruled, and specific performance decreed. Cases might be multiplied illustrating the maintenance of jurisdiction by courts of equity in cases like that at bar, but it is deemed unnecessary.

The enforcement of the contract is also objected to on the ground of hardship. It is not pretended that the lease was induced by fraud or false representations of facts. On the contrary, it was entered into after due deliberation, was reasonable and fair when made, and, as declared in the preamble, "deemed judicious and beneficial" to both parties. Operation under it has demonstrated that the Franklin Company, instead of becoming "a valuable feeder" to the main line of the lease, has proved to be an unprofitable adjunct. The hardship is due, in the main, to miscalculation in making the contract, and in part to subsequent events and a change of circumstances in no wise attributable to the lessor.

It is not doubted that there are adjudged cases which hold that a court of equity will not decree specific performance of the agreement where it would entail great hardship, and the hardship was due, in some measure, at least, to the conduct of the other party. Booten v. Scheffer, 21 Gratt. 474; Gish v. Jamison, 96 Va. —, 31 S. E. 521; and Willard v. Tayloe, 8 Wall. 594, 19 L. ed. 503.

But we question whether a court of equity ever refuses specific performance upon the sole objection of hardship, where the contract in its inception was fairly and justly made, and the hardship is the result of miscalculation, or is caused by subsequent events or a change of circumstances, and the party seeking performance is wholly without fault. In Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 10 Wall. 356, 19 L. ed. 960, Mr. Justice Strong, in speaking of contracts that were supposed to be fair and equal when made, but in the lapse of time have become bad bargains, said: "Besides, it is by no means clear that a court of equity will refuse to decree the specific performance of a contract, fair when it was made, but which has become a hard one by the force of subsequent circumstances or changing events." The element of risk enters more or less into every contract, and the obligation to perform it cannot be allowed to depend upon the question whether it has proved to be advantageous or disadvantageous. It would be a travesty upon justice, and the reputed sanctity of contracts would be of little avail, if parties could refuse the performance of contracts having some years to run, which were fairly entered into, and believed to be just and equal when made, merely because from contingencies, whose possibility might have been foreseen, they had turned out, in the course of execution, to be a losing, instead of a profitable, bargain.

In Schmidt v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 19 Ky. L. Rep. 666, 38 L. R. A. 809, it appeared that the lessor was largely indebted to the defendant company, the assignee of the lease, for moneys furnished for it under the contract of lease, and to be repaid by it; that judgment had been recovered for the amount, and an effort made to sell the leased road to pay it, but nothing could be made, because no one would give anything for the road subject to the mortgage subsisting upon it. It also appeared that the leased road was being run at a heavy loss, the necessary cost of operating having exceeded the receipts in the sum of $199,411.70. The defendant claimed that it would be harsh and inequitable, under these circumstances, to require it to continue to operate the road; but the court held that the facts in the case were not such as to release the defendant from performing the contract. Nor can the objection of hardship, made in the case before us, avail to stay the hands of the court.

Objection is made to the decree appealed from that it enjoins the appellant from abandoning or ceasing to operate the road as it was then operating it, without regard to the exigencies of the case. The decree simply requires the same train service as the appellant had deemed to be proper and necessary during the three years it had been in control and operation of the road. It is to be presumed that it was then running only such trains and with such cars, as its experience showed were required. This would seem to be reasonable and proper, and to furnish no good ground of complaint.

The further objection is made to the decree that it requires the appellant to operate the entire line from Rocky Mount to Franklin Junction, which includes 7 miles not belonging to the appellee, but is the property of the appellant. This seven miles is a branch road of the Midland Company, running out from its main line to a place called Pittsville, and was in existence when the lease was made; and the provisions of the lease clearly show that it was the understanding and agreement of the parties thereto that the Franklin Company was to construct its road to the western terminus of the branch road, so as to obtain connection with the main line. Without the branch road, there would be no connection between the new road and the main line. It was by means of the branch road that the new road was to become "a valuable feeder to the traffic of the main line." It is plainly implied in the lease that the branch road was to be operated in conjunction with the new road. The two have been operated together as one line ever since the beginning of the lease. They were so operated by the original lessee and all of his successors, and were being so operated by the appellant when this controversy arose. The branch road is essential to the use and enjoyment of the road of the Franklin Company, and the court committed no error in the respect complained of.

We find no error in the decree appealed from, except in dismissing the case from the docket. The court should have reserved the right to make additional orders from time to time, as circumstances might require, and kept the case on the docket for that purpose.

The decree will be amended in this respect, and as so amended will be affirmed.

NEW YORK LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

J. W. DAVIS, Admr., etc., of J. W. T. Davis,
Deceased, et al.

(.....Va.....)

1. The law never presumes fraud, but the presumption is always in favor of innocence and honesty.
2. The murder of a person whose life is insured by an assignee of the policy, whose claim to it is valid only for a reimbursement of premiums paid, forfeits only the assignee's part of the insurance, and not the residue thereof, to which the estate of the insured is entitled.

(February 8, 1899.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Henry County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to compel payment of the amount alleged to be due on a life insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. W. Saunders, for appellant:

The insurance policies on the life of Davis were as truly taken out for the benefit of Lester as the policy on the life of Armstrong, in the case of New York Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 593, 29 L. ed. 998, was taken out for the benefit of Hunter.

This is an unusual case, but there have been others like it.

Messrs. William M. Peyton and Peatross & Harris, for appellees:

New York Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 593, 29 L. ed. 998, cannot be invoked as an authority in this case. That case occurred in New York, and was decided with reference to the law of New York. Under the law of New York the assignment by Armstrong to Hunter of the policy in that case vested the sole and absolute ownership and beneficial interest in the insurance in the assignee, Hunter. Hunter, therefore, was sole owner of the entire policy and insurance when Armstrong was killed. The forfeiture therefore was as extensive as Hunter's interest; that is, of the whole policy.

In Virginia an assignee of an insurance policy only becomes entitled to it to the extent that he has insurable interest in the life of the assured, or has paid value for it. He is only entitled to hold it for reimbursement.

fore, by Davis to Lester, Lester became interested in or entitled to them only to the extent that Davis was indebted to him for premiums paid on them by him over and above the amount Lester owed Davis.

Cleaver v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Assn. [1892] 1 Q. B. 147; Cheeves v. Anders, 87 Tex. 287, 47 Am. St. Rep. 107.

Messrs. Beverley B. Munford and Hairston & Gravelly also for appellees.

Riely, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On May 29, 1895, a policy of insurance was issued by the appellant to John W. T. Davis upon his life for $1,000, and on June 30, 1895, it issued to him another policy upon his life for $3,000. Both policies were taken out by Davis for the benefit of his estate, and were both assigned by him, on June 27, 1895, to W. W. Lester, who had advanced for him the premium on each policy.

On February 24, 1896, Davis died under circumstances indicating that he had been poisoned, and suspicion pointed to Lester as the perpetrator of the suspected crime. He was arrested, indicted, and tried in the county court of Henry county, but acquitted.

In the meantime, the father of Davis, he being the distributee of the deceased, filed his bill to enjoin Lester from collecting, and the insurance company from paying, to him the money due on the policies, and to compel the payment of the policies to the administrator of the deceased when appointed, except so far as necessary to reimburse Lester for the premiums he had advanced. The father subsequently qualified as the administrator of his son, and the suit thereafter proceeded in his name as such fiduciary.

The company resists all liability on the policies, upon the alleged ground that the application for the insurance was not the result of the volition of Davis, and did not emanate from him, but that he was induced by Lester to take out the policies, and that it was only at the instigation and by the persuasion of Lester that he did so; that Lester, at the time he induced Davis to effect the insurance, had formed the purpose to procure from Davis an assignment of the policies, and then take his life, in order to collect the policies; and that when the policies were issued to Davis, Lester did procure from him an assignment of them to himself, and subsequently murdered him.

It was conceded that, if the policies were taken out by Davis in good faith and were valid in their incipency, their subsequent assignment to Lester, although procured by him with a view to the murder of the insured and the collection of the policies, would not prevent a recovery on them for the estate of the deceased.

Upon the company rests the burden of making good its defense and establishing the alleged fraud. This it undertook to do, and it may be conceded that a number of facts and circumstances were shown in evidence which tend to excite suspicion that there was some foundation for the accusation of the company; but upon a full and careful consideration of all the evidence it falls short of that clear and satisfactory proof required to establish fraud. Fraud may be proved by circumstances as well as by direct evidence, but the circumstances, as in the case of direct evidence, must clearly and satisfactorily establish the fraud. It is not assumed on doubtful evidence or circumstances of mere suspicion. It must be clearly and distinctly proved. The law never presumes fraud, but the presumption is always in favor of innocence and honesty. Engleby v. Harvey, 93 Va. 440.

An effort was made to liken this case to that of New York Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. ed. 997, but the two cases are very dissimilar in their material features.

In that case it was proved that the application for the insurance was instigated by Hunter, and the policy procured wholly for his benefit. It appeared in evidence that on the 3d or 4th of December, 1877, Hunter made inquiry at the office of the company, in Philadelphia, as to the rates of insurance on the life of a person aged about forty or forty-one years, upon an endowment policy of twenty years; stating that he thought of insuring for his own benefit the life of a person in the sum of $10,000. After some conversation on the subject of insurance generally, he left; stating that the person to be insured would probably call in a day or two. On the 6th of the month, Armstrong called, and informed the agent that he came, at the request of Hunter, to make application for a life insurance. He was thereupon examined, and after answering the questions usually propounded to applicants, he signed a formal application, leaving blank, however, the place for the amount of the insurance desired and for the answer to the question respecting the manner of paying the premiums. He at the same time executed an assignment of the policy, leaving blanks for its date and that of the policy and for the name and residence of the assignee. This was his entire connection with the transaction. In the afternoon of the same day, or on the following morning, Hunter informed the office that the amount of insurance desired was $10,000, and that it would be more convenient for him to pay the premiums quarterly. The blanks left by Armstrong in the application were thereupon filled, and the application forwarded to the home office of the company in New York. Before the receipt of the policy at the office in Philadelphia, Hunter called and paid the premium, and stated that his lawyer would call for the policy. Some days thereafter his lawyer received the policy and the assignment, and they were subsequently delivered to Hunter. Within six weeks thereafter Armstrong was attacked at night, and died from the wounds he received. Suspicion fell upon Hunter as the perpetrator or instigator of the attack. He was accordingly arrested and tried for the murder of Armstrong, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged, and the sentence executed.

In the case at bar, the application for the insurance was made by Davis, and not by Lester. It was applied for by Davis, for the benefit of his estate, and not for the benefit of Lester. There is no evidence of any agreement at the time the insurance was applied for, or at any other time prior to the assignment, that Davis was to assign the policies to Lester. It is true that he was encouraged by Lester to take out the policies, but he was also encouraged by the other persons present,—at least when the first policy was applied for. The policies were issued by the company, and delivered to Davis as their owner; and he afterwards assigned them to Lester, in whose employment he was, and who had promised to see the first premiums on the policies paid, and did pay them before the assignment.

In New York Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Armstrong, 117 U. S. 591, 29 L. ed. 997, it was stated by the court that, "the assignment conveying to Hunter the whole interest of the assured, his representatives alone would have a valid claim under it, if the policy were not void in its inception;" but Lester, even if he honestly acquired the assignment of the policies on the life of Davis, the policies not being proved to be void in their inception, would have only had a claim under them for the amount necessary to reimburse him for the premiums he had paid. However valid the transaction, this was all that he could recover, in any event, and the residue of the proceeds of the policies belong to the estate of the insured. Roller v. Moore, 86 Va. 512, 6 L. R. A. 136, and Long v. Meriden Britannia Co. 94 Va. 594.

The court, by its decree, forfeited to the company an amount equal to the premiums paid by Lester, and only decreed the residue of the policies to be paid to the estate of the insured. The evidence does not justify, nor public policy require, a decree more favorable to the appellant.

The decree must be affirmed.

MERCHANTS' BANK OF DANVILLE, Appt.,
v.

C. E. BALLOU et al.

(.....Va.....)

1. Notice to trustees in a deed of trust of the existence of a prior encumbrance is not ineffectual to subordinate the second deed to the first because of the fact that they did not know of the intent to make the later deed to them or of its record at the time it was made.
2. A statute curing the defective acknowledgment of a deed of trust and the consequent defect in the record of the deed is ineffectual to give it priority over a judgment lien which had been acquired before the defect was cured, as the displacement of the judgment creditor's lien would impair the obligation of his contract.

NOTE.—For constitutionality of statutes legalizing invalid private contracts, see note to Lowe v. Harris (N. C.) 22 L. R. A. 379; also Shields v. Clifton Hill Land Co. (Tenn.) 26 L. R. A. 509, and Lindsay v. United States Sav. & L. Co. (Ala.) 42 L. R. A. 783.

(February 8, 1899.)

A PPEAL by defendant Merchants' Bank of Danville from a decree of the Circuit Court for Halifax County settling the priority of liens upon property of C. E. Ballou in an injunction proceeding by the Bank of South Boston to enjoin a sale of the property in alleged contravention of its rights under a deed of trust. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Green & Miller, for appellant:

A notice to a trustee which binds his cestui que trust is either notice that comes to the trustee while acting as agent for the cestui que trust, or such notice as it is the duty of the trustee to communicate to the cestui que trust, as representing him.

A trustee is a purchaser for value because he represents the cestui que trust, because he is the agent of the cestui que trust, and stands for him. A trustee seldom parts with anything. It is the consideration furnished by the cestui que trust that makes the value. The trustee is a mere agent.

Shurtz v. Johnson, 28 Gratt. 661; Wickham v. Martin, 13 Gratt. 432; Exchange Bank v. Knox, 19 Gratt. 747; Evans v. Greenhow, 15 Gratt. 153.

Whatever knowledge a trustee can have, that will be imputed to a cestui que trust; the same knowledge in an agent would be imputed to a principal; in other words, it must be such knowledge, which if it had come to an agent, instead of a trustee, would be imputed to the agent's principal.

Morrison v. Bausemer, 32 Gratt. 225; Johnson v. National Exch. Bank, 33 Gratt. 474.

There is one line of cases that bases the rule "Notice to agent is notice to principal" on the identity of the two, that the former is the alter ego of the latter. In this line of cases it is said, the rule "Notice to agent is notice to principal" "is limited to such notice as comes to the agent while he is acting as agent," that the agent cannot stand in the place of the principal until the relation of principal and agent is created, and "as to all information previously acquired by the agent, the principal is a mere stranger, and not bound."

Trentor v. Pothen, 46 Minn. 298, 24 Am. St. Rep. 228, note.

The other line of cases is based upon the idea that it is the duty of the agent to disclose to the principal all notice and knowledge he may possess and which is necessary for the protection of the principal, whether it was notice received before or after the commencement of the relation.

The Virginia cases follow the first line.

Morrison v. Bausemer, 32 Gratt. 225; Johnson v. National Exch. Bank, 33 Gratt. 474.

The operation of the rule laid down in the second line of cases would work very curiously in this case, for here the agent never knew of the agency, never knew that he was an agent so that he could observe the duty imposed upon him to disclose everything, until the deed was recorded and his disclosures then would have been useless.

Notice to a trustee before his appointment will not affect a subsequent purchase by him on behalf of the cestui que trust.

Mr. William Leigh, for appellee, Bank of South Boston:

If a subsequent purchaser, though for value, has notice of a prior unrecorded deed, such deed shall be as valid as to him as if actually recorded. The statute was only intended to protect "purchasers for value without notice."

Carrington and Watkins, trustees, being purchasers for value and having notice of the unrecorded deed to Lawson, trustee, they took in subordination and subject to the rights of said Lawson, trustee, and the bank of South Boston the beneficiary therein.

The trustee need not be the authorized or employed agent of the beneficiaries.

Beverley v. Brooke, 2 Leigh, 426.

If there is any question as to the acknowledgment and recordation of the deed of trust to R. W. Lawson, trustee, it is set at rest by the act of assembly approved March 1, 1894.

Being intended as a remedial, curative, and validating statute, it was in the power of the legislature to enact it, and to make it retroactive so as to cure any defect in the recordation of the deed aforesaid, and if any defect so existed it was so cured.

The act of March 1, 1894, is retrospective in express terms "and where the language plainly shows the legislative intent that the statute should have a retrospective operation, and the omission to be cured is some act with which the legislature might have dispensed by a prior statute, the courts will so construe the act as to give it the retrospective operation intended."

The acknowledgment of the deed of trust from Ballou to Lawson, trustee, for the benefit of the Bank of South Boston, taken by Joseph Stebbins, an officer of, and stockholder in, said bank, was not void, but was voidable only, and good until set aside and annulled in a proper proceeding.

And while the legislature cannot, by statute, give life to a void judgment or judicial act, it can and has the power to cure any defect or irregularity in judgments, and such legislation being curative and remedial is constitutional and valid.

Hill v. Rixey, 26 Gratt. 72; Gurnee v. Johnson, 77 Va. 712.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an interlocutory decree settling the principles of the cause, determining the right of priority between liens, and ordering the sale of certain real estate for the satisfaction of said liens. The appellee contends that the appellant has no standing in this court—First, because the appeal was not taken from the interlocutory decree complained of until after there had been a final decree; and, second, because appellant acquiesced in the decree complained of until it was too late to put the parties in statu quo if the same was reversed.

These questions it is unnecessary to consider, for the reason that the decree complained of must be affirmed, and therefore, whether they are decided for or against appellant, the result is the same.

The case presented by the appellant is as follows: On September 21, 1892, C. E. Ballou conveyed to R. W. Lawson, trustee, a certain mill property to secure the Bank of South Boston $2,000. This deed was not recorded until April 14, 1893. In the meantime, on April 12, 1893, C. E. Ballou conveyed this same property to J. M. Carrington and H. J. Watkins, trustees, to secure numerous creditors; this last-named deed being recorded on April 13, 1893. Soon thereafter Carrington and Watkins proceeded to execute the deed to them by advertising the property for sale, and on May 17, 1893, an injunction was awarded stopping the sale, upon the alleged ground that the trustees, Carrington and Watkins, had notice of the deed for the benefit of the appellee the Bank of South Boston, and that, therefore, neither they nor the beneficiaries under their deed had acquired priority over appellee by its recordation. The rights of all the creditors were determined in this proceeding, the court holding that the beneficiaries under the deed to Carrington and Watkins took in subordination to the Lawson deed securing the Bank of South Boston.

The testimony of Carrington and Watkins shows that each of them had full and complete knowledge all the time of the Lawson deed securing the Bank of South Boston, and that they knew of the existence of said deed at the time the deed from Ballou to them was executed, although they did not know of the intention of Ballou to execute the second deed, and did not know it was executed until it was recorded; that on the day it was recorded they were notified of the fact, and immediately asked if the Bank of South Boston had been protected.

That Carrington and Watkins had full knowledge of the Lawson deed at the time the deed to them was made and recorded is not denied. That a trustee or trustees in a deed to secure bona fide debts are purchasers for value, and that notice to him, or them, or either of them, is notice to the beneficiaries in said deed, is not controverted.

The contention of appellant is that Carrington and Watkins, being ignorant of the execution and recordation of the deed to them at the time it was executed and recorded, were in no sense agents of the beneficiaries under that deed; that they knew nothing of the claims of the beneficiaries, or of the intention of Ballou to make a deed to secure them, until the deed had been fully executed and recorded; that they were only purchasers of the legal title, and if they had died, or had declined to accept the trust, that notice to them would not have affected the beneficiaries; that their failure to act would have related back to the date of the record of the deed, and their appointment thereunder become void, while the deed would have remained a subsisting security in favor of the beneficiaries; that, under such circumstances, it would be inequitable to allow the rights of the beneficiaries to be affected by knowledge of the trustees, not acquired in their capacity as agents of the beneficiaries, but as agents of the South Boston Bank, it appearing that the trustees acquired their knowledge of the first deed while officers of the South Boston Bank.

In contemplation of law, the relation of principal and agent between the trustee named in a deed and the beneficiaries under it begins when the transaction is completed. The trustee named may not act when informed of his appointment, but his acceptance is presumed until he declines, and when he refuses to act a successor is appointed, who takes his shoes and is substituted to all the rights and responsibilities of the position, as if he had been originally appointed, and the trust in his hands is tainted with all the imperfections that attached to it in the hands of the original trustee. It is not necessary to the validity of the deed that it should be executed by the trustee or the beneficiaries, or even that they, as a matter of fact, should know of its execution. The duties and powers of the trustee are not conferred by the creditor, but arise out of the instrument creating the trust. The rights of the creditor come to him through the trustee, under the provisions of the deed, and so it has been repeatedly held by this court that the knowledge of the trustee of a prior existing deed is imputed to the creditor. Under the settled law of this state, Carrington and Watkins are, under the deed in question, purchasers for value, and under the facts proved they are purchasers with notice; for they were, confessedly, at the time of the execution and recordation of the deed to them, fully possessed of the fatal knowledge of the first deed, which made the second deed subordinate to the first.

It is not perceived how the position of Carrington and Watkins, as purchasers for value with notice, can be affected by the fact that they were not aware of the intention of Ballou to make the second deed or of its recordation when made; nor is it seen how their ignorance of that fact can take this case out of the established principles already adverted to.

Under rule 9, the Bank of South Boston, one of the appellees, assigns as error to its prejudice the action of the court in giving the lien of certain judgments priority over its deed of trust.

This deed was acknowledged before the president of, and a stockholder in, the Bank of South Boston, the beneficiary thereunder, and was therefore not duly recorded, as against the judgments in question. It is, however, contended that the defect in its acknowledgment and recordation was cured by an act of assembly approved March 1, 1894, which provides "that no acknowledgment heretofore or hereafter taken to any deed or other writing executed by a company for the benefit of a company shall be held to be invalid by reason of said acknowledgment having been taken by a notary public or other officer, who, at the time of taking said acknowledgment, was a stockholder or officer in the company which executed said deed or writing, and who was in no otherwise interested in the property conveyed or disposed of by said deed or writing; and the record of any such deed or writing heretofore made shall in all respects be deemed valid, notwithstanding the fact that the notary or other officer was, at the time of such acknowledgment, a stockholder or officer in the company executing said deed or writing or for the benefit of which such deed or writing was executed; provided, said notary or other officer was in no otherwise interested in the property conveyed or disposed of by said deed or writing when said acknowledgment was taken." Acts 1893-94, p. 580.

The contention is that this act was intended as a remedial, curative, and validating statute; that it was in the power of the legislature to enact it, and to make it retroactive, so as to cure any defect in the recordation of the deed in question, and to give it the same force and effect that it would have had if properly recorded in the first instance.

A statute will not be construed so as to give it a retroactive operation unless there is something on the face of the enactment putting it beyond a doubt that such was the purpose of the legislature. Whether or not the act relied on shows on its face a plain purpose on the part of the legislature to make the imperfect acknowledgments mentioned therein valid from their date, even though it destroyed the rights of judgment creditors whose liens were acquired before the passage of the act, we will not stop here to consider, but will proceed to inquire as to the power of the legislature to enact a law having the retroactive effect claimed for this.

It is unquestionably true that the legislature has power to pass retroactive laws within certain limits, even though such laws may affect a certain class of vested rights. Danville v. Pace, 25 Gratt. 1, 18 Am. Rep. 663. The opinion of Judge Staples in this case is an elaborate and instructive discussion of the subject under consideration. The reasoning of the learned judge and the authorities cited make it clear that it is not within the proper limits of the lawmaking power to disturb vested rights of property by retroactive legislation.

There can be no doubt that a judgment is such a vested right of property that the legislature cannot, by a retroactive law, either destroy or diminish its value. Murphy v. Gaskins, 28 Gratt. 207, 222; Ratcliffe v. Anderson, 31 Gratt. 105, 31 Am. Rep. 716; Gilman v. Tucker, 13 L. R. A. 304, 128 N. Y. 190. In the case last cited the power of the legislature to pass retroactive legislation affecting a judgment is denied, and in discussing the subject it is said: "We must bear in mind that a judgment has been rendered, and the rights flowing from it have passed beyond the legislative power, either directly or indirectly, to reach or destroy. After adjudication the fruits of the judgment become the rights of property. These rights became vested by the action of the court, and were thereby placed beyond the reach of legislative power to affect."

In Murphy v. Gaskins, 28 Gratt. 207, 222, an act of the legislature was construed which empowered the court, in which any judgment or decree had been rendered prior to the passage of the act, on motion of the defendant, to review such judgment or decree, and abate the same to the extent of the war interest included therein. The court held the act to be in violation of the state and Federal Constitutions, and in the course of an able opinion Judge Burks says: "Judgments and decrees for money being contracts of the highest character, of course, and for the reasons before stated, to abate any portion of the interest included in them would necessarily impair their obligation. Moreover, by such judgments and decrees, the rights of the parties in whose behalf they were rendered, to the money ordered to be paid, whether principal or interest, have become vested, and cannot be divested, as provided by the act of the general assembly."

It is, however, contended that the effect of the statute in question is not to impair the validity of the judgment, but only to modify the remedy for its enforcement. In other words, that though the judgment itself is a vested right, that cannot be impaired or diminished by a retroactive law, yet the lien is not a vested right, but only a remedy provided for enforcing the judgment, which can be taken away by such a law. This position is not tenable. The right to the lien upon the debtor's real estate is in many cases the sole inducement to the credit which constitutes the basis of the judgment. Without the benefit of that lien, guaranteed by the law, at the time the judgment is taken, the credit would not have been given.

In Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. p. 440, it is said that a right, to be vested, "must have 44 L. R. A.

become a title, legal or equitable, to the present or future enjoyment of property, or to the present or future enforcement of a demand, or a legal exemption from a demand made by another"; and at page 445 it is said: "But a vested right of action is property in the same sense in which tangible things are property, and is equally protected against arbitrary interference."

In the case of Edwards v. Kearzey, 96 U. S. 503, 24 L. ed. 793, it was held: "The remedy subsisting in a state when and where a contract is made, and is to be performed, is a part of the obligation; and any subsequent law of the state, which so affects that remedy as substantially to impair and lessen the value of the contract, is forbidden by the Constitution of the United States, and therefore void." Mr. Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It is also the settled doctrine of this court that the laws which subsist at the time and place of making a contract enter into and form a part of it [the contract] as if they were expressly referred to or incorporated in its terms. This rule embraces alike those which affect its validity, construction, discharge, and enforcement."

Judge Christian, in delivering the opinion of the court in The Homestead Cases, 22 Gratt. 288, 12 Am. Rep. 507, says: "Nothing can be more material to the obligation than the means of its enforcement. The ideas of validity and remedy are inseparable, and both are parts of the obligation, which are guaranteed by the Constitution against invasion. The laws which subsist at the time and place of making a contract, and where it is to be performed, enter into and form a part of it, as if they were expressly referred to and incorporated in its terms. It is competent for the states to change the form of the remedy, or to modify it otherwise as they may see fit, provided that no substantial right secured by the contract is thereby impaired. But any law which in its operation amounts to a denial or obstruction of the rights accruing by a contract, though professing to act only on the remedy, is directly obnoxious to the prohibition of the Constitution."

If, then, the lien of a judgment be, as contended, a mere remedy for enforcing the judgment, the statute which gives that remedy forms a part of the contract for the lien, and any law which takes away such a remedy impairs the obligation of the contract. When these judgments were obtained, the creditor, unquestionably, had a clear statutory right to enforce them against the real estate in controversy; and it would seem to be equally clear that such a right is a vested right, that cannot be taken away by subsequent legislation. If the constitutional provision relied on can be successfully invoked, as we have seen it can be, to prevent a party from being deprived, by a retroactive law, of a few dollars of war interest included in his judgment, surely the same constitutional guaranty would avail to save the same party from having his whole judgment destroyed by a retroactive law taking away the lien which alone, as in the case at bar, gives that judgment its life and value It has been well said:

"You take my house when you do take the prop
That doth sustain my house; you take my life
When you do take the means whereby I live."

For these reasons the decree complained of must be affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

Alexander FRANKENTHAL et al., Appts.,

v.

Sol. SOLOMONSON, Resp't.

(.....Wash.....)

Examination of a wife on supplementary proceedings against her husband, with respect to property in her possession, is not an examination "for or against her husband," within the meaning of 2 Hill's Code Proc. § 1640, requiring the husband's consent to her examination for or against him.

(January 6, 1899.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County dismissing a proceeding supplementary to an execution against defendant for the purpose of examining his wife as to property in her possession which was alleged to belong to him. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Stoll & Macdonald, for appellants:

The character of supplementary proceedings is somewhat analogous to garnishment. The wife may be charged as the garnishee of her husband, and compelled to be examined and make disclosure.

Mr. Adolph Munter, for respondent:

The wife of Sol. Solomonson, in this case, is not a party to a side issue, and she was to be examined in the main case. She neither in the title nor elsewhere appears as a party.

2 Wade, Attachm. § 332, p. 15.

The husband and wife cannot be witnesses for or against each other. This is a settled principle of law and equity, and it is founded as well on the interests of the parties being the same as on public policy. The functions of society would be shaken, according to the strong language in one of the cases.

2 Kent, Com. pp. 178, 179; Co. Litt. 6b; White v. Stafford, 38 Barb. 419.

Anders, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On June 21, 1897, the plaintiffs and appellants herein recovered a judgment in the superior court of Spokane county against one Sol. Solomonson for the sum of $1,315.45 and costs. Execution was issued thereon, placed in the hands of the sheriff of the county, and by him returned wholly unsatisfied. Thereafter the plaintiffs instituted this proceeding against Sarah Solomonson, wife of the said judgment debtor, under an act of the legislature approved March 15, 1893, entitled "An Act Relating to Proceedings Supplementary to Execution" (Laws 1893, p. 435.) Section 3 of that act provides that upon proof by affidavit or otherwise, to the satisfaction of the judge, that execution has been issued as prescribed by § 1 of the act, and also that any person or corporation has personal property of the judgment debtor of the value of $25 or over, or is indebted to him in said amount, the judge may make an order requiring such person or corporation, or an officer thereof, to appear at a specified time and place before him, or a referee appointed by him, and answer concerning the same. In accordance with this section, an affidavit was filed on behalf of the plaintiffs, setting forth the rendition of the judgment against said Sol. Solomonson, the issuance and return of the execution, and that the defendant Sarah Solomonson had in her possession or under her control personal property of the value of $25 or more, and other property, all of which is the separate property of said Sol. Solomonson, and is held in the possession and under the control of said Sarah Solomonson for the purpose of preventing the collection and satisfaction of said judgment and execution. On motion of plaintiffs, the court issued an order directing the said Sarah Solomonson to appear before the court at a time and place designated, then and there to be examined touching what property, if any, she had or controlled, and which was the separate property of said Sol. Solomonson, or in which he had some separate interest. She appeared at the time and place designated, and, the matter coming on to be heard, the said Sol. Solomonson objected to her being examined, upon the ground that a wife may not be examined for or against her husband without his consent. The consideration of this objection was taken under advisement by the court, and thereafter sustained, and judgment was entered dismissing the proceedings. To these rulings of the court the plaintiffs duly excepted, and the cause is now here upon appeal; and the only question to be determined is whether the court erred in sustaining the objection and dismissing the proceedings.

It is claimed by the respondent that the action of the court was fully justified by § 1649 of the Code of Procedure (2 Hill's Code), which reads as follows: "A husband shall not be examined for or against his wife without the consent of the wife, nor a wife for or against her husband without the consent of the husband; nor can either, during marriage or afterward, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during marriage. . . ." It is insisted by the learned counsel for the respondent that this law is based upon higher ground than that invoked by appellants, namely, that of preventing the suppression of truth, or the failure of justice in particular cases. And, as an expression of his position, counsel cites us to the declarations of Chancellor Kent and of Lord Coke. "The husband and wife," says Chancellor Kent, "cannot be witnesses for or against each other. . . . This is a settled principle of law and equity, and it is founded as well on the interest of the parties being the same as on public policy. The foundations of society would be shaken, according to the strong language in one of the cases." 2 Kent, Com. pp. 178, 179. And Lord Coke says: "It hath been resolved . . . that a wife cannot be produced either against or for her husband, . . . and it might be a cause of implacable discord and dissension between the husband and the wife, and the means of great inconvenience." Co. Litt. 6b. It must be borne in mind, however, that both Chancellor Kent and Lord Coke were speaking of the rule at common law. The rule that excluded husband and wife from testifying for or against each other was adopted at a very early day in England, and at a time when husband and wife were in law one person, and when no party to an action was a competent witness because of his interest therein. But this rule of common law has been changed by legislation in this and almost every other state, and the interest of a party in an action is no longer a disqualification as a witness. And our lawmakers manifestly concluded that public policy should not alone prevent a husband or wife from testifying for or against each other. Under the statute above quoted, either may be a witness for or against the other by the consent of that other; and it can hardly be said that that is "public policy," as the term is ordinarily understood, 44 L. R. A.

and therefore beneficial to the public at large, which depends exclusively upon the will or caprice of a particular individual. Counsel for the respondent also cites the following cases as sustaining his contention that the defendant Mrs. Solomonson was not a competent witness in this proceeding: Berles v. Adair, 102 Mich. 495; De Farges v. Ryland, 87 Va. 404; Niland v. Kalish, 37 Neb. 47; Wolford v. Farnham, 44 Minn. 159; Macondray v. Wardle, 20 Barb. 612; White v. Stafford, 38 Barb. 419. But an examination of these authorities will disclose that they are cases in which both the husband and wife were parties, and in which the plaintiff called either the one or the other as a witness; and neither of the cases involved a proceeding in any wise like the present, except the Michigan case, in which a wife was cited as garnishee in an action pending against her husband, and in which it was held that she could not be compelled to testify over her husband's objection. The rule contended for by respondent here was properly applied in those cases. But this is an entirely different proceeding. Here the husband is not a party, and, we think, it may be said, is not interested in such a sense as to preclude the examination of the wife as a witness for the plaintiff. Mr. Freeman, speaking of supplemental proceedings, says that a defendant is not entitled to notice of a proceeding of this character against his creditor; nor is he a party thereto in such a sense as entitles him to interfere therewith, or to conduct the defense of the party cited. 2 Freeman, Executions, 2d ed. § 411. See also Gibson v. Haggerty, 37 N. Y. 555, 97 Am. Dec. 752, and Jones v. Roberts, 60 N. H. 216. In the case last cited, it was held that a wife may be charged as trustee of her husband, and that the latter has no such necessary interest in the controversy between the plaintiff and the trustee as to make him the adverse party, within the meaning of the statute. It appears that in some jurisdictions a writ of garnishment may be issued either before or after judgment, and, in considering the nature of such proceeding, Mr. Shinn observes that "it may be stated as a rule that, in states where garnishment is not issued until after the creditor obtains judgment against his debtor, then the proceeding by garnishment against a person indebted to the judgment debtor is a new suit, to which the creditor is plaintiff, and the garnishee the defendant, brought into court by the process. It is governed by the general rules applicable to other suits, and to this suit a judgment debtor is a stranger." 2 Shinn, Attachm. § 469.

"While in this state a proceeding after judgment is not denominated a "garnishment," the principle involved is the same; and it would appear from the quotation from this learned author and the authorities therein referred to that the judgment debtor is a mere stranger to this proceeding against his wife. It follows, therefore, that whatever the testimony of Mrs. Solomonson might have been, it would have been neither for nor against her husband, but for or against herself. If the husband had been called as a witness by the plaintiff, a different question would have been presented. In a proceeding like this, the supreme court of Wisconsin, in Re O'Brien, 24 Wis. 547, decided that the judgment debtor's wife may be required to disclose whether she has property of her husband under her control, and may be attached as for a contempt for refusing to answer. At that time the statute of Wisconsin, like ours, permitted parties other than the judgment debtor to be examined in supplementary proceedings. The law was subsequently changed so as to restrict the proceeding to the judgment debtor alone; and the supreme court of the state, in Blabon v. Gilchrist, 67 Wis. 38, held that, under the new law, the husband was not a competent witness against the wife, who was the judgment debtor. There is nothing in this latter case inconsistent with the former. In New York it was held, at a special term of the supreme court, that the wife of a judgment debtor may be examined under § 294 of the Code, which authorizes the examination of third persons alleged to have property belonging to the judgment debtor. Lockwood v. Worstell, 15 Abb. Pr. 430, note. The same doctrine was announced in Thompson v. Silvers, 59 Iowa, 670, by the supreme court of Iowa, and is approved by Mr. Waples in his work on Attachment & Garnishment, 2d ed. §§ 949, 950. See also 2 Wade, Attachm. § 350; Rood, Garnishment, § 41. It seems to us that this rule is both reasonable and just, and not inconsistent with our statute. Any other rule would permit a debtor to put all of his personal property in the hands of his wife, and thereby relieve himself from the payment of his honest debts, though abundantly able to pay them.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

Gordon, Dunbar, and Reavis, JJ., concur.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

Samuel H. TROXLER

v.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(.....N. C.)

1. Continuing negligence of an employer, such as the failure to furnish safe appliances in general use, which would have prevented the possibility of injury, precludes the defense of contributory negligence.
2. Failure to furnish proper and safe appliances, whereby a servant is injured, cannot be attributed to the negligence of a fellow servant.
3. Failure to furnish automatic car couplers in common use for freight cars is negligence per se, which renders a railroad company liable to an employee for injuries received in attempting to couple cars having skeleton drawheads of unequal height.

(March 21, 1899.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Guilford County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. H. Busbee, for appellant:

The opinion of the court in the case of Greenlee v. Southern R. Co. 122 N. C. 982, 41 L. R. A. 399, falls into what it is respectfully submitted is the cardinal error of treating the date of the rendition of the opinion in May, 1898, as the time of the accident, which was some years previous.

In the case at bar the injury occurred on February 2, 1895.

The opinion in Mason's Case, 111 N. C. 490, 18 L. R. A. 845, was delivered about

NOTE.—See also Greenlee v. Southern R. Co. (N. C.) 41 L. R. A. 399.

December, 1892, scarcely more than two years prior to the accident. In the report of the Interstate Commission of December 1, 1895, published nearly a year after the Troxler injury, it is stated, on page 52 that "74.80 per cent of the total equipment is still without train brakes, and 72.70 per cent without automatic couplers."

At that time the Federal law required interstate equipment to be supplied with these safety appliances by January 1, 1898, and this time was afterwards extended to January 1, 1900.

To render the opinion of the court in the Greenlee Case applicable to the case at bar, the court must now hold that two years after the indefinite warning by the court in Mason's Case, and five years before the national authority required the general use of these safety appliances, a decision can be based upon the warning in the Mason Case, and make a failure to use automatic couplers absolute negligence two years after Mason's Case, upon the allegation that there was a six years' notice. This seems in all respects to be ex post facto.

Messrs. Schenck & Schenck and Charles M. Stedman, for appellee:

There was an implied obligation resting on the defendant company that it should provide suitable and safe cars and appliances to enable plaintiff to do his work as safely as the hazards incident to the employment would permit.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was injured in attempting to couple cars of the defendant on which there were no automatic car couplers, but in lieu thereof skeleton drawheads, of unequal height. The court below held that the absence of automatic couplers, in general use, was negligence per se, and refused to submit an issue whether the injury was not caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, and refused to instruct the jury, as prayed, that 44 L. R. A.

the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence if he could, by proper care, have coupled the cars by hand without accident.

The duty to furnish proper and safe appliances is that of the common master, and injury caused by their absence cannot be attributed to the negligence of a fellow servant. Trowler v. Southern R. Co. 122 N. C. 902; Wright v. Southern R. Co. 122 N. C. 959. It has been heretofore held in Greenlee v. Southern R. Co. 122 N. C. 977, 41 L. R. A. 399, that failure of a railroad company to equip its freight cars with modern self-coupling devices is negligence per se, continuing up to the time of an injury sustained by an employee in coupling cars by hand, and renders the company liable, whether such employee was negligent in the manner of making the coupling or not. The same ruling had been previously made as to the duty of furnishing automatic car couplers on passenger trains in Mason v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1892) 111 N. C. 482, 18 L. R. A. 845. Where the negligence of the defendant is a continuing negligence (as the failure to furnish safe appliances, in general use, when the use of such appliances would have prevented the possibility of the injury), there can be no contributory negligence which will discharge the master's liability. This has been repeatedly and uniformly held. Norton's Case, 122 N. C. 911; McLamb's Case, 122 N. C. 873; Cone v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 81 N. Y. 206, 37 Am. Rep. 461. The failure to provide the necessary appliances is the causa causans. The defendant, however, frankly asks us to reconsider and overrule Greenlee's Case. That case was the expression of no new doctrine, but the affirmation of one as old as the law, and founded on the soundest principles of justice and reason, to wit: That when safer appliances have been invented, tested, and have come into general use, it is negligence per se for the master to expose his servant to the hazard of life or limb from antiquated and defective appliances which have been generally discarded by the intelligence and humanity of other employers. Witsell v. West Asheville & S. S. R. Co. 120 N. C. 557. This must be so, if masters owe any duties to their employees, and unless economy of expenditures on the part of the railroad management is to be deemed superior to the conservation of the lives and limbs of those employed in their operation. In the twelfth annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission (1898), published by authority of the United States government, upon returns made by the railroad companies themselves, it is stated (at page 88): "Since the enactment of the law in 1893 [requiring automatic couplers] there has been a decreasing number of casualties. There were 1,034 fewer employees killed, and 4,062 fewer injured, during the year ending June 30, 1897, than during the same period in 1893. The importance of this subject will be realized when the yearly casualties to railway employees are compared with those which occurred during the recent war. In the Spanish-American war there were 298 killed and 1,645 wounded. In 1897, there were 1,693 men killed and 27,667 injured, from all causes, in railway service. From coupling and uncoupling cars alone 219 less were killed, and 4,904 less were injured, in 1897 than in 1893, when the law was enacted. The number of such employees killed has been reduced one half, and the number of injured, also, practically reduced one half. The reduction in the number of accidents from all causes largely exceeded (by nearly three to one), in a single year, the entire casualties resulting from the prosecution of the late war." Thus, in four years from 1893 to 1897, notwithstanding the increase of thousands of miles of railways, and over 100,000 of employees, and the further fact that the railroad corporations have been able to procure from the interstate commerce commission an extension of the time at which the law of Congress imposing a penalty for operating any cars without self-couplers will come into force, the shadow of the law has procured so general an attachment of these self-couplers that 5,213 fewer employees were killed and wounded in coupling and uncoupling cars in 1897 than in 1893. Can it, therefore, be seriously contended that the absence of such safety appliances is not a negligence per se, rendering the railroad company liable for damages? As these appliances have been patented and more or less in use for over thirty years, it should not have required an act of Congress to enforce their universal adoption. Failure to adopt them, after being so long and widely known and used, was negligence in the defendant upon the principles of the common law. Witsell's Case, 120 N. C. 557. The act of Congress imposing a penalty for failure to add the appliances, after January 1, 1898, in no wise affected the right of any employee to recover for damages sustained by the negligence of any railroad company to attach them. The action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in extending the date at which such act should come into force (by virtue of authority given in the act) could not set aside the principle of law that failure to adopt such appliances was negligence per se, nor have any other effect than to postpone the date at which the United States government would impose the prescribed penalty upon all railroads engaged in interstate commerce failing to equip all their cars with automatic couplers,—a penalty which is imposed irrespective of whether any accidents occur from such failure or not. The indifference of railroad companies shown in not adopting these life and limb saving appliances is all the greater since their cost is comparatively small. Indeed the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the above cited report (page 89), state that, considering the less expense required in repairs, they are an actual saving. They say: "Figures submitted by one of the leading railroad companies indicate that the adoption of the automatic coupler will result in saving a very large sum annually, in comparison with the expense incurred in former years in applying and maintaining the link and pin type; and this does not take into account the reduced cost to the roads which must result from fewer suits for damages by injured employees." And, further, that, there being too much slack in the old pin and link for the brake to act economically or successfully, the automatic coupler "makes the requirements of railroad operation better, as well as minimizes the danger to employees." In Witsell v. West Asheville & S. S. R. Co. 120 N. C. 557, 562, it is said: "If any appliance is such that the railroads should have it, the poverty of the company is no sufficient excuse for not having it." But not only, as above, the use of self-couplers would be an actual economy to the defendant, but that it is amply able to put on these appliances, if it was not, is shown by the published report of the defendant company that its gross earnings for the year 1895 (when this injury was inflicted) were over $17,000,000, and its net earnings over and above all expenses, were more than $5,000,000 (Poor, R. R. Manual, 1898, p. 792),—figures which, for the year just past, have risen to over $20,000,000 gross earnings and over $6,000,000 net earnings. With such an array as above of the terrible cost of life and limb by failure to use appliances to avoid coupling and uncoupling cars by hand (in doing which the plaintiff was injured), the small expense—nay, actual economy—of adopting them, and the ample means the defendant possesses, we cannot reverse our ruling in Greenlee's Case, that it is negligence per se in any railroad company to cause one of its employees to risk his life or limb in making couplings which can be made automatically without risk.

This matter of requiring these great corporations to protect the traveling public, and their employees as well, by the adoption of all safety appliances which have come into general use, is so important that we have gone into the subject at this length. Ordinarily owned by great syndicates out of the state in which they operate, and their management, at all events, removed from any subjection to that sound public opinion which is so great a check upon the conduct of individuals, and of government itself, the sole protection left to the traveler and the employee alike is the application of that law which is administered impartially, and which can lay its hand fearlessly upon the most powerful combination, and protect with its care the humblest individual in the land. The subject is one of transcendent importance; for, notwithstanding the partial adoption of these appliances and consequent reduction in casualties, the twelfth annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission shows (page 77) that for the year ending June 30, 1897, on the railroads engaged in interstate commerce (which alone report to that commission), there were still 43,168 casualties, of which 6,437 resulted in death. Of these, 1,693 killed, and 27,667 wounded, were railroad employees, among whom 214 were killed and 6,283 wounded in coupling or uncoupling cars. In our own state, the report of the North Carolina railroad commission for 1898 (pages 250, 251) shows that for the year ending June 30, 1898, the railroads reported 879 persons killed and wounded (of whom 99 were killed), and of these 23 of the killed, and 599 of the wounded, were employees,—total, 622. As, of the 9,000 employees reported in this state, 4,000 (according to the usual ratio) were employees engaged in the actual operation of the trains, it follows that in this state 1 such employee in every 6½ was in that year injured or killed. In view of such mortality, rivaling that of the bloodiest wars, this court cannot reverse its declaration heretofore, which is sustained by every sentiment of justice and humanity, that where a life and limb saving appliance, like automatic car couplers, has come into general use, and its partial adoption has in four years, notwithstanding the increase in railroad mileage and employees, decreased the injuries and deaths from coupling cars one half, the failure to adopt and use it is negligence per se. Considering the economy in money of using such appliances, as well as the ample revenues of the defendant, it is passing strange that it, or any other railroad company, should have delayed till now, or even till 1895, to protect the lives and limbs of their employees in this particular, or that there should have been need of an act of Congress or the verdict of a jury to stimulate considerations of humanity towards their patrons and their employees. Counsel for the defendant read, as part of his argument, a clipping from a newspaper, and repeats in his brief, that a noble English lord, who was a railroad manager as well as an hereditary member of Parliament, had changed his party affiliations because the one to which he had belonged had advocated the enforced adoption of self-couplers upon English railways. That simply shows that one such manager, at least, possesses a lordly disregard for the thousands of deaths and injuries of employees yearly caused by the lack of safety appliances; and it may be there are others who entertain sentiments of higher allegiance to the net earnings of the syndicates that employ them than to those great principles which every political party professes to advocate as being for the best interests of the public. But the hostility of one or more railway managers towards the matter cannot affect the impartial enforcement of the sound legal principle that employees and the traveling public alike have a right to be protected against any dangers which can be avoided by the adoption of safety appliances which have been tested by experience, and which have come into general use. In the present case, the defendant has the less excuse because there was uncontradicted testimony, not only that automatic car couplers were in general use at the time of the injury (March, 1895), but that the skeleton drawheads, in attempting to make a coupling with which the plaintiff was injured, were defective in that they were of different heights from the ground, and evidence that the cars could not have been coupled with a stick, or in any other manner, except by hand.

No error.

J. A. PIERCE, Admr., etc., of Frank H. Pierce, Deceased,
v.

NORTH CAROLINA RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(.....N. C.....)

1. The master is liable for injury done by the wanton, wilful, and malicious act of an employee within the scope and in the discharge of his duties.
2. The tortious act of a brakeman in throwing coal at a boy on the tender of an engine, by which he knocks him off or frightens him so that he jumps off, causing him to be run over and killed by the engine, renders the railroad company liable.
3. A broadside exception "to the charge as given" will not be considered.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Rowan County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Affirmed.

Deceased was a lad some twelve years old, who, in attempting to ride upon the tender of one of defendant's locomotives, in some way fell off and was run over and killed by the cars. There was some evidence in the case tending to show that deceased was driven from his position by missiles thrown by the fireman, and plaintiff claimed that the railroad was liable for the fireman's act. The court submitted the following issues to the jury: 1. Was the plaintiff's intestate killed by the negligence of the defendant as alleged? 2. Did the plaintiff's intestate by his own negligence contribute to his death? 3. Could the defendant by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence have avoided the injury notwithstanding the contributory negligence of the deceased? 4. What damage is plaintiff entitled to recover?

Further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles Price and G. F. Bason for appellant.

Messrs. Lee S. Overman, B. F. Long, and R. Lee Wright, for appellee:

Even if plaintiff's intestate was a trespasser and guilty of negligence in getting upon the tender, if, subsequent to and independent of his carelessness, defendant by ordinary care could have prevented the injury to him, then there is no contributory negligence upon the part of plaintiff's intestate, because the fault of the injured party becomes remote.

Smith v. Norfolk & S. R. Co. 114 N. C. 755, 25 L. R. A. 287.

If the defendant caused him to get off while the train was in motion, or knocked him off, the act of the defendant would be

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The motion to dismiss the complaint and for judgment of nonsuit appears, from the brief of defendant's counsel to be intended to raise again the question whether the lessor company, the North Carolina Railroad Company, the defendant herein, is liable "for all acts done by the lessee in the operation of the road," as was held in Logan v. North Carolina R. Co. 116 N. C. 940, but why the counsel should feel "encouraged to believe" that "this court will retire from the position it has taken upon this question," we are not advised. We have perceived no lack of "soundness of reasoning" therein. The decision in Logan's Case was made after full deliberation and with full appreciation and careful discussion of the important principle now again called in question, and it was held that "a railroad company cannot escape its responsibility for negligence by leasing its road to another company unless its charter or a subsequent act of the legislature specially exempts it from liability in such case," and it was made in an action to which the appellant herein was the party raising the question. The same proposition had been theretofore laid down by Smith, Ch. J., in Aycock v. Raleigh & A. Air Line R. Co. 89 N. C., at page 330, with cases there cited; and Logan's Case upon this point has been expressly cited and sustained in Tillett v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 118 N. C. at page 1043; James v. Western N. C. R. Co. 121 N. C., at page 528; Benton v. North Carolina R. Co. (decided May 24, 1898) 122 N. C. 1007; and Norton v. North Carolina R. Co. 122 N. C. at pages 936, 937. In the last two cases this point was again held against the same corporation which is the appellant in this case. The verdicts were for considerable sums, and in Norton's Case the defendant was represented by the same counsel as in the present case.

The issues excepted to are those suggested for cases of this nature in Denmark v. Atlantic & N. C. R. Co. 107 N. C. 185, and which have been time and again approved since. Every phase of the defendant's contention could have been presented upon the issues submitted, and there could be, therefore, no just ground of exception in that respect. Willis v. Atlantic & D. R. Co. 122 N. C. 905, and cases there cited.

The exception for refusal of the first prayer, to instruct the jury that there was no evidence of negligence, and of the fourth prayer, to instruct them that there was no evidence that the act of defendant's servant was within the scope of his duties, and of the sixth prayer, to instruct them that there was no evidence that the fireman of defendant's lessee struck the deceased and knocked him off the steps of the tender, were, upon the evidence, properly refused. The other part of the fourth prayer and the seventh prayer for instructions were given in the charge. The charge of the court given in lieu of the fifth prayer for instruction gives the defendant no ground to complain at the refusal of that prayer.

We will now consider the second and third prayers for instructions, which were: "(2) If the jury believe that the intestate of plaintiff was killed by the wanton, wilful, and malicious act of one of the employees of the railroad company, then the company would not be liable, and the jury should respond to the first issue 'No.' (3) If the jury find that the intestate's death was caused by the wanton and malicious act of the fireman, and that his act was not done in the furtherance of the business of the defendant, they should find the first issue in favor of the defendant, 'No.' The assumption in these prayers that the defendant is not liable if the plaintiff's intestate was killed by the wanton, wilful, and malicious act of one of the employees of the defendant, and especially if such act was not done in furtherance of the business of the defendant, cannot be sustained. The true test is, Was it done by such employee in the scope of the discharge of duties assigned him by the defendant, and while in the discharge of such duties? "In furtherance of the business of employer" means simply in the discharge of the duties of the employment; and the court properly told the jury that the defendant is responsible for the injury if caused by the wrongful act of the employee while acting in the scope of his employment. In Ramsden v. Boston & A. R. Co. 104 Mass. at page 120, 6 Am. Rep. 200, Gray, J., says: "If the act of the servant is within the general scope of his employment, the master is equally liable, whether the act is wilful or merely negligent (Howe v. Newmarch, 12 Allen, 49), or even if it is contrary to an express order of the master (Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Derby, 14 How. 488, 14 L. ed. 502." The rule is thus laid down in 2 Wood, Railroads, 2d ed. § 316, at page 1404: "Where the act is within the scope of the servant's authority, express or implied, it is immaterial whether the injury resulted from his negligence, or from his wilfulness and wantonness. Nor is it necessary that the master should have known that the act was to be done. It is enough if it was within the scope of the servant's authority. Thus, where a servant of a railway company employed to clean and secure its cars, and keep persons out of them, kicked a boy eleven years old from a railing, while the cars were in motion, whereby he was thrown under the cars and killed, it was held that the act, although in nobody's line of duty, being done in the course of the servant's employment, the company was chargeable therefor"; citing Northwestern R. Co. v. Hack, 66 Ill. 238, and other cases as authorities. Among many other cases almost on "all fours" with the present are Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Kelly, 36 Kan. 655, 59 Am. Rep. 598, in which it was held that "where a boy fifteen years old gets upon a freight train wrongfully, and as a trespasser, for the purpose of riding without paying his fare, and is commanded by the brakeman to jump off the train while in dangerous motion, in the night-time, and in obedience to that command, and in fear of being thrown off, jumps off the train and is run over and injured, the company is liable"; and it is further held that whether the brakeman acted wantonly and maliciously, or merely failed to exercise due care and caution, the railroad company is liable for damages resulting from the brakeman's conduct,—citing many cases. 44 L. R. A.

In Rounds v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 64 N. Y. 129, 21 Am. Rep. 597, the defendant was held liable where the plaintiff jumped upon the platform of a baggage car to ride to a place where the cars were being backed to make up a train (this being against the regulations of the defendant), and the baggage master knocked him off, and in falling he fell upon some wood, rolled under the car, and was injured; the court holding that, to "make the master liable, . . . it is not necessary to show that he expressly authorized the particular act; it is sufficient to show that the servant was . . . acting within the general scope of his authority; and this although he departed from the private instructions, . . . abused his authority, was reckless in the performance of his duty, and inflicted unnecessary injury." In Lovett v. Salem & S. R. Co. 9 Allen, 557, it was held that where a boy ten years old wrongfully got upon a street car, and the driver ordered him to jump off while running at a dangerous speed, the company is responsible for the injuries sustained by the boy in doing so, unless it was found that the injury was caused by the boy's negligent manner of getting off. Another instance of liability for injuries sustained by a trespasser from the servant's violently and forcibly putting the trespasser off is Carter v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. [98 Ind. 552, 49 Am. Rep. 780], 8 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 347, which cites numerous precedents of like purport. But it is needless to multiply cases. All of them hold that such ejection is done by the servant in the general scope of his employment, and if done recklessly or wantonly and maliciously, and even if in a manner forbidden by the master's orders, the company is liable for the tortious act. The ground is that the proximate cause of the injury is not the trespasser's wrongfully getting on the cars, but the tortious manner in which the servant makes him get off, and that, this act being in the general scope of the servant's employment, the master is liable. In the present case, whether the child jumped off because ordered by the brakeman, or by reason of the hint of a lump of coal whizzing by his head, or was actually struck and knocked off, this mode of getting him off the moving car was tortious, and the defendant is liable for the injury caused thereby. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 822, 823, and cases cited in the notes thereto; Pierce, Railroads, pp. 278, 279; Kline v. Central P. R. Co. 37 Cal. 400, 99 Am. Dec. 282, and notes; Peck v. New York C. & H. R. Co. 70 N. Y. 587; Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Harris, 122 U. S. 597, 30 L. ed. 1146, Touanda Coal Co. v. Heeman, 86 Pa. 418, was a case exactly like this,—where the evidence was that a brakeman, by throwing coal at a boy who was wrongfully on a moving train, caused him to fall; and it was held that the company was liable in damages for the injury. The defendant, however, earnestly contends that, if the servant's act was malicious, the company is not liable for negligence. If that theory ever obtained, the above authorities show that it was contrary to reason, and has been duly and fully exploded. The company is not charged in this case with malice because of the alleged malice of its agent, and whether it could be held liable for punitive damages is not before us. It is certainly liable for compensatory damages for the injury sustained from the tort of its servant.

The brief of the learned counsel for the defendant strenuously insists that a case of this kind cannot be understood by the court, and justice properly administered, unless we translate the action back into one of the old common-law forms of actions, and that when that is done it would be seen that the plaintiff cannot sustain his demand. It is precisely because the old division into forms of action lent itself to finespun metaphysical distinctions, whereby the form of proceeding became more important than the subject-matter, and led to frequent miscarriages of justice, that the common sense of an enlightened age swept the old system away; and for more than fifty years the discarded legal jargon of a former age has sounded strange if referred to at all at Westminster Hall, in which it grew up. In our own state the Constitution abolished the old system, and by statute we have substituted the simple requirement that the complaint shall contain "a plain and concise statement of the facts constituting a cause of action." Code, § 233, subd. 2. That is the case here. We shall not delve in the debris of dead and forgotten centuries, nor disturb the dust that sleeps upon the volumes of an outworn and long-rejected legal system. To do so would be to obscure the substantial justice which it should be the sole object of every legal inquiry to ascertain. We need not darken counsel by multitude of words, nor entangle ourselves in the scholastic disputations which once obtained in legal proceedings, and very often defeated their object. This suggestion of counsel has its precedent in the physician, who, in a difficult case, proposed to give his patient something to throw him into fits, on the ground that he was infallible in curing fits. Here the plaintiff's intestate was admittedly run over and killed by the defendant's train. Upon the uncontroverted facts of this case, the brakeman, as a matter of law, was acting in the scope of his general employment; and the court properly instructed the jury that if the boy was made to get off the car (though he was on there wrongfully) by the act of the brakeman, whether malicious or not, while the train was moving, so that the boy was killed in consequence of so doing, the defendant was liable for the damage caused by the negligent conduct of its lessee in thus operating its train.

The defendant further excepted "to the charge as given." This is a "broadside" exception, which cannot be considered. This has been uniformly so held for a long series of years, and in possibly more than fifty cases, and has been recently reaffirmed by Furches, J., in Hampton v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 120 N. C., at page 538, 35 L. R. A. 808; and State v. Moore, 120 N. C. at page 571, by Faircloth, Ch. J., in State v. Ashford, 120 N. C. 588, and by Douglas, J., in State v. Webster, 121 N. C. 588; and in other recent cases,—two of them at this term. Indeed, the statute (Code, § 550) is explicit, requiring the appellant to prepare "a concise statement of the case, embodying the instructions of the judge as signed by him, if there be an exception thereto, and the requests of the counsel of the parties for instructions, if there be any exception on account of the granting or withholding thereof, and stating separately in articles numbered the errors alleged." It would be so eminently unjust to an appellee to have an entire charge excepted to, without any specifications of the errors alleged therein, that he might prepare himself for argument thereof on appeal; and the decisions that such broadside exception will be disregarded here have been so uniform that we would feel impelled to adhere to so just and uniform a ruling, even if the statute law had not so explicitly prescribed it. A careful consideration of the charge shows, besides, that there is no error therein of which the defendant could complain.

The last exception, which is for refusal of judgment in favor of defendant upon the findings of the jury, needs no consideration beyond what is involved in the preceding discussion.

Affirmed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF CHELSEA.

An oral promise by the payee of a note to renew it until such time as the improvement in the business situation would enable the maker to proceed in business without such assistance is not enforceable in equity.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County sustaining a demurrer to a bill filed to enjoin defendant from pressing suits on certain promissory notes signed and indorsed by plaintiffs on the ground that defendant had agreed to renew and discount the notes so long as the maker should need it. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Mr. John F. Simmons, for appellants:

The bill prays for specific performance of a contract, and therefore has equity.

The statement in the bill, "until such time as the improvement in the business situation should enable him to proceed in business without such assistance," is certainly not more indefinite than would have been an entire absence of any time limit, and the decisions in this commonwealth have long and invariably held that in such case the contract will last for a "reasonable length of time."

And this is the common law everywhere.

Sugden, Vend. & P. 14th ed. 271; 1 Chitty, Contr. 11th Am. ed. 434; 2 Chitty, Contr. 11th Am. ed. 1062.

While what is a reasonable time has been held to be a question of law, it is not to be determined until "all the facts and circumstances are proved on which it depends."

Loring v. Boston, 7 Met. 409; Rackemann v. Riverbank Improv. Co. 167 Mass. 1.

Mr. Henry L. Whittlesey, for appellee:

The plaintiffs have not stated such a case as to entitle them to any relief in equity.

The bill sets forth an oral agreement in regard to an entirely different matter than the suit which it seeks to enjoin. This plaintiff might have set forth the defense in the action he now seeks to enjoin, under Stat. 1883, chap. 223, § 14, in which the right to allege an equitable defense is given. As he was not prevented from so doing by either fraud, accident, or mistake, his failure to allege such defense at law should deprive him of the right to the injunction sought in the bill.

George Woods Co. v. Storer, 144 Mass. 399.

The plaintiffs set forth an action at law against the defendant.

Payson v. Lamson, 134 Mass. 503, 45 Am. Rep. 348; Fuller v. Cadwell, 6 Allen, 503; Williams v. Wilson, 124 Mass. 257; Saunders v. Huntington, 166 Mass. 96; Amherst College v. Allen, 165 Mass. 178.

The plaintiff does not offer to pay the debt or the interest thereon which he admits he has legally incurred, or to pay for the money which he has borrowed.

It being a unilateral contract, and therefore not to be enforced, no consideration to bind the bank is set forth, and it is not within the powers of the bank to enter into such a contract.

A party seeking for specific performance must show that damages would not afford an adequate compensation.

Bispham, Eq. § 375.

All agreements in order to be executed by the court of equity must be certain and defined.

Walpole v. Oxford, 3 Ves. Jr. 420; Bispham, Eq. § 377; New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Martin, 158 Mass. 313.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The understanding alleged in the bill that the bank would renew the plaintiff's notes until such time as the improvement in the business situation should enable the plaintiff to proceed in business without such assistance, is an understanding which directly contradicts the promise expressed on the face of the notes; for whereas, the promise expressed in the notes is a promise to pay money at the maturity of the instrument, the contemporary understanding cuts it down to a promise to give a new promise to pay. It is not denied, and, on the contrary, rather is implied, in the bill that the agreement to renew was not in writing. Adams v. Wordley, 1 Mees. & W. 374; Young v. Austen, L. R. 4 C. P. 553. If so, it could not be proved in contradiction of any written contract, and especially not in contradiction of a bill or note in an action at law. Spring v. Lovett, 11 Pick. 417, 420; Batchelder v. Queen Ins. Co. 135 Mass. 449; Hoare v. Graham, 3 Campb. 57; Young v. Austen, L. R. 4 C. P. 553; Abrey v. Crua, L. R. 5 C. P. 37, 44; Hill v. Gaw, 4 Pa. 493; Heist v. Hart, 73 Pa. 286, 289.

In Flight v. Gray, 3 C. B. N. S. 320, there is an intimation that relief might be given in equity upon such a promise, and some American cases treat the repudiation of an oral understanding, even though entered into with no intent not to perform it, as itself a sufficient fraud. Kearich v. Swinehart, 11 Pa. 233, 238, 240, 51 Am. Dec. 540; Taylor v. Gilman, 25 Vt. 411; Murray v. Dake, 46 Cal. 644. But this last notion has been denied by this court in cases depending upon somewhat similar principles. Bourke v. Callanan, 160 Mass. 195, 197. In Flight v. Gray, Willes, J., seems to have doubted; and, where there is no fraud other than that of relying upon the principles of law, we see no satisfactory ground for allowing the engagement in a note to be varied in this way in equity any more than at law, at least on behalf of a plaintiff seeking specific performance of the oral agreement. Dwight v. Pomerooy, 17 Mass. 303, 9 Am. Dec. 148; Woolam v. Hearn, 7 Ves. Jr. 211, 219, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. in Eq. 6th ed. p. 513, and see note page 525; Omerod v. Hardman, 5 Ves. Jr. 722, 730, 731; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 2d ed. § 854, note. See Goode v. Riley, 153 Mass. 585, 587; Quinn v. Roath, 37 Conn. 16, 30.

Again, it is highly improbable that such an agreement as is alleged can mean to leave the determination of the time when money may be demanded to anyone but the holder of the notes. See Hawkins v. Graham, 149 Mass. 284. On the face of it, it does not import a legally binding promise, but rather a hopeful encouragement, sounding only in prophecy. We cannot discover an actionable contract; still less one that can be specifically enforced. Every allegation in the bill is too vague and uncertain.

Bill dismissed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Lemuel G. HOADLEY
v.
SAVINGS BANK OF DANBURY, Appt.

(71 Conn. 599.)

1. A letter written by a broker to his principal pending the latter's negotiations for sale of the property, stating that the purchaser was procured through his efforts, is admissible in evidence in an action for commissions, not to support the truth of the statement, but as a fact relating to the conduct of the parties in respect to the transaction in dispute.
2. It is within the discretion of the trial court to admit a portion of a deposition in chief and the remainder in rebuttal.
3. That one who is led to begin negotiation for property which he finally purchases through the intervention of a broker had been engaged at some prior time in a bootless negotiation for the same property, and that he finally completes the sale through secret negotiation with the owner, do not deprive the broker of his right to commissions.

4. A broker may be found to be the procuring cause of sale where he calls a person's attention to a certain piece of property, and gives him information as to how to obtain admission thereto, although the owner, without the broker's knowledge, subsequently takes up the negotiation and completes the sale.
5. Facts adjudicated by a trial court cannot be retried on appeal upon the certified testimony.
6. The omission of admitted or undisputed facts from a finding is not an error that affects the judgment unless by correcting the record and including them in the finding it appears that the court erred in some ruling of law material to the judgment.

NOTE.—When real-estate broker is considered as the procuring cause of the sale or exchange effected.

- I. Procuring cause of sale.
 - a. General rule.
 - b. Evidence to establish procuring cause.
 - c. Acts held sufficient to establish.
 - d. Acts held not sufficient to establish.
- II. When several brokers are employed.
- III. In case of a sale by his principal.
 - a. General rule governing.
 - b. Negotiations by principal.
 - c. Before broker has reasonable opportunity to reap result of his efforts.
 - d. Pending broker's negotiations with purchaser.
 - e. After suspension of negotiations.
 - f. After withdrawal or termination of agency, etc.
 - g. After broker has failed to secure purchaser or to close negotiations.
 - h. Within time limited by contract.
 - i. When broker has option or sole agency.
 - j. Effect of modification of terms.

The note to Lunney v. Healey (Neb.) — L. R. A. —, treats of the subject of the performance of the contract by the broker, and the general rules governing the same.

The subject of real-estate broker's commissions as affected by the negligence, fraud, or default of the principal and a defective title will be found in note to Brackenridge v. Claridge (Tex.) 43 L. R. A. 593.

Real-estate broker's commissions as affected by his negligence or fraud or other acts or agreements on his part respecting the sale or exchange of real estate will be found in note to Leathers v. Canfield (Mich.) — L. R. A. —.

I. Procuring cause of sale.
a. General rule.

The general rule is that the broker has performed his contract and is entitled to his commissions when he is the procuring cause of the sale effected with the purchaser, and unless he can prove that he stands in such a position he cannot recover.

And the rule is the same even though the sale is effected by the owner himself. Leonard v. Roberts, 20 Colo. 88, 95. (As to the broker's claim of performance in case of a sale by the principal, see infra, III.)

Whether the broker is to "introduce" a purchaser, or to "find" or "procure" one, or whether he is to do these things combined, his duties remain practically the same, and the words "find," "procure," and "introduce" are generally used synonymously in the making of such contracts. Whether used conjunctively or disjunctively, the essential thing they require the broker to do is to secure a customer who is or will become a purchaser. Platt v. Johr, 9 Ind. App. 68, 60.

So, the word "procure" means to procure a party, and not the money, and the contract is completed so far as the broker is concerned when he has procured a person who is ready and willing to pay the price, or in the case of a loan to lend the money. Middleton v. Thompson, 163 Pa. 112, 119; Green v. Lucas, 33 L. T. N. S. 584.

And the term "procuring cause" has been held to mean the original discovery of a purchaser by the broker, together with the final closing by or on behalf of the principal with the purchaser through the efforts of the broker. Hamm v. Weber, 19 Misc. 485; Smith v. McGovern, 65 N. Y. 574; Ware v. Dos Passos, 4 App. Div. 32, 35.

So, if the agreement is merely to "introduce" a purchaser it has been held that the agent cannot be said to have performed his duty when he has presented to the owner some person who contemplates buying, without reference to whether a sale is afterwards made to such person or not. Platt v. Johr, 9 Ind. App. 58, 61.

The above rule has been differently stated by the courts, but the decisions all lead to the one conclusion, which is that he must be the procuring cause of the sale in order to entitle him to recover his commissions as upon a performance of his contract.

In the following cases the courts make use of the term "procuring cause." Hill v. Jebb, 55 Ark. 574, 576; Dolan v. Scanlan, 57 Cal. 261, 263; Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal. 509; McCampbell v. Cavis, 10 Colo. App. 242; Lawrence v. Weir, 3 Colo. App. 401; Hallack v. Hinckley, 19 Colo. 38; Wray v. Carpenter, 18 Colo. 273; Babcock v. Merritt, 1 Colo. App. 84, 88; Hungerford v. Hicks, 39 Conn. 259; Odell v. Dozier, 104 Ga. 203; Davis v. Gassette, 30 Ill. App. 41; Keeler v. Grace, 27 Ill. App. 427, 429; Baumgartl v. Hoyne, 54 Ill. App. 406, 503; Plant v. Thompson, 42 Kan. 664; Attrill v. Patterson, 58 Md. 228; Livezey v. Miller, 61 Md. 336, 343; Keener v. Harrod, 2 Md. 63, 56 Am. Dec. 706;

7. That a broker was not given the exclusive sale of property, and that the owner himself made the sale, will not defeat the broker's right to commissions if he was the procuring cause of sale.
8. After a broker has rendered the services which make him the procuring cause of sale the owner cannot escape liability by telling him that no commission will be paid in case the property brings only a certain price.
9. A finding by the trial judge is unnecessary when the appeal is used as a substitute for the former motion in error.
10. Conclusions of the trial court from subordinate facts found may be reviewed on appeal.
11. The finding by the trial judge when an appeal is used as a substitute for a motion for new trial may contain a statement of facts on which the judgment is founded, or which are necessary to present a question of law which was made at the trial and decided by the judge, or it may contain a recital of what took place at the trial for the purpose of presenting for review rulings upon questions of evidence or other rulings not directly affecting the judgment.

12. To get an omitted fact into the record for the purpose of presenting a question of law under the act of 1897, it must appear to have been an admitted or undisputed fact, and that its statement is necessary to properly present a question of law decided adversely to appellant.

(March 9, 1899.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover commissions for the sale of real estate. Affirmed.

In Smith v. Smith, 1 Sweeney, 552, it was said that he must be the primary procuring cause.

And in White v. Twitchings, 26 Hun. 503, 504, and Hay v. Platt, 66 Hun. 488, it is said he must be the procuring cause of the "identical contract."

The term "efficient cause" or "agent" is made use of in Henderson v. Vincent, 84 Ala. 99; Birmingham Land & Loan Co. v. Thompson, 86 Ala. 146, 149; Sayre v. Wilson, 86 Ala. 151, 156; Dolan v. Cummins, 54 Pa. 394, 93 Am. Dec. 718, 719; Murray v. Currie, 7 Car. & P. 584; Wilkinson v. Martin, 8 Car. & P. 5.

The term "immediate cause" is made use of in Gleason v. Nelson, 162 Mass. 245.

The phrase the "efficient or effective cause or means of bringing about the actual sale" is found in Whitcomb v. Bacon, 170 Mass. 479; Dowling v. Morrill, 185 Mass. 401; Crowninshield v. Foster, 169 Mass. 237.

And the words "controlling cause" of the sale made to the purchaser is the expression made use of in Brooks v. Leathers, 112 Mich. 463.

The "primary, proximate, and procuring" cause is found in Lathshaw v. Moore, 53 Kan. 234.

The term "proximate cause" is found in Schmidt v. Baumann, 36 Minn. 189; Gaty v. Sack, 19 Mo. App. 476; Millan v. Porter, 31 Mo. App. 576; Wetzell v. Wagoner, 41 Mo. App. 509; Stinde v. Jacobs, 63 Mo. App. 393; Henderson v. Mace, 64 Mo. App. 393; Timberman v. Craddock, 70 Mo. 638; Wright v. Brown, 68 Mo. App. 577, 582.

In the case of Earp v. Cummins, 54 Pa. 394, 93 Am. Dec. 718, 719, which was an action to recover commissions, the court stated that in matters of agency the law requires only proximate, and not remote, causes. In other words, as stated by Lord Bacon: "It were infinite for the law to judge the cause of causes and their impulsions one of another, therefore it contenteth itself with the immediate cause, and judgment of acts by that without looking to any further degree. In jure non remota causa sed proxima spectatur."

The question whether the broker is entitled to a commission on the sale depends upon whether the person introduced by him can be regarded as a purchaser procured by him, and whether the purchase by him of the principal's

Statement by Hamersley, J.:

The finding of the trial court is as follows:

"(1) The plaintiff is, and for a number of years has been, a real-estate agent, doing business in the city of New Haven.

"(2) In December, 1897, John W. Bacon and James Osborne, the president and vice president, respectively, of the Savings Bank of Danbury, the defendant in this action, called at the office of the plaintiff, in New Haven, and placed the property then owned by said bank, and known as the 'Elliott House,' situated on the corner of Chapel and Olive streets, in said city of New Haven, in the plaintiff's hands for sale.

"(3) Both said Bacon and said Osborne were in the practice of visiting New Haven each week, from the time they placed said property in the hands of plaintiff for sale until early in the following February, when the property was sold to Mr. George H. Bishop, and on each of said visits called at the plaintiff's office to inquire as to the prospects of sale.

"(4) At the first or second visit of the said Bacon and Osborne to the plaintiff's office, in December, 1897, Mr. Bacon produced and read to the plaintiff a letter dated some eighteen months prior to that time, which letter contained an offer of some $38,000 for said property, made in behalf of one George H. Bishop, the party who became the purchaser of the property in the following February.

"(5) At the time of reading said letter said Bacon or Osborne said to the plaintiff that said Bishop might be a possible purchaser, and requested the plaintiff to see him, and use his influence to induce him to buy the property.

property resulted from the negotiations which the broker induced him to enter into. Hanna v. Collins, 69 Iowa, 51.

In some of the cases the broker is held to be the procuring cause of the sale when the same is made or can be referred to his instrumentality. Henderson v. Vincent, 84 Ala. 99; Slevers v. Griffin, 14 Ill. App. 63, 68; Hafner v. Herron, 165 Ill. 242, Affirming 60 Ill. App. 592; Livesey v. Miller, 61 Md. 338, 343; Butler v. Kennard, 23 Neb. 357, 359; Gemunder v. Hauser, 6 Misc. 210, 214; Levy v. Coogan, 16 Daly, 137; Sibbald v. Bethlehem Iron Co. 83 N. Y. 382, 22 Am. Rep. 441; King v. Baßer, 29 N. Y. S. R. 414; Lloyd v. Matthews, 51 N. Y. 124, 133; Condict v. Cowdrey, 46 N. Y. S. R. 898.

So, if the broker puts up maps, signs, notices, or otherwise advertises the property, by means of which a person is induced to open negotiations with the owner or principal which result in his buying the property, the sale may be said to have been effected through the broker's instrumentality. Gleason v. Nelson, 162 Mass. 245; Bell v. Kaiser, 50 Mo. 150; Earp v. Cummins, 54 Pa. 394, 93 Am. Dec. 718, 719.

And in other cases he is said to be the procuring cause when the sale is effected through information derived from him. Lapsley v. Holdridge, 71 Ill. App. 652; Hafner v. Herron, 165 Ill. 242, Affirming 60 Ill. App. 592; Sussdorff v. Schmidt, 65 N. Y. 319; Stewart v. Mather, 32 Wis. 344, 349; Lincoln v. McClatchie, 36 Conn. 136.

So, his "disclosure" of the purchaser has been held sufficient to establish his standing as the procuring cause of the sale, when the sale is effected with the purchaser whose name is disclosed. Anderson v. Smythe, 1 Colo. App. 253; Beale v. Creswell, 3 Md. 196, 201; Keener v. Harrod, 2 Md. 63, 56 Am. Rep. 706, 708; Wilkinson v. Martin, 8 Car. & P. 1; Howe v. Werner, 7 Colo. App. 530, 532; Scott v. Patterson, 53 Ark. 40, 52; Tyler v. Parr, 52 Mo. 249; Lincoln v. McClatchie, 36 Conn. 136; Lloyd v. Matthews, 51 N. Y. 124; Beauchamp v. Higgins, 20 Mo. App. 514, 517; Wetzell v. Wagoner, 41 Mo. App. 509, 516; Bell v. Kaiser, 50 Mo. 150; Millan v. Porter, 31 Mo. App. 563; Henderson v. Mace, 64 Mo. App. 393, 396.

And if the broker proves that he has given the names of the purchasers to the principals, and that thereby the sale or exchange was effected, he will establish his claim to commissions. Campbell v. Vanstone, 73 Mo. App. 84, 87.

And his "inducement" of the purchaser to apply to the principal, if shown affirmatively, was 44 L. R. A.

held to be the procuring cause, in Brooks v. Leathers, 112 Mich. 463; Leonard v. Roberts, 20 Colo. 88, 95; Lloyd v. Matthews, 51 N. Y. 124; Sussdorff v. Schmidt, 65 N. Y. 319; Smith v. McGovern, 65 N. Y. 574, 575; Shipman v. Frech, 1 N. Y. Supp. 68; Lincoln v. McClatchie, 36 Conn. 136; Anderson v. Cox, 16 Neb. 10; Holley v. Townsend, 2 Illt. 34; Hafner v. Herron, 165 Ill. 242, Affirming 60 Ill. App. 592.

Some cases hold that the broker is the procuring cause when he is the "meritorious" cause of the sale. Hutten v. Renner, 74 Ill. App. 124, 125; Bryan v. Abert, 3 App. D. C. 180; Pate v. Marsh, 65 Ill. App. 482, 483; Tyler v. Parr, 52 Mo. 249; Adams v. Decker, 34 Ill. App. 20.

So, he has been said to be the procuring cause when he produces a party who makes a purchase. Willes v. Smith, 77 Wis. 81, 86.

And he has been held the procuring cause where the sale has proceeded from his efforts as broker. Boyd v. Watson, 101 Iowa, 214, 221; Francis v. Eddy, 49 Minn. 447; Armstrong v. Wann, 29 Minn. 126; Babcock v. Merritt, 1 Colo. App. 84, 88; McClave v. Paine, 49 N. Y. 501, 10 Am. Rep. 431; Lloyd v. Matthews, 51 N. Y. 124; Lyon v. Mitchell, 36 N. Y. 235; Briggs v. Rowe, 4 Keyes, 424; Murray v. Currie, 7 Car. & P. 584; Wilkinson v. Martin, 8 Car. & P. 5; Lawrence v. Weir, 3 Colo. App. 401; Wylie v. Marine Nat. Bank, 61 N. Y. 415; *Hamm v. "(6) The plaintiff then agreed to see Mr. Bishop in reference to the property, and did call at his office twice during December, but failed to find him.

"(7) About the 1st of January, 1893, the plaintiff, on going again to Mr. Bishop's office to see him in reference to this property, met him on Chapel street, and talked with him regarding the property, stating that the bank was particularly anxious to sell, and avoid the expense of alterations in the property, which it would be compelled to make if it was not disposed of, and that he (Bishop) could purchase the property at a very low price, and for a number of thousand dollars less than he had previously offered for the same property, and that the property was as good then as it ever was.

"(8) A few days later said Bishop called twice at the office of the plaintiff to obtain the keys of the Elliott House to examine the property, and, not finding the plaintiff at his office, left word with his bookkeeper as to the object of the visit.

"(9) The plaintiff, on being informed of Mr. Bishop's call, telephoned him that by going to the Elliott House barber shop, and using his (the plaintiff's) name, he could secure entrance to the property.

"(10) Said Bishop, about the middle of January, after receiving this information from the plaintiff, did call at the Elliott House as directed, and examined the property.

"(11) On another and subsequent occasion, in January, 1893, the plaintiff met Mr. Bishop, while the latter was in his carriage on Chapel or State street, and had a further talk with him regarding the purchase by him of the Elliott House property.

And where he substantially effected a sale by procuring and introducing a purchaser to whom the principal sold the property, he was held to be the procuring cause of the sale. Desmond v. Stebbins, 140 Mass. 339, 352.

And where it is shown that the sale would not have been effected but for such introduction, to that extent the broker is the procuring cause 44 L. R. A.

of the sale. Bass v. Jacobs, 63 Mo. App. 333, 396.

The agent who first brings it to the notice of the person who ultimately becomes a purchaser, is entitled to his commissions as the procuring cause of the sale. Schlegel v. Allerton, 65 Conn. 260; Plant v. Thompson, 42 Kan. 664; Glascok v. Vanfleet, 100 Tenn. 603; Royster v. Mageveney, 9 Lea, 148; Arrington v. Cary, 5 Baxt. 609.

In an action by a real-estate broker to recover commissions on a sale to purchasers "procured" by them, it is not error to instruct the jury that the principals are liable if the brokers "furnished" customers. Boyd v. Watson, 101 Iowa, 214.

The broker is the procuring cause of the sale and performs his contract so as to be entitled to commissions when he procures a purchaser who enters into a written contract of purchase satisfactory to the principal and enforceable against either party. Odell v. Dozier, 104 Ga. 203; Burns v. Oliphant, 78 Iowa, 456, 459. See, as to the necessity of a written contract, note to Lunney v. Healey (Neb.) — L. R. A. —

So, the rule that, when a broker is the procuring cause of the sale, he becomes entitled to his commissions, rests, not only upon the ground that he is the agent of his principal, but also upon the theory that his acts are bona fide. Pratt v. Patterson, 112 Pa. 475.

And if the broker gets all his information from the principal, and imparts it to the purchaser who makes the purchase, the broker is the procuring cause of the sale under a contract to pay commissions for making a sale. Alexander v. Breeden, 14 B. Mon. 154.

In Ellsmore v. Gamble, 62 Mich. 543, 545, it is said that anyone who determines the action of the purchaser secures the purchase, and is the procuring cause of the same.

If the broker's action directs the attention of the purchaser to the property as property for sale or exchange, and this leads to negotiations, and the broker's action induced the minds of his principal and the purchaser to meet on the subject, which resulted in an exchange, the broker is the procuring cause thereof. Smith v. McGovern, 65 N. Y. 574, 575; Shipman v. Frech, 1 N. Y. Supp. 68; Hambleton v. Fort (Neb.) 78 N. W. 498.

And the facts that the broker drew the purchaser's attention to the property and urged the sale, and that he was the cause of the application and sale, are sufficient to establish the broker the procuring cause of the sale. Hefner v. Chambers, 121 Pa. 84.

"(12) At the time of the sale of the property to Mr. Bishop, and at the request of the bank officials, the said Bishop executed and delivered to the bank a bond" agreeing to

"I, George H. Bishop, in consideration of the sale to me by the Savings Bank of Danbury of the property known as the 'Elliott House Property,' do agree with the Savings Bank of Danbury that I will pay all taxes assessed against said property during the year 1897, and which are now unpaid, and which, having been so assessed, will become due and payable on the first day of October, 1898; and I further agree that I will guaranty said the Savings Bank of Danbury against the payment of any commissions to Lemuel G. Hoadley, of said New Haven, for the sale of said property; and I do hereby agree to save said the Savings Bank of Danbury harmless and free from any payment, loss, damage, costs, or expenses, by reason of any commission or claimed commission, from Lemuel G. Hoadley, for the sale of said property."

So, the parties may meet by chance and finally effect a sale, but if the broker be the means of putting the purchaser's mind into the mood of purchasing he is the procuring cause. Hambleton v. Fort (Neb.) 78 N. W. 498.

Representations of fact, as well as persuasions, may be the means by which the purchaser may be secured by the broker. Ellamore v. Gamble, 62 Mich. 543, 545.

And if the sale is brought about by the advertisements and exertions of the broker he is the procuring cause of the same. Bell v. Kaiser, 50 Mo. 150; Beauchamp v. Higgins, 20 Mo. App. 514, 517; Goffe v. Gibson, 18 Mo. App. 1; Anderson v. Cox, 16 Neb. 10; Hambleton v. Fort (Neb.) 78 N. W. 498.

If a stranger seeing the advertisement mentions it to one who looks up the owner and purchases, his actions are sufficient to entitle him to recover as the procuring cause. Hambleton v. Fort (Neb.) 78 N. W. 498.

Again, an advertisement, or any other service, will constitute the procuring cause if it is the immediate and efficient cause of the bargain. Earp v. Cummins, 54 Pa. 394, 93 Am. Dec. 715, 719.

It is not essential to the broker's right to compensation that he should bring about directly the actual meeting, or that he should even inform the vendor as to the prospective purchaser, provided his influence on the purchaser causes him to become such. Hambleton v. Fort (Neb.) 78 N. W. 498; Burkholder v. Fonner, 34 Neb. 1.

If through the instrumentality of the broker the buyer and seller meet, and negotiations are thus opened between them which continue without withdrawal by either party therefrom, and culminate in a sale, the broker is the procuring cause of the sale. Gemunder v. Hauser, 6 Misc. 210, 214; Levy v. Coogan, 16 Daly, 137; Sibbald v. Bethlehem Iron Co. 83 N. Y. 382, 22 Am. Rep. 441; King v. Bauer, 29 N. Y. S. R. 414.

If it is shown that the sale was not made or the purchaser procured by any other source than the broker, he will be entitled to recover as the procuring cause of the sale. Byrd v. Frost (Tex. Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 46.

So, the broker may be the procuring cause, even though he engaged a third person to make such sale without the knowledge of the principal. Boyd v. Watson, 101 Iowa, 221. Gleason v. Nelson, 162 Mass. 245, to the same effect.

In the latter case the rule was applied whether such persons were under pay from the broker or not.

hold the bank harmless from any commission to the plaintiff.

"(13) The property was sold to Mr. Bishop for the sum of $25,000, he to pay whatever commission there might be due for the sale of the property, as a part consideration thereof.

"(14) On the 5th, 12th, and 17th of January, 1898, said John W. Bacon saw Mr. Bishop in New Haven, and talked with him regarding some changes the bank contemplated making in said property, in case the same was not sold, and also spoke to him regarding his purchase of the property.

"(15) Mr. Bacon, though visiting at the plaintiff's office each week in reference to the sale of this property during said month of January, did not inform the plaintiff that he was having any negotiations with Mr. Bishop; nor did the plaintiff have any notice whatever that anyone connected with the

And where it is shown that through the services of the broker a sale is made which the principal accepts and in consideration thereof promises to pay a commission, the broker will be entitled to recover as the procuring cause of the sale. Viley v. Pettit, 96 Ky. 576.

The rule has been held to apply although after the broker had made a verbal contract the principal, without the knowledge of it, sold the property to the same purchaser. Hutten v. Renner, 74 Ill. App. 124, 125; Bryan v. Albert, 3 D. C. App. 180.

To inform people that he has the property for sale is a necessary act for the broker to carry out the contract of his agency, and which it is proper to prove as a part of what was done in order to procure a purchaser. Welsh v. Lemert, 92 Iowa, 116.

A broker is the procuring cause of the sale when he has found a purchaser, and brought him to his employer, and a contract is made between them for the sale of the property, or the purchaser is ready to purchase. Fraser v. Wyckoff, 63 N. Y. 445, 448; Knapp v. Wallace, 41 N. Y. 477; Martin v. Stillman, 53 N. Y. 615; Lloyd v. Matthews, 51 N. Y. 124.

And where the broker took the intended purchasers to his principal, and the property was inspected, and negotiations were conducted in part by the broker, which resulted in the principal's entering into a written promise de vente on the terms given to the broker, it was held that such promise was as binding on all parties as the sale itself would have been, and so far as the broker was concerned the transaction was closed and he had a vested right to his commissions. Levistones v. Landreaux, 6 La. Ann. 26.

So, when a broker brings the parties together, and the price and terms are agreed upon between them, and the contract is signed, he does all that he is compelled to do to entitle him to recover his commissions as the procuring cause of the sale. Bach v. Emerich, 3 Jones & S. 548, 551; Jewett v. Emson, 2 Robt. 165; Stillman v. Mitchell, 2 Robt. 523; Barnard v. Monnot, 3 Keyes, 203; Smith v. Smith, 1 Sweeney, 552.

And the same is the rule whether the parties are brought together in person or by correspondence, if the purchaser is accepted and the exchange is authorized, and the principal at the time is in the possession of all the knowledge and facts known to the agent, and the whole transaction on the part of the agent is done in good faith. Lockwood v. Halsey, 41 Kan. 166.

So, if the broker is employed to purchase bank was negotiating with Mr. Bishop until after the sale of the property to the latter.

"(16) The Elliott House was a well-known piece of property, and Mr. Bishop was familiar with it, having made an offer some sixteen months previous to December, 1897; but, until the interview with the plaintiff, about the 1st of January, 1898, he had made no move regarding this property since his previous offer, and had abandoned his negotiations for the purchase of the same for a period of a year and a half or more.

"(17) Two per cent is the ordinary, established, and usual commission, in the absence of any agreement to the contrary, for the sale of real estate.

"(18) No agreement for any special rate of commission was made between the parties to this suit.

"(19) The plaintiff was the procuring cause of the sale of said property to said George H. Bishop at the price of $25,000, property, and he procures the same and brings it to his principal's notice at a price, and upon terms which are accepted by him, and the transaction is such that the principal may close the contract at the time upon precisely the same terms as those upon which he ultimately purchases, the broker is the procuring cause of the purchase. Baer v. Koch, 2 Misc. 334, 336.

The above holdings of the courts may all be included in the language used by the court in the case of Stewart v. Mather, 32 Wis. 344, 349, to the effect that whenever the sale is effected through the efforts of the broker, or through information derived from him, so that he may be said to have been the procuring cause of the sale, his services are regarded as highly meritorious and beneficial, and the law leads to that construction which will best secure the payment of his commissions.

So, the rule has been applied where the broker acts in good faith and brings the principals together in his own office, and they make their own bargain uninfluenced by any representations of his. Cox v. Haun, 127 Ind. 325, 327.

But whether the broker's actions are to be regarded as the procuring, efficient, meritorious, controlling, or immediate cause of the sale and purchase, or whether the same is due to his efforts, introduction, inducement, disclosure, or instrumentality, or is caused through information derived from him, or by notice given by him, they must be the foundation on which the negotiations are begun and conducted, and the sale made. Keener v. Harrod, 2 Md. 63, 56 Am. Rep. 707, 708; Wilkinson v. Martin, 8 Car. & P. 1; Beale v. Creswell, 3 Md. 196, 201; Schwartz v. Yearly, 31 Md. 270, 276.

But something more is ordinarily necessary and implied than merely finding a person willing and desiring to buy; the purchaser must be found, and because of such finding by the broker the sale must proceed. Boyd v. Watson, 101 Iowa, 221; Greene v. Owings, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 580.

He must show that he is connected with the sale. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Hawkins, 35 Ill. App. 463.

The purchaser must be procured through the broker, or he cannot claim to be the procuring cause. Van Dyke v. Walker, 49 Mo. App. 381, 384; Wright v. Beach, 82 Mich. 469.

The sale must result in consequence of his actions or agency, means or efforts. McKnight v. Thayer, 48 N. Y. S. R. 620, 622; Lloyd v. Matthews, 51 N. Y. 132; Markus v. Kenneally, 44 L. R. A.

and the commission due him for the same is $500.

"(20) The plaintiff, in his opening testimony, offered a letter, written on the 5th day of February, by himself, to John W. Bacon, then an officer and president of the defendant bank. The letter was written after the plaintiff had learned from Bishop that he (Bishop) had made an offer for the property. The defendant objected to so much of the letter as follows: 'Which offer comes from Mr. Bishop on account of my bringing to his notice the property of the Elliott House being for sale.'

"(21) The entire letter is as follows:

John W. Bacon, Treasurer, Danbury, Conn.

Dear Sir:—

About two weeks ago I called Mr. George H. Bishop's (of Peck & Bishop Company) attention to the Elliott House property as a

He must be substantially the moving cause which leads to the sale. Carson v. Baker, 2 Colo. App. 248.

In Baumgartl v. Hoyne, 54 Ill. App. 496, 502, it is said that the proximate cause of an act is that which produces it without the interposition of an independent agency, and that it is the proximate cause of which the law takes notice, and not the causa causarum. Although the maxim In jure non remota causa sed proxima spectatur is most frequently applied in cases of insurance, and in actions of tort, as a principle it may be considered in any case wherein the efficient, promoting cause of a result is to be ascertained.

The information given by the broker to the purchaser must be the controlling cause of the purchase, and his solicitations, and representations regarding the property, must determine the purchaser in his purchase. Ellsmore v. Gamble, 62 Mich. 543, 545.

He must put the principal in communication with the purchaser. Baars v. Hyland, 65 Minn. 150; Wright v. Beach, 82 Mich. 469.

He must be the promoting cause which brings about the transaction which subsequently results in the sale or exchange. Walton v. Cheseborough, 57 N. Y. Supp. 687, 689.

In order to support an action by a broker for commissions, proof that he effected or procured a sale is necessary, in the absence of evidence of usage or an express or implied contract. Loud v. Hall, 106 Mass. 404, 407; Cook v. Welch, 9 Allen, 350; Tombs v. Alexander, 101 Mass. 255, 3 Am. Rep. 349.

So, he must prove that the person to whom he sold the property was one of his customers, that is a person found, or negotiated with, by him. Brooks v. Leathers, 112 Mich. 463.

He must also prove to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of evidence that he made the contract with the principal, and that at the time of the sale such contract was still in existence and in full force between them. Ibid.

He must establish by satisfactory evidence that he did something substantial. Hamilton v. Gillender, 26 App. Div. 156; Sibbald v. Bethlehem Iron Co. 83 N. Y. 378, 22 Am. Rep. 441; Colwell v. Tompkins, 6 App. Div. 93.

It may be doubtful whether merely advising very desirable piece of property to own. At that time he seemingly did not take much interest in the matter; told me he would think it over. He called at my office a few days ago, and requested the keys; and I gave him the instructions left by you some little time ago, as I have previously written you, to go to the barber shop in the Elliott House building, and use my name, where he could get the keys handed him, by request, to inspect the property. He has examined the building, etc., and this A. M. informs me that he has submitted to the bank an offer in writing, which offer comes from Mr. Bishop on account of my bringing to his notice the property of the Elliott House being for sale.

Yours truly,

a consummation of a bargain, of which the efforts of a rival are the procuring cause, would entitle the broker to commissions: and in such a case it ought to be shown that the advice given contributed so materially to the result as to be fairly entitled to be regarded as the procuring cause of the transaction. Davis v. Gassette, 30 Ill. App. 41, 45.

In Walton v. McMorow, 57 N. Y. Supp. 691, 692, the mere fact that the broker suggested a trade, but had no further dealings with the defendant until after the deal was made, was held not enough to constitute him the procuring cause of the sale.

And, although it is not indispensable that the purchaser should be introduced to the owner by the broker, nor that the broker should be personally acquainted with the purchaser, yet in such cases it must affirmatively appear that the purchaser was induced to apply to the owner through means employed by the broker in order to make the broker the procuring cause of the sale. Kelly v. Stone, 94 Iowa, 316; Sussdorf v. Schmidt, 55 N. Y. 322; Wylie v. Marine Nat. Bank, 61 N. Y. 415; Gemunder v. Hauser, 6 Misc. 210, 214.

So, it is essential that the agreement as finally concluded between the principal and the purchaser should be procured or brought about by the broker. Hamilton v. Gillender, 26 App. Div. 156; Baker v. Thomas, 12 Misc. 432.

To entitle a real-estate agent to commissions in a sale or exchange of land it is only necessary for him to furnish a purchaser who is willing to purchase or exchange upon the terms and conditions agreed to or proposed by the seller, and this, prima facie, will entitle him to receive a commission. Lockwood v. Halsey, 41 Kan. 166.

It is sufficient if the sale is effected through his agency as the procuring cause, and if his negotiations with the purchaser are the cause or means of bringing him and the owner together, and the sale results in consequence thereof. McKnight v. Thayer, 48 N. Y. S. R. 620, 622; Lloyd v. Matthews, 51 N. Y. 132.

b. Evidence to establish procuring cause.

The broker is entitled to show all that he does to induce the purchaser to take the property, as well as all conversations relating thereto which either he or the purchaser has had with the principal which bear directly upon the issue. Doran v. Bussard, 38 App. Div. 30.

And evidence of conversations with the agent of the purchaser as part of the services rendered and as tending to show that those services were of value to his principal is competent. Bickart v. Hoffmann, 46 N. Y. S. R. 886

"The objection of the defendant to the letter was stated as follows:

"Mr. Stoddard: It seems to me, if your Honor please, that while some parts of this (the first part, possibly) might be admissible for some purposes, that this part which reads as follows: "Which offer comes from Mr. Bishop on account of my bringing to his notice the property of the Elliott House being for sale,"—was no proper matter tending to prove the fact; and I object to that part of the letter, as tending to prove the fact that the sale was brought about by Mr. Hoadley, because it is a declaration in his own interest, and after the sale was made.' The ruling of the court upon the admission of the letter was as follows: 'The Court: I don't think, gentlemen, that that statement is binding upon the bank; but I think

So, the written contract entered into between the broker and the purchaser is admissible in evidence as proving a valid sale enforceable against such purchaser. Monroe v. Snow, 131 Ill. 126.

And the deed from the principal to the purchaser containing, and the admission by the principal of, the receipt of the purchase money, is competent evidence to prove the fact of the sale by the broker, and the sum for which the property was sold, and the amount of commission to which the broker would be entitled. Levy v. Coogan, 16 Daly, 137.

Again, the transaction or its true significance in case of dispute may be proved by anything which is said, done, or written in the presence of the parties themselves, and which is the immediate, unpremeditated, and spontaneous result of such transaction. Monroe v. Snow, 131 Ill. 126.

So, evidence which establishes that the broker was subject to expenses in negotiating the sale is competent, and he can show that he employed another whom he paid to aid him in conducting the negotiations, as such evidence is part of the res gestæ. Fiero v. Fiero, 52 Barb. 288, 292.

Evidence which shows an oral contract made between the purchaser and his principal upon terms mutually agreed upon, in conformity with which an attorney prepared a written agreement which the purchaser stood ready and willing to perform, sufficiently proves the broker's case. Dennis v. Charlick, 6 Hun, 21, 22.

So, the evidence of the purchaser himself showing that it was through the broker's influence and instrumentality that he purchased the property, is properly admissible. Childs v. Ptomey, 17 Mont. 502, 509.

In Anderson v. Wedeking, 102 Iowa, 446, the purchaser's testimony that it was only through the broker that he became aware of the sale, and that he finally made the purchase from the principal, who did not deny that there was an agreement between himself and the broker upon the question, was admitted.

Where the principal avers that the sale is negotiated by other persons it is not competent to ask the purchaser who has given minute details of the facts in connection with the purchase, and from whom he received the information that the property was in the market, as the question calls for a conclusion of the witness upon a material issue which it is the province of the jury to determine. Burkholder v. Fonner, 34 Neb. 1, 3.

And the purchaser cannot testify as to statements made by the broker relative to commissions. Childs v. Ptomey, 17 Mont. 502.

And the evidence of a nephew of the pur-

the letter to the bank is admissible. I don't think the fact that this man said that this sale was brought about by his efforts is binding or conclusive; but the fact that he made such a statement to the defendant in this case, I think, is admissible, and I should allow it to come in for the purpose of proving the fact that he said so.'

"(22). The plaintiff, in opening his case, offered the deposition of James Osborne, of the Danbury Savings Bank, and in connection therewith counsel for the plaintiff and defendant made the following statements: 'Mr. Wright: There is a deposition here of Mr. James Osborne, of the Danbury Savings Bank. There is only a portion of this deposition that is pertinent to our case in chief, and I will only read so much of it as I claim now, and leave the balance for rebuttal. The deposition is as follows: [Reading depositioner that he was taken by the broker to see the property, and that the sale was made to his uncle in consequence of his recommendation and interview with the broker, is properly admissible as clearly proving what the broker had done and that his acts resulted in a sale. Welsh v. Lemert, 92 Iowa, 116, 121.

So, evidence is properly received to show an agreement and undertaking between the parties as to the terms of the sale to the purchaser as the broker was entitled to prove that he had procured a purchaser and the terms upon which he was willing to buy. Schmidt v. Baumann, 36 Minn. 189.

And a letter written by the broker to the manager or agent of the purchaser, which confirmed the broker's testimony, was admitted in evidence as part of the res gestæ to corroborate the statement made by the broker that he found a purchaser who was surreptitiously approached by the principal who concluded the sale with him after the broker had intimated who the purchaser was, which latter fact the principal denied, as the letter was proof of the efforts made by the broker. Carroll v. Pettit, 67 Hun, 418.

Where there was an apparent variance or contradiction between the entries in the broker's books, which showed an authority to sell at a certain price with power to ask a larger sum, a postal card sent by the broker to his principal asking if there was any change in the price, and stating the larger sum as the price, and referring to the broker's books by letter and page, the broker's books containing such entry, was admitted in evidence to prove and explain such variance or contradiction. Monroe v. Snow, 131 Ill. 126.

In that case the principal denied the authority to sell for the smaller sum, and produced the postal card in evidence. The court admitted evidence in rebuttal on behalf of the broker for the purpose of proving that such card was written by his clerk under general instructions, and that he took the larger amount from books and knew nothing about the meaning or the reasons for the insertion of the private marks.

Under a contract to give the broker, or to such purchaser as he should procure, a good and sufficient deed of the premises, and to pay to them all in excess of a stipulated price, and also in case the principal himself sold at a certain price, or at a greater or less price to pay them 3 per cent on such sum paid, evidence of services rendered and money expended in order to procure a purchaser by means of advertising and other customary methods adopted by real-tion.] That is as far as I care to read now. Mr. Stoddard: That is down to and including the answer 12 on page 4 of my copy? Mr. Wright: Yes. Mr. Stoddard: Well, very well. Mr. Wright: Let me examine it a little further. It may be possible there is only a question or two. If you have no objection, we might read the whole deposition now. Mr. Stoddard: You must take your own course. Mr. Wright: Well, I will stop there.'

"(23) After the defendant had rested, and in the evidence in reply, the plaintiff offered to read the remainder of said deposition, and, among other questions and answers, the following from his direct examination in said deposition: 'Q. 15. Were you present at a meeting of the directors of the Savings Bank of Danbury when Mr. Bishop's offer for the Elliott House was received and acted upon?'

estate brokers, without any result, is admissible in an action to recover the amount agreed to be paid under such agreement upon a sale by the principal. Goward v. Waters, 98 Mass. 596.

Yet evidence of subsequent negotiations between different parties is entirely irrelevant, as it tends to divert the minds of the jury from the main issue. Follinsbee v. Sawyer, 8 Misc. 370, 378.

Yet in an action by a real-estate broker to recover commissions it is competent for the court to admit evidence of the relation to a purchasing corporation of the party with whom the agent had negotiations and with whom the principal afterwards concluded the sale of the property, e. g. that he was a stockholder. Brooks v. Leathers, 112 Mich. 463.

And under a denial of an alleged sale made by a principal under a contract to allow his agent certain commissions on sales made by himself, the principal may show that a conveyance absolute in form was made for security only, and was in fact a mortgage. Terry v. Wilson, 50 Minn. 570.

Again, it is not error to exclude testimony on behalf of the principal that he had offered another party a commission for effecting a sale,—especially where the offer is made after the sale, and there is no evidence that such parties were the principal's agents to sell the property, and nothing to show that they were entitled to commissions. Bowser v. Field (Tex.) 17 S. W. 45.

But the principal cannot produce evidence of disputes between himself and such purchaser arising out of the contract between them where the same have been litigated and the purchaser has been successful in such litigation. Heaton v. Edwards, 90 Mich. 500.

See also Newton v. Ritchie, 75 Iowa, 91, and Goin v. Hess, 102 Iowa, 140, infra, II.

c. Acts held sufficient to establish.

The general rule is that a real-estate broker who advertises the property for sale, calls the attention of the purchaser to it, takes him to see the property, directs him to the house of his principal, and gives him a copy of the papers containing a description of the property, is the procuring cause of a sale made by the principal to such purchaser, and is entitled to his commissions for finding a purchaser. Ratts v. Shepherd, 37 Kan. 20.

So, the facts that the parties are brought together: that the negotiations are carried on by and through the broker: that he participates and aids in the transaction at the time of its consummation, and is at that time recognized and regarded by the principal as his agent,—

The defendant objected to the question as immaterial, irrelevant, and not within the issues, and because it should have been offered in the opening if at all. The court overruled the objection, and the defendant duly excepted, and the witness answered: 'I was.'

"(24) Thereupon plaintiff offered question 16 of said deposition, as follows: 'Q. 16. Where was such meeting so held, and who was present thereat?' The defendant objected to this question as immaterial, irrelevant, and not within the issues of the case, and that it ought to have been introduced, if at all, in the opening. The court overruled the objection, admitted the question, and the defendant duly excepted. The witness answered: 'The meeting was held in the directors' room, in the Savings Bank of Danbury. Judge Brewster was there; Henry M. Robinson was there; Mr. Wood-are sufficient to establish the broker's claim to commissions as the procuring cause of the sale. Howe v. Werner, 7 Colo. App. 530, 532.

The fact that the broker gave copies of his principal's written application to a number of persons, by one of whom, without the broker's knowledge but upon the strength of such application, the transaction was carried out, is sufficient to entitle him to his commissions as the procuring cause. Derrickson v. Quimby, 43 N. J. L. 373.

So, where the broker sent to the principal the man who purchased his farm, and there was an agreement between the parties for commission, the broker recovered his commission as the procuring cause. Kelly v. Stone, 94 Iowa, 316; Ford v. Easley, 88 Iowa, 603.

And where the party who conversed with the broker intended to purchase either for a corporation, or to have the company buy, and the principal had knowledge at the time he sold to the company that the sale was effected as a result of the broker's negotiations with some of the incorporators of the company, it was held that the question was sufficient to go to the jury, that the company was the one which the party had in view and was negotiating the sale of with the broker, and that they could properly find that he was the procuring cause of the sale made by the principal. Hosmer v. Fuller, 168 Mass. 274.

Again, where the broker notifies his principal of previous interviews with the stockholder of the purchasing corporation, it is not wholly unreasonable for the jury to find that the suggestion of the principal to such stockholder that he ought to have the property for himself is made in view of the previous negotiations, and based upon them. Brooks v. Leathers, 112 Mich. 463.

So, where a written contract was entered into, and the purchaser gave his check, but the next day sought to be released from the contract, and upon the principal's refusing to release him stopped payment of the check, it was held that the broker was entitled to recover commissions as the procuring cause of the sale, as the principal had a right to enforce his contract with the purchaser. Hipple v. Laird, 189 Pa. 472.

And where, in order to escape paying commissions, a deed was made by the principal to a party who conveyed to the purchaser such interest as he wished to buy, a finding that the broker procured the purchaser was warranted by the evidence. Bogart v. McWilliams (Tex. Civ. App.) 31 S. W. 434.

So, where brokers offered the property to the man of Bethel, and Dwight H. Rogers, Mr. Henry C. Ryder, the treasurer; and myself. I don't recollect whether Mr. Hartwell was there. They'll back up my testimony to-day.' This evidence was claimed to show what the transaction between the bank and Mr. Bishop was, what the property was sold for, what was said regarding the commission, and what arrangements were made regarding the commission on this transaction. Counsel for the plaintiff, in offering this evidence, stated that he was not sure whether it was evidence which should have been introduced in the opening, or rebuttal, and therefore he asked the court, in the exercise of its discretion, to admit the testimony. Testimony admitted, after the court had notified the defendant that he would be given an opportunity to reply to this testimony, if he desired so to do.

"(25) The defendant claimed, upon the purchaser, who had called upon them for the purpose of placing her property in their hands for sale, and informed the principal of such negotiations, and after a delay of some months the purchaser came to the broker again to ascertain if he was willing to sell, and he finally concluded to consider the matter, and afterwards effected a sale at a larger price, the broker was held really the procuring cause of the sale. Morgan v. Mason, 4 E. D. Smith, 636, 638.

And there is nothing to justify a verdict of no cause of action in a case where a large property is sold for cash, and another is taken at a nominal rate, and the principal admits that the broker was instrumental in securing the arrangement, although he disputes the extent and value of his services. Scribner v. Hazeltine, 79 Mich. 370, 371.

So, where by his efforts with other real-estate men the broker procures a party to make an offer, which is accepted by his principal, it is through his instrumentality and that of those who assist him that the principal is able to effect the sale. Carter v. Webster, 79 Ill. 425, 436.

And the fact that after an unsuccessful attempt to sell at public auction the broker is authorized to act upon his own suggestion that he knows of a party who might buy privately for not less than a given sum is sufficient to establish an agency which will entitle him to commissions as the procuring cause, if he makes a sale. Chilton v. Butler, 1 E. D. Smith, 150, 151.

The brokers made out a prima facie case entitling them to have the question submitted to the jury whether they were not entitled to the usual and customary charges paid for such a sale, where parties were brought together by brokers who had previously effected a sale of other property, and a sale was made upon terms somewhat varying from the principal's offer as to the amount of the cash payment. Henderson v. Mace, 64 Mo. App. 393, 396.

Where the purchaser obtained a card to view with the terms stated on its back from the broker, and after a time renewed negotiations through a friend of the principal, and ultimately became the purchaser at a less price, it was held there was evidence for the jury that such party became the purchaser of the premises through the plaintiff's intervention, who was therefore entitled to the stipulated commissions. Mansell v. Clements, L. R. 9 C. P. 139, 8 Moak, Eng. Rep. 440.

Where the broker called the purchaser's attention to the property by an advertisement, and an offer was submitted to the principal, and trial, under the above and foregoing evidence, that the plaintiff was not the procuring cause of the sale to Bishop of the property in question, and that, upon the above and foregoing facts, he was not entitled to recover his commission as a broker upon the sale of said property to said Bishop. The defendant also claimed, under the arrangements between the officers of the bank and the plaintiff, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover any commission, in view of the fact that the property was sold for no more than $25,000; and the defendant desires to review the above questions of law."

The substance of the correspondence claimed as showing the legal effect of the bond of Mr. Bishop was as follows:

February 2, 1898, Bacon writes to Hoadley: "You spoke once of submitting in writing a lower offer for the place, the buyer to pay all commissions and taxes. If you have any such, or any other, offer, or any suggestions, I will esteem it a favor if you will let us hear from you this week, so we can talk up the matter at our board meeting next Monday." February 3, 1898, Bishop writes to Bacon: "Since you left have been thinking how I might use the Elliott House, and have decided that, if you wanted to accept $25,000 cash, that would handle it myself." February 4, 1898, Bacon writes to Bishop: "Replying to yours of yesterday, I cannot answer until our board meets next Monday. We have had two offers for the property at the price you named, which we have declined. I do not think our board would care to consider any such price, unless the purchaser would first agree to pay the taxes becoming due this year, and, second, guarantee us against the claim of any real-the continuous negotiations led to a sale, the broker was held to be the procuring cause. Doran v. Bussard, 18 App. Div. 36, 37, 38 App. Div. 30.

In this case the broker's advertisements directed any intending purchaser to call at the office of a certain broker who acted subject to the directions of the plaintiff broker, and an offer at first declined was increased by the purchaser, and the sale was finally consummated between the parties through the other broker, who had obtained the plaintiff's permission to act, and who found the principal after a search talking with the purchaser at a place where he had left the purchaser, the plaintiff broker recovered his commissions as the procuring cause of the sale.

Where the purchaser's offer was communicated to the principal in a letter to which the principal replied that the purchaser "must offer more," and after an interval another broker repeated the offer, which the principal accepted, the first broker was entitled to recover his commissions upon the sale, as there was no evidence of a termination of the agency,—especially as the principal had declined to negotiate through a third broker on the ground that "the plaintiff" had the matter in hand, and the broker had not abandoned his efforts. Buehler v. Welfenbach, 21 Misc. 30.

So, in Lincoln v. McClatchie, 36 Conn. 136, the broker recovered his commissions, as his advertisement attracted the attention of parties, who obtained particulars from him for the purchaser, who afterwards concluded a sale with the principal.

And a similar holding was given by the court in Redfield v. Tegg, 38 N. Y. 212, where the broker's advertisement and other efforts caused information to reach the purchaser directly or through some other person whose information came directly from the same source, and he was retained by the principal, who agreed to pay the commissions and did not dissent from his actions when informed thereof, but called upon the broker with the purchaser to effect the agreement.

And the court refused to disturb a verdict in the broker's favor where he made overtures to his principal as to the listing of his estate with his agency for sale, but the principal refused to put the property in his hands for sale, saying that so long as he was capable of transacting his own business he did not want anybody to transact it for him, and that he proposed to make whatever there was in it himself, and that if the broker wanted anything out of the transaction he must make it out of the other fellow, 44 L. R. A.

but gave the broker his terms, and he advertised and talked the matter over with a purchaser, who bought from the principal at an increased price, as the evidence showed that the broker was efficiently instrumental in procuring the purchase. Ellis v. Dunsworth, 49 Ill. App. 187.

And the fact that the purchaser was informed that the land was for sale through one who drew his attention to the advertisement of the broker in a paper published at the latter's own expense, and that by this means a sale was effected, which fact is not denied, constitutes a strong equity in favor of the broker whatever the contract may have been, although the purchaser may testify that the broker did not point out the property to him, and that he bought from the principal. Anderson v. Cox, 16 Neb. 10.

So, where the brokers saw the purchaser and informed their principal of the opportunity to sell, and gave the name of the purchaser, who the principal said wanted to lease and not to buy, and the purchaser, after another interview with the brokers, effected a sale with the principal, this is sufficient to support a verdict that the sale was caused by the agency of the brokers, even though the principal may have reserved to himself the right to sell. Bowser v. Field (Tex.) 17 S. W. 45.

Where the broker opened negotiations and an offer was refused and the property was too large for one purchaser, and the principal consented to a sale at one time to several parties for the entire price, and the broker combined purchasers and introduced a party to the intending purchaser, and the property was finally sold, the broker was held to be the efficient cause of the sale. Johnson v. Bernheimer, 46 N. Y. S. R. 375.

In Hambleton v. Fort (Neb.) 78 N. W. 498, the broker was entitled to his commissions although his services consisted only in first directing the purchaser's attention to the property and in securing his favorable interest, where, after an offer from one whose name or identity the broker did not disclose was rejected, the defendant met such purchaser and sold to him without the plaintiff intervening, through direct negotiations, and the defendant had learned of the purchaser through a former owner of the land who knew that he was able to purchase.

And the broker will be considered as the procuring cause where the principal refuses to sell to the purchaser upon the ground of a change of mind and the negotiations are apparently broken off, but a day or two afterwards the parties consummate a sale without the broker's estate agent for commission on the sale. If you will make these modifications, I will submit your proposal to our board next Monday, and advise you of their decision." February 5, 1898, Bishop writes to Bacon: "Have received your letter this morning, and, as the sale of this property has been entirely between ourselves, there would be no commission for you to pay to anyone." The writer then declines to pay the taxes, but offers to pay uncompleted insurance, and, if bank desires, to continue a loan for $25,000, with additional security. February 5, 1898, Hoadley writes to Bacon: [See paragraph 21 of finding, ante, p. 326]. February 7, 1898, Bacon writes to Bishop: "Replying to your favor of the 5th, I very much regret that you did not think best to modify your offer, as suggested in my letter of the 4th. Perhaps, after further consideration, you will conclude to do so. I inclose confidentially two letters from Mr. Hoadley, which please return, and oblige." February 7, 1898, Bishop writes to Bacon: "Have received your favor of to-day, and, while knowing offer was low, still, for the use I want to put it to, it was as much as I felt like offering. . . . I inclose you the two letters which you kindly sent me, and which amount to nothing, as you and I both understand that there would be nothing coming in that direction from your people, provided the property was sold to me; and thought would ask your opinion confidentially whether your bank would be willing to divide the amount of taxes with me, if I should make that offer; also, whether they would prefer cash, or care to make a loan, and, if so, how much. I expect to leave for Nebraska the first of next week, probably going through to Caliintervention, if the principal is put into communication with the purchaser by the broker's efforts. Lestrade v. Perrera, 6 La. Ann. 398.

So, if the preliminary acts of the broker in agreeing with the purchaser on the terms of the sale, and drawing up and submitting to him a written contract which the principal shows to an attorney, bring about a sale, he can recover the commission as the procuring cause of the sale. Ward v. Cobb, 148 Mass. 518. In this case the contract signed by the defendant and the purchaser was a contract of sale although not in the form required to pass the legal title (an equitable right only passing) binding the defendant to make a conveyance, and the purchaser to take the property, and pay for it, of which specific performance could be decreed.

The court refused to disturb a verdict in the broker's favor where the defendant stated that the property had been taken out of his hands, and denied an agreement to pay him for his services except upon a sale at a certain price, and also that he sold or found a purchaser, where the broker alleged a contract to pay whether he sold or not, and that his efforts made or were the cause of the sale. Mousseau v. Dorsett, 80 Ga. 566.

So, an auctioneer and real-estate agent recovered commissions as the procuring cause of a private sale, after an unsuccessful auction, under an agreement giving him $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent "if the estate should be sold," and a lower sum if not sold, where he referred one who attended the sale and who inquired of him who the owner was, to his principal, and such person ultimately, without any further invitation or interviews with the agent, purchased. Green v. Bartlett, 14 C. B. N. S. 681, 32 L. J. C. P. N. S. 261, 8 L. T. N. S. 503, 11 Week. Rep. 834.

And the broker was regarded as the effective agent in bringing about the sale where, after refusing the purchaser's offer, the principal informed his broker he had concluded to take the price so offered, and the broker so notified the purchaser, who wrote to another party through whom the negotiations between the parties were continued and a sale was consummated, as he communicated the principal's desire to reopen the negotiations with the purchaser, and the broker's position was not affected by the fact that the purchaser continued the negotiations through another, with whom the principal treated instead of with his own broker, as the latter was the means of the resumption of negotiations. Peckham v. Ashhurst, 18 R. I. 376.

So, facts which show, inter alia, that the broker's acts in procuring maps from the seller, and signs to be painted and put up near the premises, and advertising in the papers referring to himself as broker, were recognized and paid for by the defendants: and that a sale was negotiated by the defendants with a party introduced to them by another real-estate broker whose attention, as well as that of the purchaser, was attracted to the property by the maps, signs, and advertisements of the plaintiff, who had no personal communication with such purchaser or agent before the negotiations for the purchase, and who continued to advertise until the defendants told him not to do so, or make further efforts, as they were negotiating with the parties, and that he should have his commission if the sale was effected,—are sufficient to lead the jury to infer that the purchaser was secured by the plaintiff's efforts, and that his claim for brokerage was recognized by the promise to pay it, although it did not appear as a fact that the defendants knew that the purchaser and his broker came to purchase in consequence of information obtained through the plaintiff, as, if he was the producing cause of the sale, his right to compensation existed, and could not be affected by the circumstance that the defendants were ignorant of it at the time. Sussdorf v. Schmidt, 55 N. Y. 319, 321.

And the sale was held to be the fruit of the broker's labor where the purchaser introduced hesitated to buy at the price named, but subsequent negotiations between the principal and such purchaser led to a sale upon virtually the same terms. Ames v. McNally, 6 Misc. 93, 94.

So, subsequent negotiations conducted by another on behalf of the broker, which finally result in an exchange, will entitle the broker to recover commissions as the procuring cause. Brundage v. McCormick, 69 Hun. 65, 66.

Again, the broker was held to be the procuring cause of the sale where he introduced the purchaser, and assisted in the negotiations which resulted in the sale, where such purchaser had previously been in negotiation with the representatives of a former owner, and was at the place where the broker first met him in response to a letter from such agent, whose authority had terminated by the sale of the property by his principal. Stauffer v. Bell, 99 Iowa, 545, 548.

So, a purchase made by a person introduced by the broker for substantially the price at which the property was placed in his hands for sale, under a contract by the principal to pay the agent a commission when a sale was made, without any other and further rendition of services on the broker's part than the production of a purchaser who might buy, is sufficient to establish the broker as the procuring cause of the sale, and the principal cannot escape liafornia; and, if do anything, should have to do it at once, and write this to you in confidence, as do not care to make any more offers which, in your opinion, would be refused." February 8, 1898, Bacon writes to Bishop: "Replying to yours of yesterday, I can only repeat that our board would not consider the price you named, unless the buyer will pay the taxes, and also guarantee us against the claim of any real-estate agent for commission. I trust you will consider our correspondence entirely confidential, as the lowest price we have ever given Hoadley is $33,000, though he once wrote us asking if $30,000 would buy the place, and we replied that would consider such proposal, if made." February 9, 1898, the agreement to pay the taxes, and to guarantee the bank against the payment of any commissions to Hoadley, was signed by Bishop.

bility unless there is something in the circumstances which makes out a defense, such as dishonesty or fraud, or the execution of a contract contrary to good morals. McC Campbell v. Cavis, 10 Colo. App. 242.

And where a fair construction of a letter mentioning a limited time and containing an offer implied that the sale should be made by the time the principal was to pay for certain land, and contemplated a sale in a foreign country to emigrants without any strict limitation of time, and more than a year elapsed between the writing of the letter and the sale, but it was not shown that the land had risen in value, or that the principal had added to its value by improvements, and the broker's statement to his principal that he must be reasonable was consistent with the letter of the principal in which he fixed the price, and it fairly appeared from the evidence that the purchaser sought out the broker who took him to the principal and the result was a sale, the court held that the evidence sufficiently supported the broker's claim for commissions. Dubois v. Dubois, 54 Iowa, 216.

Again, the broker was the procuring cause of the sale where he introduced the parties to the principal's agent, who negotiated with one of such parties as to the purchase money required and consented to accept a certain sum for part of the entire premises, when the other party purchased the remaining property and the commissions on such first sale were paid to the broker, and the latter sale, which was postponed by mutual understanding, was completed about a month later. Levy v. Coogan, 16 Daly, 137.

And where the principal still continued the broker as his agent after the termination of the broker's exclusive agency with the assurance of commissions if he procured a purchaser, and the broker introduced a purchaser, who was not then ready to conclude the matter as he himself desired to sell a certain property before he purchased, but the minds of the parties did not change and the sale was finally concluded without further efforts on the part of the broker or even his principal, the broker was entitled to recover his commissions as his efforts created a mind to buy which ultimately led to the arrangement by the purchaser which vested the property and the title in the purchasers procured by the agent, even though at the time the principal consummated such sale he was not aware that such party was one of the purchasers introduced to him by the broker in the first instance. McKnight v. Thayer, 48 N. Y. S. R. 620, 322.

The defendant incorporated into its request for a finding a large number of facts which it claimed had been proved, filed exceptions to the finding of the court and to the refusal to find facts contained in the request, and asked that all the evidence in the case be certified. The appeal assigns error in the admission of evidence as stated in the finding, in the judgment as rendered upon the facts found, in the omission to include in the finding certain facts claimed as material to the questions of law raised, and many alleged errors in conclusions of fact.

Messrs. Henry Stoddard and J. Birney Tuttle, for appellant:

Admissions or declarations in one's own interest are not admissible.

Stephen, Digest Ev.; Philadelphia & T. R. Co. v. Stimpson, 14 Pet. 448, 10 L. ed. 535;

The agent was entitled to his commissions as he had procured a purchaser, who entered into a valid contract under a contract to take a specific price in cash and a first mortgage payable on or before a certain day for the balance, where he procured a written contract with the purchaser for the amount stated with a sufficient amount in cash, the balance on or before a given date with interest, the deed to be delivered within thirty days, under which contract no money was paid at the time, although the purchaser gave the agent a check for a smaller amount, and the principal was informed of the contract on the day of the sale, but on the following day himself sold the property to another person, as by the construction of the contract the amount that was to be paid in cash was only to be paid when the principal performed the obligation which rested upon him of executing to the purchaser a conveyance of the property, the presumption being that the purchaser produced was solvent and able to perform the obligation assumed by him under the contract, the defendant's conduct not being affected in any way by the question of responsibility. Goss v. Broom, 31 Minn. 484.

And where the principal disputed the broker's authority to do more than procure an option to purchase, evidence which showed that pursuant to the principal's directions the broker had the agreement made as his own personal one, and then offered the principal the option to take as much as he wished, and that the principal got the desired option without being bound to purchase, was held sufficient evidence to entitle the broker to go to the jury. Giles v. Swift, 170 Mass. 461, 462.

So, evidence from which the jury can infer that, in procuring from the seller an agreement to sell, the broker acted for himself, and not as the agent of the purchaser, nor as broker for the intending seller, and a certain letter written by the broker to the agent of such seller and the reply thereto were consistent with this view as well as the broker's account of what occurred between the purchaser and himself. Is sufficient to go to the jury upon the question whether there was such an agreement upon which the broker could recover, although there may be evidence that the broker had an option to purchase and agreed with the purchaser to give him the benefit of it for a certain amount, and to assist him in procuring a deed, and that the purchaser agreed to give him such sum on obtaining the deed. Graves v. Dill, 159 Mass. 74.

Proof which shows the employment of the broker, the introduction of the purchaser, and negotiations subsequently conducted by another

A party to a suit cannot be permitted to read in evidence an unanswered letter from himself to the adverse party for the purpose of proving the truth of the facts stated therein, although it was in reply to a letter from himself, which he has put in evidence.

Fearing v. Kimball, 4 Allen, 125, 81 Am. Dec. 690; Heywood v. Heywood, 10 Allen, 105.

Mr. William A. Wright, for appellee: The plaintiff is entitled to his commission on the sale if he shows that it was through his instrumentality that the sale was made on behalf of the broker, which finally result in an exchange of property, and that the buyer and seller are brought to an agreement through the broker and the other party acting for him, is sufficient to sustain an action of the broker for his commissions. Brundage v. McCormick, 69 Hun, 65, 66.

And evidence which shows that the principal employed the broker, knowing him to be a real-estate broker, and that the broker called the purchaser's attention to the property, and caused the parties to come together, and a sale for the price asked, makes out a prima facie case for the jury. Turner v. Putnam, 37 N. Y. S. R. 395.

d. Acts held not sufficient to establish.

In Garcelon v. Tibbetts, 84 Me. 148, 151, it is said that it is now the well-settled doctrine that in the absence of any usage or contract, express or implied, or conduct of the seller preventing the completion of the bargain by the broker, an action by the broker for his commission will not lie until it is shown that he has effected or procured a sale of the property, and it is not enough that the broker has devoted his time, labor, or money in the interest of his employer, as unsuccessful efforts, however meritorious, afford no ground of action, and that where his acts effect no agreement or contract between his employer and the purchaser, the loss must be his own. In such a case he loses his labor and efforts which he staked upon success, and if there is no contract there is no reward, as his efforts are based upon the contract of sale. To the same effect, Vlaux v. Old South Soc. 133 Mass. 1, 10; Loud v. Hall, 106 Mass. 404, 407; Tombs v. Alexander, 101 Mass. 255; Kock v. Emmerling, 22 How. 69, 16 L. ed. 292; Glentworth v. Luther, 21 Barb. 147; Drury v. Newman, 99 Mass. 256; Sibbald v. Bethlehem Iron Co. 83 N. Y. 378, 382, 22 Am. Rep. 441; Cook v. Welch, 9 Allen, 350; Veazle v. Parker, 72 Me. 443; Rockwell v. Newton, 44 Conn. 337; Watts v. Howard, 51 Ill. App. 243, 246; Earp v. Cummings, 54 Pa. 394, 93 Am. Dec. 718; Wylie v. Marine Nat. Bank, 61 N. Y. 416; McClave v. Paline, 49 N. Y. 561, 10 Am. Loeffler*, 3 Ohio Dec. 628; Goldstein v. Walters, 15 Daly, 397.

The mere fact that a broker devoted his time and labor and money for the purpose of procuring a purchaser, called the attention of a party to the property, brought the parties together, and created an impression upon the mind which might have had an effect upon the consumma-
